The report of the second committee of the first assembly expressed the committee's belief that on account of the obstacle to direct relations between peoples due to linguistic differences an international language should be taught in all the schools, a simple and easy language, which children could learn in addition to the mother tongue, and which would provide future generations with a general means of international communication. The committee had learned that the World Congress of International Associations at Brussels in September, 1920, had agreed on Esperanto as the most practicable international tongue, and had recommended that a united effort be made in its behalf. It had also been learned from Persian and Chinese representatives in the League of Nations that a widespread popular movement to this end had begun in Asia, while certain States, members of the league, notably Brazil and Czechoslovakia, had already established the teaching of Esperanto in the government schools, as had various municipalities in England and Italy. The committee had also been advised that this auxiliary international language had been successfully used in several important international congresses, speakers from all countries being able to understand each other easily.

The report of the undersecretary general on his attendance at the Esperanto congress at Prague pointed out, among other things, that while an international language was regarded by many as the impracticable hobby of cranks, it had such far-reaching cultural importance as to offer one of the constructive means of realizing the ideals of the league covenant. The report continued to the effect that while the world was shrinking and peoples were coming physically nearer, national languages were growing in number, that the towers of Babel were increasing, making intercommunication and intercommunion more difficult than ever; that in Europe alone 49 languages were in everyday use; that among league members 28 distinct linguistic systems were in use, not including several important dialects; that smaller countries, although anxious to develop national tongues, felt more keenly than the larger nations the need of an auxiliary language; that Czechoslovakia had made Esperanto an optional study in the schools; that the Finnish Parliament had voted a substantial sum to aid the Esperanto movement; that the Swiss were deeply interested in Esperanto; that Bulgaria and the free State of Hesse were encouraging instruction in Esperanto in State schools.

Referring to the need of a common language in commerce, the report set out that this was universally admitted, and that the larger foreign trade became the greater became this need; that a number of chambers of commerce had recommended the use and teaching of an artificial language. The Chamber of Commerce of Paris had, in February, 1921, after carefully comparing Esperanto with French, decided to establish optional instruction in Esperanto in all its commercial schools and to recommend to chambers of commerce in all countries that they facilitate commercial transactions by rapid cultivation of an international auxiliary language. The London Chamber of Commerce had passed a similar resolution within two years past that made Esperanto an optional study in the schools under its management, for which diplomas might be given. At the international meeting of chambers of commerce in London in June, 1921, two committees, one on transit, the other on standardization, had taken up the study of an international language. On account of its commercial utility Esperanto had been introduced into schools in Breslau, Chemnitz, Geneva, Milan, and other cities, while a number of international fairs had been said to have advertised in Esperanto—fairs at Paris, Lyons, Ghent, Frankfort, Breslau, Leipzig, Padua, Helsingfors.

Referring to the need for a common language in science, the report stated this was evident because science was essentially international in character; that science should be provided with an accurate, fertile, and exact means of intercommunication, such as Latin once furnished; that this need had been keenly felt since the beginning of the seventeenth century, when Latin had begun to decline as a scientific language. In 1900 the international congress of learned societies at the Paris Exposition appointed a committee for the choice of an international auxiliary language, largely in the interest of scientific intercommunication. An appeal had recently been signed by 21 members of the French Academy of Science urging adoption of Esperanto in scientific literature and its teaching in schools. The need of a common language is becoming greater as the interchange of ideas and information becomes more extensive in the realm of science. The International Research Council in Brussels in July, 1919, had designated a committee to study an international auxiliary language. Similar committees have since been appointed by the British Association for the Advancement of Science, Classical Association of Great Britain, American Association for the Advancement of Science, American Council on Education, American Classical League, American Philological Association, American Council of Learned Societies.

The report stated that laboring people were taking a pronounced interest in Esperanto, that before the war German and English trade-unionists exchanged visits in Esperanto, that 200 manual workers had attended the Esperanto Congress at Prague as delegates, that the laboring element was to a notable degree beginning to make Esperanto a language for the exchange of their views, that it was thus becoming an instrument of international democracy, that it would bring the masses in all countries nearer together, that the International Labor Bureau was contemplating the publication of some of its documents in Esperanto.

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE—RATIFICATION BY SIAM.

The League's Official Journal shows that on February 24, 1922, Siam, having ratified the statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice, deposited its deed of ratification with the league secretariat.

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE—MESSAGE FROM FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA.

The League's Official Journal for April, 1922, contains a message from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which was delivered to the Permanent Court of International Justice by Dr. John Bassett Moore, judge of the international court. The message was dated January 6, 1922, and was to the effect that on the occasion of the departure from the United States of Dr. John Bassett Moore to take up his new duties as a judge in the Permanent Court of International Justice the commission on international justice and good will of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America wished to express the gratification felt by millions in the United States in the creation of this new instrument of justice, good will, and peace among the nations; that the commission regarded the new court with the highest hopes, seeing in it the promise of a larger and truer righteousness among men than had before been possible, through the development of a well-considered body of international lawyers and the substitution of reason and law for the savage methods of war in maintaining vital national interests; that the commission desired to express its appreciation of the sentiments of friendship and good will manifested toward our country in the choice of our honored fellow citizen to serve as one of the judges of this court.

The message added that the prayers of millions of Americans would follow him across the sea and would rise continually to heaven for the blessing and guidance of God Almighty, Father of men and Ruler of nations, to the end that this international court might find and follow the eternal principles of justice and righteousness and thus become one of the instruments of His holy will for the establishment of His kingdom on earth and for the advancement of the highest welfare of all mankind; that the commission took pleasure in conveying to the court these greetings by the hand of "our beloved fellow citizen, Dr. John Bassett Moore."

FORMAL OPENING OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

The League's Official Journal for April, 1922, notes that the formal opening of the Permanent Court of International Justice took place on February 15, 1922, in the great hall of justice in the peace palace at The Hague during the first preliminary session of the court; that of the 15 judges and deputy judges elected in September, 1921, by the assembly and council of the League of Nations 12 took part in this session, to wit, 9 judges: Altamira (Spain), Anzilotti (Italy), Finlay (Great Britain), Huber (Switzerland), Loder (Netherlands), Moore (United States), Nyholm (Denmark), Oda (Japan), Weiss (France); 8 deputy judges, to wit: Beichmann (Norway), Negulesco (Rumania), Yovanovitch (Serb-Crovat-Slovene State). Two judges, Barboza (Brazil) and de Bustamente (Cuba), were absent on account of illness, and the deputy judge, Wang-Chung-Hui (China), who had been a Chinese delegate to the Washington conference, was prevented from attending.

Doctor Loder was elected president of the court; Mr. Weiss, vice president; Mr. Hammarskjöld, registrar.

The court was then addressed by the following speakers: Mr. da Cunha, Brazilian ambassador to France and member of the Council of the League of Nations; Sir Eric Drummond, secretary general of the League of Nations; Mr. van Karnebeek, foreign minister for the Netherlands; Mr. Patijn, burgomaster of The Hague, and Doctor Loder, president of the court.

Mr. da Cunha said in his address that he had been deeply honored by the invitation to welcome the court in the name of the Council of the League—that for the first time in history men had finally succeeded after many efforts in establishing a Permanent Court of International Justice—that it was difficult to estimate the full significance of such an event—that February 15, 1922, would be one of the great days in the annals of human justice. He said that it gave him great satisfaction to represent the council of the league in the country which had been the home of religious and political freedom, the chosen dwelling place of international justice—that it was needless to dwell upon the ardor and enthusiasm with which all the members of the league had worked together during the past two years for the establishment of the great monument of justice now being inaugurated.

The speaker then asserted that on the American continent, which had suffered from war less than Europe, the idea of international justice was perhaps stronger and more vital than in the rest of the world—that the people of the New World were instinctively attracted toward this ideal now being realized and hoped through it to be protected from terrible catastrophes such as have been suffered in past history.

He then pointed out that at the first assembly of the League of Nations the representatives of Latin America had supported the proposal of the jurists for compulsory jurisdiction for the court, and that the honor of suggesting a compromise acceptable to all belonged to the Brazilian delegation—a compromise to the effect that while the jurisdiction of the court should not be compulsory, an optional clause should be included in the protocol on ratifications permitting States reciprocally to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the court in any particular class of disputes. He said that 18 States had already signed the compulsory clause—that he hoped others would soon follow, including the great powers—but that the desire to see this last stage achieved and compulsory jurisdiction accepted by all the world should not prevent appreciation of the work already accomplished in the present status of the court. While telegrams of acclamation were being received from almost all countries, the speaker wanted the voice of the New World distinctly heard.

He said that those who long ago had conceived the idea of the court and struggled for it through long years with unconquerable energy should not be forgotten on this occasion; that this sentiment was borne in upon the speaker when the previous day he was leaving Paris and bidding adieu to his eminent friend Mr. Leon Bourgeois, who had been unable to come; that Mr. Bourgeois would have felt intense satisfaction in being present and in recalling The Hague peace conferences of 1899 and 1907 and the difficult struggles through which he had passed in his efforts to bring the court to realization.

The speaker added that mention should be made of his colleagues on the council, who had aided in the great task of establishing the court; that to grasp the importance of their work it should be recalled that all previous attempts had been fruitless, that the conferences assembled at The Hague, although they resulted in setting up a permanent court of arbitration, had failed to establish a supreme tribunal for the trial of international justice—that is, a Permanent Court of International Justice—that the efforts to establish such a court had failed because a powerful international machinery was required to smooth out difficulties, to diminish rivalries, and to assemble the energies of governments and peoples for the achievements of a common purpose; that such machinery had been supplied by the League of Nations; that it was due to the league that the court was now a reality.

Since the court was the fruit of the work of the committee of jurists which met under the auspices of the league at The Hague in 1920, of the council of the league and of the first two assemblies, it was not out of place, the speaker said, to say something in praise of the league. It had already accomplished much in the wide field of international collaboration; in the political field, where it had brought about the settlement of serious disputes; in the economic field, where the conference at Brussels formed an unsurpassed example; in the humanitarian field, where it had aided in repatriating 400,000 prisoners of war and where it was still opposing many evils threatening Europe and other sections of the globe. He said that there had never been a greater tribute to the league or an event of more universal interest than the meeting he now addressed; that nearly all the States of the world were represented, and all would soon be, in the composition of the court. He said that the universality and humanity of the league were matters of pride, and that the council and the assembly intended in no way to maintain authority over the court but expected it to deliver judgment on behalf of all mankind.

Sir Eric Drummond began his address by stating that the Permanent Court of International Justice owed its establishment to article 14 of the covenant of the league, under which the council of the league was authorized to formulate and submit to the members of the league plans for a permanent court; that at one of its earliest meetings the council invited some of the most eminent jurists in the world to come together to prepare a constitution for such a court.

He said that one of these jurists had been elected president of the court, and that it would not be right to pass over without notice the well-known fact that the scheme adopted by this committee of jurists was largely conceived by that great international lawyer, Mr. Elihu Root, a member of the committee. He said that the scheme was placed before the council, where it was carefully considered, and that Mr. Leon Bourgeois, who had always championed the idea of such a court, became the member of the council chiefly identified with the work of developing and establishing the court. After consideration by the council the scheme, modified in detail but in its broad outline unchanged, had been submitted to the first assembly with the result that a convention was drawn up and ratified by a sufficient number of States, members of the league, to permit the election of judges by the second assembly. He said that thus in less than two years from the creation of the League of Nations a Permanent Court of International Justice was inaugurated and an end achieved for which the world had striven through many years. He said that at The Hague peace conference of 1907 the effort to set up such a court had broken down on the question of the manner of electing the judges; that the subsequent formation of the League of Nations, with its two constituent bodies, assembly and council, had solved this difficulty.

The speaker pointed out that the establishment of the court completed the organization of the league as laid down in the covenant; that it was the greatest and, in his judgment, the most important creative act of the league; that at last a judicial international body had been established which was entirely free from all political control and unfettered as to its decisions by political bodies; that, although it derived its authority from the league, its judgments were in no way subject to advice or revision by council or assembly.

He said that the opening of the court was a landmark in human advancement; that it would prove the greatest landmark; that the ideal of all was that not only individual nations but the whole world should be ruled by law; that the path of world progress was at present enshrouded in fog, but here and there glimpses of light were breaking through and illuminating the way; that this court was such a ray, a ray which should shine the more brilliantly when the gloom was finally dispersed, because it emanated from the sun of justice.

Mr. Van Karnebeek welcomed the court in the name of the Dutch nation, expressing pride and gratitude for the honor conferred on the Netherlands by the nations of the league in establishing the court on Dutch soil. He recalled the two great conferences at The Hague which had laid the foundation of the court of arbitration, as well as memories of Grotius and Bynkershoek, saying that they had awakened to new life with the advent of the Permanent Court of International Justice. He said that the court was a living and concrete manifestation of the international conscience, the most remarkable step upward humanity had taken in the realm of law; that for this progress the world was indebted to the League of Nations, which, with the help of that eminent citizen of the great American Republic who took part in the work of the committee of jurists, had overcome the difficulties that had thwarted the second peace conference at The Hague. He said that in the midst of economic and political dislocation which still prevailed there was raised through the court the standard of moral solidarity among the nations; that it was an act of faith, an act of confidence in the competence and impartiality of the judges elected by the League of Nations.

Dr. J. A. N. Patijn, burgomaster of The Hague, welcomed the court for the municipality of The Hague. He said that beneath the tranquil Dutch exterior was a profound and general satisfaction over the location of the court at The Hague and an immense sympathy with the great international ideal it typified.

He stated that the events of the past 25 years had not been calculated to inspire The Hague public with idealism; that they had seen two peace conferences assemble, each followed by tremendous and terrific wars; that the palace in which the court now gathered, baptized probably with undue haste as the palace of peace, had witnessed during the greater part of its existence wars and revolutions of terrible description. He said, however, that only superficial critics would be discouraged by such happenings; that the greater the achievement the greater the difficulty attending its inception; that there should be no despair; that from the general upheaval in economic, political, financial, and social relations throughout the world a new order would rise happier and more harmonious than the old; that it was to be hoped that in this new order an international system of justice would afford to countries the same benefits afforded in the past to the inhabitants of an individual nation by national systems of justice.

Doctor Loder, president of the court, said that it was by no accidental combination of circumstances that the founders of the court, in the various stages preceding its establishment, had always regarded the Netherlands as in truth its native land; that a gardener about to plant a precious flower selects a soil with the qualities most favorable to its development; that the Permanent Court of International Justice was like this precious plant, its gardener being the whole world, which expected from it a new era of happiness, right, and justice; that if the roots of this plant were to strike deep, if it was to become a tree with a solid trunk, with strong, widespreading branches and thick foliage beneath which the peoples might find rest, it required a fertile soil tilled by long centuries of order and freedom—freedom of mind and of conscience, freedom of action for all, and order respecting the rights of others to the end that this liberty might be no empty form of words but a living reality: that the corner of the earth called Holland was most especially a soil of this kind. He said it was by no chance conjunction of circumstances that Holland had so often been selected as a meeting place for nations gathered in the quest for peace; that for the preparation of this fertile soil long centuries had been required—centuries of struggle, perseverance, of unswerving faith in a future when freedom would triumph.

He said that the court was one of the principal organs of the league, but fulfilled its duties in complete independence. He said that it occupied within the League of Nations a place similar to that of the courts in many States, which were integral parts of the State dependent on the national legislature for its constitution, organization, and maintenance, but recognizing no master in the fulfillment of its duties, possessing in this respect absolute liberty and bound only by the law which it had been fashioned to apply. He asserted that the field of the court's activity was still wider—that it was not only accessible to members of the League of Nations, but, in accordance with its statute, to States which, although not as yet members of the league, recognized the authority of that body in relation to the settlement of their disputes. He regretted the absence of Mr. Leon Bourgeois, who, he asserted, was in spirit the very creator of the court, saying that it was in great measure due to him that the court had been created; that to his perseverance, to the untiring efforts of his creative and constructive energy the court owed its existence; that the victory of the day was his victory; and that to him was due the homage of more than 40 nations.

He said that the court was proud to be established in a country renowned throughout the centuries for its devotion to international law; that at The Hague in the thirteenth century the knights had assembled in the splendid hall still known as the "Hall of the Knights" to consider questions of importance; that at The Hague in 1609 the 12-year truce was negotiated; that there in 1668 the Triple Alliance was concluded; that there in 1717 peace was signed between Spain and Austria; that since that year numerous international congresses and conferences had assembled at The Hague; that at The Hague had lived and died the world-famous man, Cornelius Bynkershoek, renowned for his learning, his uprightness, his determination that a word once given should not be broken, his vigorous defense of international treaties; that his tomb at The Hague had been almost forgotten, but that his spirit of loyalty to truth and justice would ever live and ever inspire the Permanent Court of International Justice.

The speaker stated that the opening of the court was an event full of promise in the history of civilization; that it marked the dawn of a new era in the relations between peoples, an era thoughtfully prepared for, ardently desired, and realized at last by the determined and persevering collaboration of more than 40 nations. He said that since the beginning of historic times force had been mastering right and justice; that the fearful experiences of the recent war, the bloodiest ever known, had given rise in all countries, belligerent as well as neutral, to a determination that such a state of affairs should not continue. He said that the fallacy that right is, after all, nothing but force organized and controlled would henceforth be rejected; that in its place would reign the divine principle that all existence in this world must be based on order and on harmony, an emanation of the Deity Himself, imposed by Him on mankind, on the idea that good really exists and that justice is a living reality. He asserted that justice embodied in human institutions and in relations between man and man, between people and people, is true law.

Guided by these sentiments and principles, he continued, the authors of the treaties of peace created the League of Nations, and its first and principal organ, the Permanent Court of International Justice. The statute of this court had been prepared by jurists nominated by the council of the League of Nations. It was considered by the council, examined by the assembly, and adopted in the form of a treaty duly ratified by the Governments with the approval of the national parliaments. It could not have had, therefore, a more lasting basis.

He pointed out that the jurisdiction of the court was different from that of a court of arbitration; that the judges of the former were not to be nominated by the parties. On the contrary, they formed a permanent court. The procedure of the former was not to be framed; it was laid down in the statute and in the rules of procedure. He said that the arbitration court and the Permanent Court of International Justice would exist side by side, each fulfilling its special duty, each possessing its own sphere of action, both living peacefully together in the same building.

STATUTE FOR THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

It will be instructive to give at this point the text of the statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice. It is as follows:

Statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 1.

"A Permanent Court of International Justice is hereby established, in accordance with article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations. This court shall be, in addition to the court of arbitration, organized by the conventions of The Hague of 1899 and 1907, and to the special tribunals of arbitration to which States are always at liberty to submit their disputes for settlement.

CHAPTER I—ORGANIZATION OF THE COURT.

ARTICLE 2.

"The Permanent Court of International Justice shall be composed of a body of independent judges, elected regardless of their nationality from amongst persons of high moral character, who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices, or are jurisconsults of recognized competence in international law.

ARTICLE 3.

"The court shall consist of 15 members—11 judges and 4 deputy judges. The number of judges and deputy judges may hereafter be increased by the assembly, upon the proposal of the council of the League of Nations, to a total of 15 judges and 6 deputy judges.

ARTICLE 4.

"The members of the court shall be elected by the assembly and by the council from a list of persons nominated by the national groups in the court of arbitration, in accordance with the following provisions:

"In the case of members of the League of Nations not represented in the permanent court of arbitration, the lists of candidates shall be drawn up by national groups appointed for this purpose by their Governments under the same conditions as those prescribed for members of the permanent court of arbitration by article 44 of the convention of The Hague of 1907 for the pacific settlement of international disputes.

ARTICLE 5.

"At least three months before the date of the election, the secretary general of the League of Nations shall address a written request to the members of the covenant or to the States which join the league subsequently, and to the persons appointed under paragraph 2 of article 4, inviting them to undertake, within a given time, by national groups, the nomination of persons in a position to accept the duties of a member of the court.

"No group may nominate more than four persons, not more than two of whom shall be of their own nationality. In no case must the number of candidates nominated be more than double the number of seats to be filled.

ARTICLE 6.

"Before making these nominations, each national group is recommended to consult its highest court of justice, its legal faculties and schools of law, and its national academies and national sections of international academies devoted to the study of law.

ARTICLE 7.

"The secretary general of the League of Nations shall prepare a list in alphabetical order of all the persons thus nominated. Save as provided in article 12, paragraph 2, these shall be the only persons eligible for appointment.

"The secretary general shall submit this list to the assembly and to the council.

ARTICLE 8.

"The assembly and the council shall proceed independently of one another to elect, first, the judges, then the deputy judges.

ARTICLE 9.

"At every election the electors shall bear in mind that not only should all the persons appointed as members of the court possess the qualifications required but the whole body also should represent the main forms of civilization and the principal legal systems of the world.

ARTICLE 10.

"Those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the assembly and in the council shall be considered as elected.

"In the event of more than one national of the same member of the league being elected by the votes of both the assembly and the council, the eldest of these only shall be considered as elected.

ARTICLE 11.

"If after the first meeting held for the purpose of the election one or more seats remain to be filled, a second and, if necessary, a third meeting shall take place.

ARTICLE 12.

"If after the third meeting one or more seats still remain unfilled, a joint conference consisting of six members, three appointed by the assembly and three by the council, may be formed at any time at the request of either the assembly or the council, for the purpose of choosing one name for each seat still vacant to submit to the assembly and the council for their respective acceptance.

"If the conference is unanimously agreed upon any person who fulfills the required conditions, he may be included in its list, even though he was not included in the list of nominations referred to in articles 4 and 5.

"If the joint conference is satisfied that it will not be successful in procuring an election, those members of the court who have already been appointed shall, within a period to be fixed by the council, proceed to fill the vacant seats by election from amongst those candidates who have obtained votes either in the assembly or in the council.

"In the event of an equality of votes amongst the judges, the eldest judge shall have a casting vote.

ARTICLE 13.

"The members of the court shall be elected for nine years.

"They may be reelected.

"They shall continue to discharge their duties until their places have been filled. Though replaced, they shall finish any cases which they may have begun.

ARTICLE 14.

"Vacancies which may occur shall be filled by the same method as that laid down for the first election. A member of the court elected to replace a member whose period of appointment had not expired will hold the appointment for the remainder of his predecessor's term.

ARTICLE 15.

"Deputy judges shall be called upon to sit in the order laid down in a list.

"This list shall be prepared by the court and shall have regard, first, to priority of election, and, secondly, to age.

ARTICLE 16.

"The ordinary members of the court may not exercise any political or administrative function. This provision does not apply to the deputy judges except when performing their duties on the court.

"Any doubt on this point is settled by the decision of the court.

ARTICLE 17.

"No member of the court can act as agent, counsel, or advocate in any case of an international nature. This provision only applies to the deputy judges as regards cases in which they are called upon to exercise their functions on the court.

"No member may participate in the decision of any case in which he has previously taken an active part as agent, counsel, or advocate for one of the contesting parties, or as a member of a national or international court, or of a commission of inquiry, or in any other capacity.

"Any doubt on this point is settled by the decision of the court.

ARTICLE 18.

"A member of the court can not be dismissed unless, in the unanimous opinion of the other members, he has ceased to fulfill the required conditions.

"Formal notification thereof shall be made to the secretary general of the League of Nations by the registrar.

"This notification makes the place vacant.

ARTICLE 19.

"The members of the court, when engaged on the business of the court, shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

ARTICLE 20.

"Every member of the court shall, before taking up his duties, make a solemn declaration in open court that he will exercise his powers impartially and conscientiously.

ARTICLE 21.

"The court shall elect its president and vice president for three years; they may be reelected.

"It shall appoint its registrar.

"The duties of registrar of the court shall not be deemed incompatible with those of secretary general of the permanent court of arbitration.

ARTICLE 22.

"The seat of the court shall be established at The Hague.

"The president and registrar shall reside at the seat of the court.

ARTICLE 23.

"A session of the court shall be held every year.

"Unless otherwise provided by rules of court, this session shall begin on June 15, and shall continue for so long as may be deemed necessary to finish the cases on the list.

"The president may summon an extraordinary session of the court whenever necessary.

ARTICLE 24.

"If for some special reason a member of the court considers that he should not take part in the decision of a particular case he shall so inform the president.

"If the president considers that for some special reason one of the members of the court should not sit on a particular case he shall give him notice accordingly.

"If in any such case the member of the court and the president disagree the matter shall be settled by the decision of the court.

ARTICLE 25.

"The full court sit except when it is expressly provided otherwise.

"If 11 judges can not be present, the number shall be made up by calling on deputy judges to sit.

"If, however, 11 judges are not available a quorum of 9 judges shall suffice to constitute the court.

ARTICLE 26.

"Labor cases, particularly cases referred to in Part XIII (labor) of the treaty of Versailles and the corresponding portions of the other treaties of peace, shall be heard and determined by the court under the following conditions:

"The court will appoint every three years a special chamber of five judges, selected so far as possible with due regard to the provisions of article 9. In addition, two judges shall be selected for the purpose of replacing a judge who finds it impossible to sit. If the parties so demand, cases will be heard and determined by this chamber. In the absence of any such demand, the court will sit with the number of judges provided for in article 25. On all occasions the judges will be assisted by four technical assessors sitting with them, but without the right to vote, and chosen with a view to insuring a just representation of the competing interests.

"If there is a national of one only of the parties sitting as a judge in the chamber referred to in the preceding paragraph, the president will invite one of the other judges to retire in favor of a judge chosen by the other party in accordance with article 31.

"The technical assessors shall be chosen for each particular case, in accordance with rules of procedure under article 30, from a list of 'assessors for labor cases' composed of two persons nominated by each member of the League of Nations, and an equivalent number nominated by the governing body of the labor office. The governing body will nominate, as to one-half, representatives of the workers, and, as to one-half, representatives of employers, from the list referred to in article 412 of the treaty of Versailles and the corresponding articles of the other treaties of peace.

"In labor cases the international labor office shall be at liberty to furnish the court with all relevant information, and for this purpose the director of that office shall receive copies of all the written proceedings.

ARTICLE 27.

"Cases relating to transit and communications, particularly cases referred to in part 12 (ports, waterways, and railways) of the treaty of Versailles and the corresponding portions of the other treaties of peace shall be heard and determined by the court under the following conditions:

"The court will appoint every three years a special chamber of five judges, selected so far as possible with due regard to the provisions of article 9. In addition two judges shall be selected for the purpose of replacing a judge who finds it impossible to sit. If the parties so demand, cases will be heard and determined by this chamber. In the absence of any such demand the court will sit with the number of judges provided for in article 25. When desired by the parties or decided by the court, the judges will be assisted by four technical assessors sitting with them, but without the right to vote.

"If there is a national of one only of the parties sitting as a judge in the chamber referred to in the preceding paragraph, the president will invite one of the other judges to retire in favor of a judge chosen by the other party in accordance with article 31.

"The technical assessors shall be chosen for each particular case in accordance with rules of procedure under article 30 from a list of 'Assessors for transit and communications cases,' composed of two persons nominated by each member of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 28.

"The special chambers provided for in articles 26 and 27 may, with the consent of the parties to the dispute, sit elsewhere than at The Hague.

ARTICLE 29.

"With a view to the speedy dispatch of business, the court shall form annually a chamber composed of three judges, who, at the request of the contesting parties, may hear and determine cases by summary procedure.

ARTICLE 30.

"The court shall frame rules for regulating its procedure. In particular, it shall lay down rules for summary procedure.

ARTICLE 31.

"Judges of the nationality of each contesting party shall retain their right to sit in the case before the court.

"If the court includes upon the bench a judge of the nationality of one of the parties only, the other party may select from among the deputy judges a judge of its nationality, if there be one. If there should not be one, the party may choose a judge, preferably from among those persons who have been nominated as candidates as provided in articles 4 and 5.

"If the court includes upon the bench no judges of the nationality of the contesting parties, each of these may proceed to select or choose a judge as provided in the preceding paragraph.

"Should there be several parties in the same interest, they shall, for the purpose of the preceding provisions, be reckoned as one party only. Any doubt upon this point is settled by the decision of the court.

"Judges selected or chosen as laid down in paragraphs 2 and 3 of this article shall fulfill the conditions required by articles 2, 16, 17, 20, 24 of this statute. They shall take part in the decision on an equal footing with their colleagues.

ARTICLE 32.

"The judges shall receive an annual indemnity to be determined by the assembly of the League of Nations upon the proposal of the council. This indemnity must not be decreased during the period of a judge's appointment.

"The president shall receive a special grant for his period of office, to be fixed in the same way.

"The vice president, judges, and deputy judges shall receive a grant for the actual performance of their duties, to be fixed in the same way.

ARTICLE 33.

"The expenses of the court shall be borne by the League of Nations in such a manner as shall be decided by the assembly upon the proposal of the council.

CHAPTER II.—COMPETENCE OF THE COURT.

ARTICLE 34.

"Only States or Members of the League of Nations can be parties in cases before the court.

ARTICLE 35.

"The court shall be open to the members of the league and also to States mentioned in the annex to the covenant.

"The conditions under which the court shall be open to other States shall, subject to the special provisions contained in treaties in force, be laid down by the council, but in no case shall such provisions place the parties in a position of inequality before the court.

"When a State which is not a member of the League of Nations is a party to a dispute, the court will fix the amount which that party is to contribute toward the expenses of the court.

ARTICLE 36.

"The jurisdiction of the court comprises all cases which the parties refer to it and all matters specially provided for in treaties and conventions in force.

"The members of the League of Nations and the States mentioned in the annex of the covenant may, either when signing or ratifying the protocol to which the present statute is adjoined or at a later moment, declare that they recognize as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement in relation to any other member or State accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the court in all or any of the classes of legal disputes concerning—

"(a) The interpretation of a treaty.

"(b) Any question of international law.

"(c) The existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of an international obligation.

"(d) The nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation.

"The declaration referred to above may be made unconditionally or on condition of reciprocity on the part of several or certain members or States or for a certain time.

"In the event of a dispute as to whether the court has jurisdiction the matter shall be settled by the decision of the court.

ARTICLE 37.

"When a treaty or convention in force provides for the reference of a matter to a tribunal to be instituted by the League of Nations the court will be such tribunal.

ARTICLE 38.

"The court shall apply—

"1. International conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting States;

"2. International custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law.

"3. The general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

"4. Subject to the provisions of article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

"This provision shall not prejudice the power of the court to decide a case ex aequo et bono, if the parties agree thereto.

CHAPTER III.—PROCEDURE.

ARTICLE 39.

"The official languages of the court shall be French and English. If the parties agree that the case shall be conducted in French, the judgment will be delivered in French. If the parties agree that the case shall be conducted in English, the judgment will be delivered in English.

"In the absence of an agreement as to which language shall be employed, each party may, in the pleadings, use the language which it prefers. The decision of the court will be given in French and English. In this case the court will at the same time determine which of the two texts shall be considered as authoritative.

"The court may, at the request of the parties, authorize a language other than French or English to be used.

ARTICLE 40.

"Cases are brought before the court, as the case may be, either by the notification of the special agreement or by a written application addressed to the registrar. In either case the subject of the dispute and the contesting parties must be indicated.

"The registrar shall forthwith communicate the application to all concerned.

"He shall also notify the members of the League of Nations through the secretary general.

ARTICLE 41.

"The court shall have the power to indicate, if it considers that circumstances so require, any provisional measures which ought to be taken to reserve the respective rights of either party.

"Pending the final decision, notice of the measures suggested shall forthwith be given to the parties and the council.

ARTICLE 42.

"The parties shall be represented by agents.

"They may have the assistance of counsel or advocates before the court.

ARTICLE 43.

"The procedure shall consist of two parts—written and oral.

"The written proceedings shall consist of the communication to the judges and to the parties of cases, countercases, and, if necessary, replies; also all papers and documents in support.

"These communications shall be made through the registrar in the order and within the time fixed by the court.

"A certified copy of every document produced by one party shall be communicated to the other party.

"The oral proceedings shall consist of the hearing by the court of witnesses, experts, agents, counsel, and advocates.

ARTICLE 44.

"For the service of all notices upon persons other than the agents, counsel, and advocates the court shall apply direct to the government of the State upon whose territory the notice has to be served.

"The same provision shall apply whenever steps are to be taken to procure evidence on the spot.

ARTICLE 45.

"The hearing shall be under the control of the president or, in his absence, of the vice president; if both are absent, the senior judge shall preside.

ARTICLE 46.

"The hearing in court shall be public, unless the court shall decide otherwise, or unless the parties demand that the public be not admitted.

ARTICLE 47.

"Minutes shall be made at each hearing, and signed by the registrar and the president.

"These minutes shall be the only authentic record.

ARTICLE 48.

"The court shall make orders for the conduct of the case, shall decide the form and time in which each party must conclude its argument, and make all arrangements connected with the taking of evidence.

ARTICLE 49.

"The court may, even before the hearing begins, call upon the agents to produce any document, or to supply any explanations. Formal note shall be taken of any refusal.

ARTICLE 50.

"The court may at any time intrust any individual, body, bureau, commission, or other organization that it may select with the task of carrying out an inquiry or giving an expert opinion.

ARTICLE 51.

"During the hearing any relevant questions are to be put to the witnesses and experts under the conditions laid down by the court in the rules of procedure referred to in article 30.

ARTICLE 52.

"After the court has received the proofs and evidence within the time specified for the purpose it may refuse to accept any further oral or written evidence that one party may desire to present unless the other side consents.

ARTICLE 53.

"Whenever one of the parties shall not appear before the court or shall fail to defend his case the other party may call upon the court to decide in favor of his claim.

"The court must before doing so satisfy itself not only that it has jurisdiction in accordance with articles 36 and 37, but also that the claim is well founded in fact and law.

ARTICLE 54.

"When, subject to the control of the court, the agents, advocates, and counsel have completed their presentation of the case the president shall declare the hearing closed.

"The court shall withdraw to consider the judgment.

"The deliberations of the court shall take place in private and remain secret.

ARTICLE 55.

"All questions shall be decided by a majority of the judges present at the hearing.

"In the event of an equality of votes, the president or his deputy shall have a casting vote.

ARTICLE 56.

"The judgment shall state the reasons on which it is based.

"It shall contain the names of the judges who have taken part in the decision.

ARTICLE 57.

"If the judgment does not represent in whole or in part the unanimous opinion of the judges, dissenting judges are entitled to deliver a separate opinion.

ARTICLE 58.

"The judgment shall be signed by the president and by the registrar. It shall be read in open court, due notice having been given to the agents.

ARTICLE 59.

"The decision of the court has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case.

ARTICLE 60.

"The judgment is final and without appeal. In the event of dispute as to the meaning or scope of the judgment, the court shall construe it upon the request of any party.

ARTICLE 61.

"An application for revision of a judgment can be made only when it is based upon the discovery of some fact of such a nature as to be a decisive factor, which fact was, when the judgment was given, unknown to the court and also to the party claiming revision, always provided that such ignorance was not due to negligence.

"The proceedings for revision will be opened by a judgment of the court expressly recording the existence of the new fact, recognizing that it has such a character as to lay the case open to revision, and declaring the application admissible on this ground.

"The court may require previous compliance with the terms of the judgment before it admits proceedings in revision.

"The application for revision must be made at latest within six months of the discovery of the new fact.

"No application for revision may be made after the lapse of 10 years from the date of the sentence.

ARTICLE 62.

"Should a State consider that it has an interest of a legal nature which may be affected by the decision in the case, it may submit a request to the court to be permitted to intervene as a third party.

"It will be for the court to decide upon this request.

ARTICLE 63.

"Whenever the construction of a convention to which States other than those concerned in the case are parties is in question, the registrar shall notify all such States forthwith.

"Every State so notified has the right to intervene in the proceedings; but if it uses this right, the construction given by the judgment will be equally binding upon it.

ARTICLE 64.

"Unless otherwise decided by the court, each party shall bear its own costs."

TEMPORARY MIXED COMMISSION FOR REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

The league's official journal shows that the third session of the temporary mixed commission for reduction of armaments was held at Paris from February 20 to 23, 1921.

A resolution was adopted submitting to the council a list from which it was to choose the countries to which the six new seats on the commission would be allotted.

It was also resolved that each government be asked to furnish a statement of its requirements as to national security, international obligations, geographical situation, and its special circumstances, and to indicate the police and military forces considered essential for the preservation of domestic order, and the expenditure thereby entailed.

It was further resolved that under present circumstances one of the best means of securing control over the private manufacture of arms and munitions of war was the ratification of the arms traffic convention; that the council was accordingly requested to draw the attention of the governments signatories of the treaty of St. Germain, whether league members or not, to the urgent need of ratification; that the league secretariat was requested to ask those governments instructed by the council to approach the Government of the United States on the occasion of the Washington conference as to the results of their inquiries relating to the ratification of the treaty of St. Germain; that the delegates of the temporary mixed commission who took part in the Washington conference be asked to furnish the commission with a report on the question, even from the standpoint of the manufacture of arms and munitions; that it was essential that the preliminary work in connection with the convocation of a general conference on the private manufacture of arms and munitions should be continued; that the secretariat be requested to continue its examination of the points already mentioned in the report of the temporary mixed commission of September, 1921, and be instructed to collect statistics bearing on private manufacture of arms and munitions, especially as to number of workmen employed in war industries and amount of material produced, comparing, wherever possible, pre-war data with post-war data.

A resolution was adopted requesting the permanent advisory commission on military, naval, and air questions and the legal section of the league to study questions of technical and legal character relating to definition of war material and to the private manufacture of armaments and to communicate results of such studies to the temporary mixed commission.

It was resolved that in view of the agreements as to the use of poisonous gases reached at the Washington conference the commission considered that the examination of this question, which was bound up with the general question of the laws of war, had best be undertaken only after the full details of the Washington agreement had been received and circulated.

The secretariat was requested to expedite as much as possible the work of the statistical inquiry relating to examination of official and public documents so that the commission might be able to meet on July 15, 1922, and hold a discussion with a view to laying down the main lines of a scheme for the reduction of armaments.

The council was requested to ask the governments to send in before July 1, 1922, the statement referred to in the report of the third committee of the second assembly.

ARMS TRAFFIC CONVENTION.

The official journal shows that on February 22, 1922, the Norwegian Government replied to the council's inquiry of November 21, 1921, regarding the arms traffic convention, that while it fully appreciated the high principles embodied in the convention it was of opinion that it ought to postpone any decision regarding adherence until the convention had been ratified by a larger number of signatory powers.

FINAL REPORT OF SAAR BASIN FRONTIER DELIMITATION CONVENTION.

The league's official journal shows that on January 21, 1922, the Saar Basin frontier delimitation commission appointed by the council at its first session made a final report to the council and would be dissolved on January 31, 1922.

ALBANIA.

The official journal shows that on February 15, 1922, the commission of inquiry on Albania filed its report with the league secretariat.

RUSSIAN REFUGEES.

The league's official journal for April, 1922, contains a general report on the work accomplished for Russian refugees to March 15, 1922, by Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, high commissioner of the league for such refugees. The report stated there were about a million and a half Russian refugees in Europe; that not all of them by any means were in need of assistance from governments or charitable organizations; that a vast proportion of them, with admirable adaptability and courage, had found employment; that a large number had resources of their own, but that the number for whom intergovernmental action was necessary with a view to securing employment was still very large; that the vast majority had suffered and were suffering in many ways as a result of their enforced departure from their own country.

The report set out that the high commissioner had not been given financial resources for his work by the governments; that if he had been allotted a small part of the sums spent in the past 18 months by governments and by voluntary associations in feeding the refugees and without a solution of the refugee problem, he could have established productive employment for a great proportion of refugees requiring it; that the results obtained by voluntary employment bureaus and by labor exchanges in the Serb-Croat-Slovene State confirmed him in this view; that nevertheless the League of Nations had already accomplished something of real importance; that it had secured some intergovernmental action; that it had laid the foundation for further and more extensive work; that in various ways the condition of the refugees had been improved by the mere fact that the council of the league had been acting on their behalf. The task of the high commissioner had been made extremely difficult by the general economic crisis in Europe. He appealed to the governments for support in connection with proposals he would shortly make concerning the legal status of the refugees, free visas for passports, transit and transport facilities, acceptance and maintenance of Russian students, acceptance of agriculturists, establishment and operation of employment bureaus.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN AFRICA.

According to the league's official journal, the Belgian Government on February 11, 1922, announced its compliance with the league's request of January 11, 1922, to continue at Brussels the work performed by the International Bureau for the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic and to take charge of the duties relating to the control of the liquor traffic in Africa as defined in the convention of September 10, 1919.

PERMANENT LABOR ORGANIZATION.

The league's official journal contains a statement, dated February 14, 1922, to the effect that Bulgaria had communicated to the secretary general its formal ratification of the following labor conventions adopted by the International Labor Conference at Washington, held October 29 to November 29, 1919: (1) Convention limiting hours of work in industrial undertakings to 8 in the day and 48 in the week (already ratified by Greece, Rumania, India, and Czechoslovakia); (2) convention concerning employment of women before and after childbirth (already ratified by Greece and Rumania); (3) convention concerning employment of women during the night (already ratified by Greece, Rumania, British Empire, India, Czechoslovakia, and South African Union); (4) convention fixing minimum age for admission of children to industrial employment (already ratified by Greece, Rumania, Great Britain, and Czechoslovakia); (5) convention concerning night work of young persons employed in industry (already ratified by Greece, Rumania, Great Britain, and India); (6) convention concerning employment (already ratified by Greece, Rumania, Great Britain, India, Sweden, and Denmark, not including Greenland and Finland).

SEVENTEENTH SESSION OF THE COUNCIL, HELD AT PARIS MARCH 24–28, 1922.

The seventeenth session of the council of the League of Nations was held at Paris from March 24 to March 28, 1922, the member countries being represented as follows: Belgium, Mr. Paul Hymans (president); Brazil, Mr. de Castello Branco Clark; China, Mr. Wellington Koo; British Empire, Mr. H. A. L. Fisher; France, Mr. Leon Bourgeois; Italy, Marquis Imperiali; Japan, Viscount Ishii; Spain, Mr. Quinones de Leon.

RUSSIAN REFUGEES.

The council, after debating on March 24 and 25 the proposals of Doctor Nansen, alluded to in his report of March 15, embodied in the special report of March 18, as well as the report of Sir Samuel Hoare on the subject of Russian refugees, decided on March 25 to submit the recommendations for funds in these reports to the various governments, and also the suggestions therein for modification of regulations as to emigration and identification, for transport and transit facilities, means of subsistence, etc.

REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

On March 25 the council also considered the work of the temporary mixed commission on reduction of armaments. Pursuant to the commission's proposal the council instructed its president to ask each Government to furnish a statement as to the requirements of its national security, its international obligations, its geographical situation, and special circumstances, and to indicate the police and military forces it considered essential to the preservation of domestic order and the expenditure thereby entailed. The council took note of the other recommendations and resolutions of the temporary mixed commission, and decided to ask the temporary commission to meet in a short time so as to submit a report to the council before the next assembly.

The secretary general presented a memorandum on resolutions 5, 7, and 10 on the reduction of armaments adopted with others by the assembly on October 1, 1921. The memorandum stated that resolution 5 was to the effect that all members of the league and interested States not members be invited by the council to take part in an international conference on the private manufacture of arms and the trade in arms, to be held as soon as possible, it being highly desirable that the date be prior to the next assembly; that the temporary mixed commission be intrusted with the preparation of a program and a draft convention for the conference. The memorandum suggested that since the temporary mixed commission was already examining the question of private manufacture, and since the conference could not be had until this examination was concluded, it seemed that no action should be taken by the council for the time being.

The memorandum then noted that resolution 7 was to the effect that the assembly, taking note of the view in the report of the temporary mixed commission as to provision for excluding import of arms and munitions in time of peace from countries in which the traffic was uncontrolled, invited the council to prepare a draft and protocol for this purpose for the consideration of the Governments, expressing at the same time the hope that this procedure would not in any way delay the general ratification of the convention of St. Germain—and to the further effect that the steps that might eventually have to be taken for the destruction of the surplus stock of munitions might be considered by the temporary mixed commission.

The memorandum then presented the comment that the question dealt with in the first part of this resolution was closely connected with that of the St. Germain convention, which the temporary mixed commission intended to examine at its next session, when it would be known what action was taken at Washington; that the council might therefore see fit to authorize the temporary mixed commission to consider the first paragraph, asking, if necessary, the cooperation of the permanent armaments commission; and that the permanent commission, on account of the technical character of the subject, might be asked, in the first instance, to examine the question referred to in the second paragraph, that of the destruction of surplus stocks of munitions.

The memorandum then quoted resolution 10, which was to the effect that it was desirable that propaganda in favor of the reduction of armaments, as contemplated in the covenant, should be carried out with earnestness and conviction among all nations.

The memorandum stated that it was not intended by this resolution to impose on the league itself the duty of taking the initiative in organizing general propaganda for the reduction of armaments; that the report of the assembly's committee on disarmament had stated that a policy of disarmament to be successful required the support of the population of the world; that delimitation of armaments would never be imposed by governments on peoples, but by peoples on governments; that earnest and vigorous propaganda should be carried on in all countries to show peoples the urgent necessity for the reduction of armaments, as provided for in article 8 of the covenant; that the various delegates to the assembly should preach this doctrine in their respective countries; that only through an instructed public opinion in each country could the necessary strength of world opinion be obtained.

The memorandum contained the comment that it did not seem that the assembly intended that the league itself should conduct this propaganda, and that the assembly had voted no credits for such an object; that the council might, under these circumstances, refer the examination of this question, with the observations of the memorandum, to the temporary mixed commission.

The council approved the memorandum as to resolutions 5 and 7 and decided merely to communicate resolution 10 to the temporary mixed commission, with the understanding that no action was necessary. It was the thought of the council that members of council and assembly should carry out propaganda for arms reduction on their own initiative in their respective countries.

HEALTH CONFERENCE AT WARSAW.

The council decided on March 26 to ask its president to send to the president of the Genoa conference the conclusions of the health conference at Warsaw, which would not end until March 28.

RUSSIAN FAMINE—TELEGRAM FROM NORWEGIAN GOVERNMENT.

The president of the council read a telegram from the Norwegian Government asking the council to consider the condition of the famine-stricken population in Russia and to appoint a committee of inquiry. A letter and memorandum on the subject referred to in the telegram had not yet arrived. In the absence of these the council decided it could not know the exact wishes of the Norwegian Government and could not therefore take up the question at the time. The Norwegian Government was so notified.

SAAR BASIN GOVERNING COMMISSION.

The council approved on March 26 the establishment by the Saar Basin governing commission of an advisory council and technical committee and a resolution that the commission be assured a tenure of office at least until 1925 in order to give it greater strength and stability.

SAAR BASIN PLEBISCITE.

The council decided on the same day to appoint a rapporteur to propose measures for preservation of information in connection with the drawing up of lists of persons who would have the right to vote when the plebiscite in the Saar territory should occur, and chose Mr. Wellington Koo as such rapporteur.

GERMAN MINORITIES IN POLAND.

The council's committee on German minorities in Poland reported to the council on March 28 that on January 14, 1922, it had examined certain petitions from the Germanic league in Poland; that it had also examined the observations of the Polish Government on one of the questions raised in said petitions, that of the threatened expulsion of several German colonists from their farms; that the committee thought the Polish Government should postpone all measures of expulsion until October 1, 1922, to give the council time to examine the questions involved. The report was adopted by the council, the Polish representative stating that his Government had already postponed action and that he would do all he could to secure further postponement.

GENOA CONFERENCE.

On March 28 a communication from the Italian Government was laid before the council, urging that it send to the Genoa conference representatives of the technical organizations of the league for transit, for economical, and financial questions to aid the conference in working out such matters, and the council decided to grant the request.

HEALTH CONFERENCE AT WARSAW.

The health conference which had been convened by the Polish Government at Warsaw under the auspices of the league, and at which were represented most European Governments, including these three—Germany, Russia, and Ukrania—notified the council that during 1919 and 1920 about twenty million cases of epidemic disease had occurred in Russia and eastern Europe; that the situation had grown worse to such extent that the future of these countries was endangered; that the technical organizations of the league had been intrusted with the execution of all resolutions passed by the conference. The council, after receiving this information, decided to authorize its president to lay the recommendations of the conference before the Genoa conference.

GENOA CONFERENCE.

Mr. Leon Bourgeois, representative of France, called the attention of the council to the declaration of his Government that the League of Nations should, provided the Geneva conference was agreeable, be intrusted with the application and execution of the recommendations of that conference relative to matters within the sphere of the powers conferred on the league by the covenant.

ADJOURNMENTS.

On completion of business, on March 28, 1922, the seventeenth session of the council adjourned.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATIONS FOR PROMOTION OF LEAGUE.

The league's official journal contains resolutions of a number of national associations formed to promote the league and league ideals, as well as the international association formed by these national bodies, expressing the hope that the Genoa conference would proceed in full recognition of the league's identity and function.

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

On March 14, 1922, Austria accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the permanent court of international justice.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS—GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, SWEDEN.

The official journal of the league shows receipt of a letter from the British Government, dated March 21, 1922, stating that it had received and considered the secretary general's letter of January 17, calling attention by direction of the council of the league to the recommendation of the second assembly on October 1, 1921, on the subject of limitation by members of the league of expenditure on naval, military, and air forces during the next two fiscal years; that the further economies foreshadowed in the letter of the British Government, dated June 2, 1921, in response to a similar recommendation of the first assembly had proved capable of realization, and that the forthcoming estimates of armament expenditure would demonstrate considerable reductions in all directions during the succeeding financial year; that, as pointed out in the letter of June 2, 1921, the policy of the British Government on the question would be liable to reconsideration if the recommendation of the second assembly should not be adopted by other powers.

The French Government replied in a letter dated March 22, 1922, that while, for reasons given in its letter of April 20, 1921, it could not assume the obligation requested in the league's letter on armament, an obligation for which its representation in the assembly did not vote, still in compliance with the promise it gave in 1921 the French Government had endeavored to reduce its armaments as far as consistent with its international obligations and its international security; that the credits granted its war department had been reduced from six milliards of francs in 1920 to five billion four hundred millions in 1921 and four billion five hundred million in 1922—that is, by 25 per cent—that naval estimates had been reduced from nine hundred and fifty-two million in 1921 to seven hundred and ninety-seven million in 1922.

The Swedish Government replied in a letter dated March 20, 1922, that the future organization of the national defense of Sweden, mentioned in its prior letter of August 19, 1921, had not yet been completed; that military burdens, however, had been provisionally lightened to such an extent that a large proportion of possible reductions had already been carried into effect; that the Swedish Government was now in position to limit military expenditure in the spirit of the assembly's recommendation.

RESTORATION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE KINGDOM AND ALBANIA.

The secretary general received a letter dated March 27, 1922, from the Government of the Serb-Croat-Slovene kingdom stating that it had received the communication of the secretary general dated January 19 last, relating to request of Albania for the good offices of the league with a view to reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Albania and the Serb-Croat-Slovene kingdom, and stating further that the latter had reorganized de jure the Albanian Government and had appointed a diplomatic representative to Albania.

LITHUANIA AND POLAND.

On February 6, 1922, the president of the council wrote the Government of Lithuania expressing regret that it had been unable to accept the council's recommendation for the substitution of the neutral zone by a provisional line of demarcation, territorial rights in no way to be prejudiced; that he hoped that until Lithuania was prepared to establish diplomatic relations with Poland it would accept the council's suggestion that its interest be confided to a friendly power; that the Lithuanian representative had stated to the council on January 14 that he was prepared to transmit to the council the legislation adopted by Lithuania for protection of religious and racial minorities.

In reply the Lithuanian Government stated that under the circumstances it felt compelled to make resumption of both direct and indirect diplomatic and consular relations with Poland depend on previous reestablishment of the status quo created by the conference of Suwalki of October 7, 1920, and on remedying the consequences following its violation by the Polish General Zeligowski.

LITHUANIA'S PROTEST AGAINST POLISH ANNEXATION OF VILNA.

On April 8, 1922, the Lithuanian Government telegraphed the president of the council stating that in its note of December 14, 1921, it had protested against the organization by the Polish Government of the illegal elections in the district of Vilna; that on March 24, 1922, the Diet of Warsaw, basing its action on a resolution passed by the body established as a result of these elections, had voted the annexation of Vilna to Poland; that the Lithuanian Government desired to protest against this action by the Polish Government which, after disclaiming Zeligowski and declaring him a rebel, proceeded to profit by the results of his high-handed action and his violation of international engagements; that the Lithuanian Government would not recognize this annexation of Lithuanian territory.

ADVISORY AND TECHNICAL COMMITTEE ON COMMUNICATIONS AND TRANSIT.

The league's official journal contains the resolutions adopted by the advisory and technical committee on communications and transit at its second session which was held at Geneva from March 29 to April 1, 1922, resolutions dealing among other things with traveling facilities for the blind, tonnage measurement for inland navigation, tonnage measurement for ocean-going shipping, private law in inland navigation, passports and traveling facilities in general.

The committee decided to ask the governments not signatories of the Barcelona convention whether they intended to sign, and to draw the attention of signatory governments to the expediency of hastening as far as possible the procedure of ratification.

COMMUNICATION FROM UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT RELATING TO TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

On March 8, 1922, the Secretary of State of the United States addressed a letter to the secretary general stating that he had received the communication dated January 23, 1922, in which, in pursuance of article 10 of the convention, and in accordance with the decision of the council of the League of Nations in conformity therewith, the secretary general of the League of Nations transmitted to the Government of the United States, as a State not a member of the League of Nations, a certified copy of the convention concerning the traffic in women and children opened for signature at Geneva on September 30, 1921, and inviting the United States Government to sign the convention before April 1, 1922, or thereafter to accede to it.

The Secretary of State of the United States then called attention to article 1 of the convention providing that the high contracting parties agree that in the event of their not being already parties to the agreement of May 18, 1904, and the convention of May 4, 1910, they would transmit with as little delay as possible their ratification of or adhesion to those instruments, stating that the Government of the United States was already a party to the agreement of May 18, 1904; that as to the convention of May 4, 1910, it contained, as the secretary general was informed through the American consul at Geneva the past June, projects which it was thought pertained under the Constitution of the United States to the police functions of the several States of the Union and which the Federal Government would not be capable of fulfilling; that for this reason the United States Government felt compelled to withhold its adherence to the convention of 1910 and its signature to the confirmatory convention now open at Geneva; that the Secretary of State would not wish it understood, however, that the United States Government was not in full sympathy with the laudable purpose of the convention; that on the contrary the suppression of the nefarious traffic in women and children was a matter in which that Government was greatly interested, and that to this end Federal statutes had been enacted which were within the purview of congressional action.

SAAR BASIN GOVERNING COMMISSION.

On April 8, 1922, the Saar Basin governing commission transmitted to the secretary general its eleventh periodical report, covering January–March, 1922. After covering questions relating to the economic and political situation, administrative activity, finance and food supply, railways, post, telegraphs and telephones, education, justice and public worship, commerce, industry and labor, social insurance, agriculture, and public relief, the report concludes by stating that the commission was endeavoring to give the population a more direct part in public affairs; that an election would be held in the next three months for the members of the advisory council, and that the members of the technical committee would soon be appointed; that without losing any of its rights or shirking any of its responsibilities under the treaty of Versailles, the governing commission would then be able to appeal for that cooperation of the inhabitants which it declared necessary in its preceding report and which could not fail to help the Saar territory; that at a time when a new period in the administration of the Saar territory was beginning the council's decisions of March 26 had offered the best possible encouragement and support to the commission.

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

On April 6, 1922, Finland ratified the statute of the permanent court of international justice and accepted compulsory jurisdiction.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

On March 21, 1922, the South African Government replied to the assembly's second armament recommendation, to the effect that, owing to prevalent financial depression, it would make reductions of a third in defense expenditure for the financial year 1922–23, as compared with the previous 12 months, and probably the same reduction for the year ending March 31, 1924; that owing to the transfer of Cape military defense from the Imperial Government to the Government of the Union of South Africa, it might be expedient to make certain additional expenditures to cover service theretofore performed without charge by the Imperial Government, but the increase would not be large.

Latvia replied on April 29, 1922, that it was wholly in sympathy with the assembly's recommendations and was making every effort to bring about a gradual reduction of its military outlay, which, in 1920, amounted to 27 per cent of the total State expenditure, in 1921, 16 per cent, and in 1922, 14 per cent.

The Netherlands replied on April 11, 1922, stating that it had forwarded certain information concerning limitation of its armament expenditure in its note of May 17, 1921, and now transmitted a copy of its military law of February 4, 1922.

PROTECTION OF MINORITIES IN LATVIA AND ESTHONIA.

In March and April, 1922, respectively, Latvia and Esthonia submitted a summary of the legal status of minorities within their borders.

ECONOMIC WEAPON.

On May 5, 1922, Austria, Bulgaria, Italy, Siam, and Sweden had replied to the council's letter, asking members of the league for certain information and for observations on the proposals of the second assembly regarding the economic weapon of the league, in order that the council might be in position to settle the details of its own action, and asking also that replies be made by May 1, 1922.

EIGHTEENTH SESSION OF THE COUNCIL HELD AT GENEVA FROM MAY 11 TO MAY 17, 1922.

The eighteenth session of the council was held at Geneva from Thursday, May 11, to Wednesday, May 17, 1922, the member nations being represented as follows: Spain, Mr. Quinones de Leon (president); Belgium, Mr. Paul Hymans; Brazil, Mr. de Castello Branco Clark; China, Mr. Tang Tsai-Fow; British Empire, Lord Balfour; France, Mr. Leon Bourgeois; Italy, Marquis Imperiali; Japan, Mr. Adatci.

FIRST MEETING (PRIVATE).

QUESTION OF PLACING BRITISH MANDATE FOR PALESTINE ON AGENDA.

Lord Balfour on May 11 asked that the question of the British mandate for Palestine be placed on the agenda for the present session, saying that the council's rules of procedure allowed addition of fresh questions by majority vote. He expressed the hope that the council would approve the British mandate for Palestine at the present session. He said that the mandate had been under discussion a long time by the governments concerned; that the members of the council had agreed, but that the United States had intervened and asked to be consulted; that there had been a discussion between the British Government and the United States, which was not yet over; that they were still discussing the British mandate for Mesopotamia; but that the United States Government had given its cordial assent to the mandate for Palestine, with the sole reservation that should Great Britain cease to be the mandatory power for Palestine the United States Government should be free to return to the system of capitulations in force before the mandate was granted. He urged that the council approve the terms of the mandate, inasmuch as the United States had made no further objection, saying that such approval would have an excellent effect, rendering easier the task of administration. So long as the question of the mandate remained unsettled, unrest would prevail in Palestine. He said also that he had anticipated no difficulty on the part of his colleagues on the council until the Marquis Imperiali told him shortly before the council met that the Italian Government made certain reservations.

Mr. Leon Bourgeois stated that he desired to think the matter over before giving an opinion as to the question of placing the mandate on the agenda.

The Marques Imperiali said he was led to make plain what had occurred between him and Lord Balfour; that the Italian Government had always held that mandates deriving their origin from the treaty of Sevres could not be approved so long as the question of the revision of that treaty was pending; that this principle had been adopted by the second assembly; that under these conditions the Italian Government was awaiting opportunity to present, as it had a right to do, certain observations on some points in the terms of the mandates; that only during the previous week had his Government been informed of the intention of the British Government to ask for the council's approval of the Palestine mandate at the present session; that the time required, therefore, for a preliminary exchange of views on these points had not been available, the Italian Government being ready to discuss them at once and in a most friendly spirit; that it seemed impossible to him for the council to decide the matter at the present session.

Lord Balfour suggested that the Italian Government might be consulted at once, and that if it did not raise an objection that could not be met, the council might reach a decision before the present session ended.

Mr. Bourgeois pointed out that the question of the Palestine mandate raised the whole question of mandates, that the council would have to consider the problem as a whole, and his suggestion that the question of placing the matter on the agenda for the present session be postponed until Saturday, May 13, was adopted by the council.

ATTENDANCE OF DIRECTOR OF INTERNATIONAL LABOR OFFICE.

The council decided to allow Mr. Albert Thomas, director of the international labor office, to attend in an advisory capacity meetings at which questions of interest to that office were to be discussed.

ATTENDANCE OF REPRESENTATIVE OF PERMANENT COURT.

The council decided that whenever advisable during the present session Mr. Hammarskjöld, registrar of the permanent court of international justice, would be heard on questions concerning the court.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

The council approved the president's decision fixing June 28 as the opening date of the first session of the advisory committee on traffic in women and children.

INFORMATION BUREAU FOR LEAGUE IN LATIN AMERICA.

The report of the mission authorized by the assembly to visit Latin America and investigate the advisability of establishing an information bureau of the secretariat in Latin America was presented. Its conclusion was that such a bureau was not needed at the present time.

CONTRIBUTION OF SALVADOR TO THE LEAGUE'S EXPENSES.

It was decided to place the question of the contribution of Salvador to the league's expenses on the agenda of the third assembly.

EXPENSES OF PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

A memorandum of the secretary general on the subject of the expenses of the permanent court of international justice was presented to the council and approved.

The memorandum quoted article 33 of the court statute, which provides that the expenses of the court shall be borne by the League of Nations in such manner as shall be decided by the assembly on the proposal of the council. The memorandum pointed out that the council should soon formulate a proposal on this subject. It would be of great help, the memorandum contended, in guiding the secretary general in drawing up for submission to the commission of control and the council the provisional budget for 1923. As no new system of allocating league expense, other than that of the Universal Postal Union, had yet been ratified, and as the new system, approved by a majority of the assembly, should it be adopted, could only be of temporary character, and would have to be replaced within a limit of not more than two years, when the committee on allocation of expenses had made a final report, the secretary general proposed that it be suggested to the assembly that the court expenses should for the present be incorporated in the general league budget and paid out of the ordinary league funds.

The budget for 1922, approved by the assembly, had provided the sum of 1,500,000 gold francs for court expenses.

PERMANENT COURT COSTS.

It was decided to ask the permanent court whether a moderate tariff of court charges should not be established on the basis of charges prevalent in various countries.

RANK AND TITLE OF JUDGES OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

In reply to a memorandum by the president of the permanent court of international justice on the question of the rank and title of the judges thereof the council directed the secretary general to advise the president of the court that theretofore no steps had been taken to determine the diplomatic rank and title of the representatives of the various States at the assembly or on the council, or any of the other organizations of the League of Nations. It had been thought sufficient to give them their official title such as "the delegate of such-and-such State to the assembly," "representative on the council," and so forth. Questions of precedence had been settled in so far as necessary in each particular case. A similar course was suggested in relation to the permanent court.

WORK OF CALONDER, HODAC, AND HEROLD IN NEGOTIATIONS ON UPPER SIBERIA.

The council decided to send a letter to Mr. Calonder thanking him for his successful work for the league in connection with the upper Siberian negotiations, and to award him a grant of 15,000 Swiss francs as a token of appreciation. It also decided to thank Mr. Hodac and Mr. Herold, who cooperated with Mr. Calonder, and to award each of them 100 pounds.

FINANCIAL SITUATION OF LEAGUE.

The secretary general requested members of council to urge their Governments to ratify as soon as possible the amendment to article 6 of the covenant giving the assembly the right to fix the proportion of expense to be paid by league members.

INDEMNITY TO WIDOW OF COLONEL SCHAEFFER, MEMBER OF ALBANIAN COMMISSION.

The council authorized the secretary general, in consultation with the president of the commission on control, to make a compassionate grant to the widow of Colonel Schaeffer, who died in the service of the league while working on the Albanian commission, if he found on inquiry that she was in necessitous circumstances.

SECOND MEETING (PUBLIC).

ALBANIA.

On May 12 Lord Balfour made a report to the council, presenting the results of the work of the league's commission on inquiry into the Albanian situation. He stated that the Albanian question dated from the end of the Balkan War in 1913; that then for the first time Europe recognized Albania as an independent State; that its frontiers were laid down in general terms and were substantially the same as at the present time; that the World War left the Albanian question in abeyance; that Albania applied to the first assembly for admission to the League of Nations and was unanimously admitted.

He said that Albania then appealed to the council of the league for a settlement of the question of her frontiers; that she suffered grave internal conditions, aggravated by the uncertainty as to her frontiers; that the council, while expressing sympathy, indicated that the matter was beyond its jurisdiction, the question of delimiting frontiers belonging to the conference of ambassadors; that all the council could do was to urge the conference of ambassadors to settle the problem speedily; that in September, 1921, the second assembly recommended at the Albanian Government's suggestion that a commission of inquiry be sent by the council to Albania; that the assembly joined the council in urging the conference of ambassadors to reach a decision as soon as possible.

The council, he continued, appointed the commission of inquiry, which started for Albania in November, when alarming news was received. The British Government, fearing an outbreak of real war in that part of Europe, asked for a special session of the council, to which the Albanian Government and the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government should be invited to send representatives. This special session occurred when the conference of ambassadors was making its decision regarding the northern and other frontiers of Albania. The speaker said that these three events—the decision of the conference of ambassadors, the meeting of the council, and the inquiry by the commission—all helped to bring about a peaceful solution.

He asserted that it was certain that the peaceful settlement of this question was very largely due to the machinery of the League of Nations and to the fact that in accordance with the terms of the covenant the council had invited representatives of the States in controversy to sit as members at its meetings and had handled the question in a spirit of friendly cooperation. He said that both Albania and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State had assisted the council in its pacifying work; that all the Serbian troops were withdrawn from the frontier zone in dispute; and that the league's commission of inquiry was able to report to the council that there was once more a state of general tranquillity in Albanian territory. Thus a situation fraught with danger to the peace of Europe had been changed into a condition of understanding and good will.

He congratulated the commission of inquiry on its work. He said that there was no statesman, nation, or organization in the world that could have done what the League of Nations had done in this matter; that the reason of success lay in the fact that Albania and all others concerned had been convinced that the League of Nations, its assembly, its council, and its commission of inquiry were working for wholly unselfish ends; that the advice of the commission had been taken because the commission represented the League of Nations.

Mr. Medhi Bey Frasheri, Albanian representative, expressed pleasure that, thanks to the League of Nations and the allied powers, Albania had been recognized as an independent, neutral, and sovereign State. He stated that the commission of inquiry had done Albania the greatest service in making the true facts known; that several months previously difficulties had arisen on the northern and eastern frontiers of Albania; that, thanks to the work of the commission of inquiry, these difficulties had been settled in a manner satisfactory to both Albania and the Serb-Croat-Slovene Kingdom; that there were still difficulties, however, in southern Albania; that the Albanian Government greatly desired that the council should send a commissioner to that district to keep in touch with the delimitation commission and to settle difficulties that might become dangerous; that the Albanian Government had been advised that bands had been organized on the other side of the frontier and were moving toward villages in the neutral zone; that the presence of the league commissioner would do much to keep the peace.

At Lord Balfour's suggestion the council decided to communicate the reports of the commission of inquiry to all the members of the league, and to deal later with his proposal that the commission of inquiry should be asked to continue its work.

ECONOMIC EXPERTS FOR ALBANIAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Frasheri said that the Albanian Government had decided to select economic advisers to the different ministries and wished the assistance of the league in choosing them. The council decided to take the request under advisement.

MINORITIES IN ALBANIA.

The secretary general presented a memorandum on minorities in Albania, and it was decided that the Brazilian representative should submit a report on the matter at the next session of the council.

MINORITIES IN LITHUANIA.

Stipulations for the protection of minorities in Lithuania were approved by the council and accepted by the Lithuanian representative, who stated that they had all been practically embodied in Lithuanian laws.

NATIONALITY OF INHABITANTS OF B AND C MANDATED AREAS.

The Marquis Theodoli appeared at the council table and presented the report of the subcommittee of the permanent mandates commission on the nationality of inhabitants of B and C mandated areas, receiving the thanks of the council for the report. The council then decided to request the permanent mandates commission to examine this question during its coming session with a view to submitting to the council a suitable solution.

DEPORTATION OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN TURKEY.

The council resolved, pending the appointment of a chief commissioner in Turkey, to authorize the League of Nations commission of inquiry to proceed with the work of reclaiming deported women and children in Turkey.

THIRD MEETING (PUBLIC).

ADMISSION TO PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE OF STATES NOT MEMBERS OF THE LEAGUE NOR MENTIONED IN THE ANNEX TO THE COVENANT.

The Marquis Imperiali on May 12 read a report on the admission to the Permanent Court of International Justice of States not members of the league nor mentioned in the annex to the covenant. It proposed a resolution to the effect that the council, by virtue of the powers conferred upon it by article 35, paragraph 2, of the statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice, decided (1) that the permanent court should be open to a State not a member of the League of Nations or mentioned in the annex to the covenant on condition that such State should previously have deposited with the registrar of the court a declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the court in accordance with the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations and with the terms and subject to the conditions of the statute and rules of procedure of the court, and should undertake to carry out in full in good faith the decision or decisions of the court and not to resort to war against a State complying therewith; (2) that such declaration might be either particular or general, a particular declaration being one accepting the jurisdiction of the court in respect only of a particular dispute or disputes which had already arisen; a general declaration being one accepting the jurisdiction generally in respect of all disputes or of a particular class or classes of disputes which had already arisen or might arise in the future; that a State in making such a general declaration might accept the jurisdiction of the court as compulsory, ipso facto, and without special convention, in conformity with article 36 of the court statute, but such acceptance might not, without special convention, be relied on as, regards members of the League of Nations or States mentioned in the annex to the covenant which had signed or might thereafter sign the optional clause provided for by the additional protocol of December 16, 1920; (3) that the original declarations made under the terms of this resolution should be kept in custody of the registrar of the court, certified copies to be transmitted to all members of the League of Nations and States mentioned in the annex to the covenant and to such other States as the court might determine and to the secretary general of the league; (4) that the council reserved the right to rescind or amend this resolution by a resolution to be communicated to the court, existing declarations on receipt of such communication by the registrar and to the extent determined by the new resolution to cease to be effective except as to disputes already before the court; (5) that all questions as to validity or effect of a declaration made under this resolution should be decided by the court. This report and resolution were adopted by the council, subject to certain amendments to the resolution proposed by Mr. Bourgeois. It was decided that the revised text of the resolution should be submitted to the council at a subsequent meeting.

ALBANIA.

The council took note of a protest from Greece against the statement by the Albanian representative at the previous meeting that Greek bands were being organized and were moving on villages in the neutral zone.

FOURTH MEETING (PRIVATE).

REPAYMENT OF EXPENSES, SWEDISH AND DANISH VILNA CONTINGENTS.

Mr. de Adlercrentz and Mr. de Oldenburg, designated, respectively, by Sweden and Denmark to represent them during the discussion by the council of the repayment of the expenses of the Swedish and Danish Vilna contingents, took their seats at the council table.

Mr. de Adlercrentz recounted the circumstances under which the Swedish Government, at the request of the league, formed a contingent of a hundred volunteers, on November 30, 1920, to form part of an expeditionary force to be sent into the Vilna district. The force was not sent, however, and the contingent was dissolved in March, 1921. His Government was of opinion that out of its total expenditure of 272,073.30 Swedish crowns on these troops it was entitled to repayment of 147,895 crowns, the excess over the normal cost of maintaining the troops in their own country.

Mr. de Oldenburg said that Denmark was in the same general position and claimed repayment on the same basis of 60,583 crowns.

Mr. Bourgeois expressed the gratitude of the council for the support given the league's request by Sweden and Denmark, and said that the question of reimbursement presented a question of moral obligation having a most important bearing on the future of the league. The payment requested by Sweden and Denmark would be regarded as just and equitable by the States whose assistance had been requested. The Vilna expedition was planned, however, for the benefit of Poland and Lithuania, and it would seem that the sums repaid by the league should be debited to the States for whose benefit the council had intervened.

The council decided, in view of the special character of the expenses incurred by Sweden and Denmark, which were quite exceptional as compared with the normal average expenditure of those countries, the sums in question should be repaid by means of the addition of a credit to the draft budget to be sent to all members on June 4, and that the secretary general should take up with the Polish and Lithuanian Governments the repayment of certain sums for which they had already been asked and of the sums under discussion.

QUESTION TO BE SUBMITTED TO PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE INVOLVING COMPETENCE OF INTERNATIONAL LABOR OFFICE AS TO AGRICULTURAL LABOR.

The French Government having asked the council to submit to the permanent court of international justice the question of the competence of the international labor office in the matter of labor conditions of persons employed in agricultural work, the council authorized the secretary-general to present the question to the court, together with documents concerning the matter, to give all necessary assistance in the examination of the question, and to arrange to be represented before the court if necessary, and requested the international labor office to afford the court all the assistance it might require.

APPOINTMENT OF WORKERS' DELEGATE FOR THE NETHERLANDS TO THE THIRD INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE.

In reference to the question of the method of appointing a workers' delegate to the third international labor conference by the Netherlands Government, which the international labor office, the third international labor conference, and that Government agreed should be submitted to the permanent court, the council decided (1) to request the permanent court of international justice, in conformity with article 14 of the League of Nations, to give an advisory opinion on this question; (2) to authorize the secretary-general to present this request to the court, together with the letter from the director of the international labor office and the documents relating to the matter; to give all necessary assistance in the examination of the question and to arrange to be represented before the court if necessary; and (3) to request the international labor office to afford the court all assistance it might require.

FIFTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 13, 1922.

RUSSIAN REFUGEES.

Doctor Nansen, high commissioner of the League for Russian Refugees, made a detailed report covering his work to date. He emphasized the need of a contribution of £30,000, a third of which had already been conditionally promised by Great Britain, and conditioned on which were substantial offers by American relief organizations. Mr. Ringland, of the American Relief Administration, and Major Davis, of the American Red Cross in Constantinople, also addressed the council, indicating what further action from the United States could be expected if the sum desired by Doctor Nansen were provided.

WORK OF PROVISIONAL, ECONOMIC, AND FINANCIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. Leon Bourgeois presented a report on the work of the provisional economic, and financial committee. He said that the economic section at its meeting in Geneva in March, 1922, had been concerned with four main questions—arbitration clauses in private commercial contracts, unification of laws relating to bills of exchange, equitable treatment of commerce arising under article 23 (e) of the covenant, and unfair competition. He stated that the financial section at its meeting in Geneva in February and March, 1922, had considered the question of double taxation, central banks and the institution of an international clearing house, and the recommendations of the council regarding the appointment of technical advisers to be attached to certain governments. The financial section had taken the necessary steps to carry out the recommendation of the second assembly that the governments be urged to reply to inquiries as to measures they had taken to insure the application of the principles laid down by the Brussels conference. It had continued the work undertaken by the league on international credits, a matter intimately connected with any scheme for the reconstruction of Europe. It had concluded its investigation of the question of an international agreement as to lost, stolen, or destroyed securities and had prepared an agreement which ought to be universally agreed to. It had prepared a detailed report on the financial position of Danzig and the financial reconstruction of Austria.

It had not yet been possible to carry out the plan agreed upon by the financial section and the Austrian Government, because one essential condition had not been fulfilled—the suspension of liens. Some of the powers holding general liens over the whole of the property of the Austrian State had not announced willingness to suspend them. The United States, however, had just consented to the suspension of its liens. At the beginning of the current year the Austrian situation was somewhat improved as the result of credits granted or promised by the Italian, French, British, and Czecho-Slovak Governments. The two latter, desirous of seeing the league plan for Austria put into operation, requested that the financial section be invited to cooperate with the Austrian Government through the appointment of a financial adviser, and the president of the council conveyed the request to the financial section. This section, being anxious to respect Austrian sovereignty, submitted the matter to the Austrian Government, the latter replying that for reasons of internal policy the appointment of a financial adviser was not for the present advisable. In view of this situation the economic and financial committee decided to postpone the appointment, but stood ready to take action whenever Austria, who aided in developing the plan, might so desire.

On motion of Mr. Bourgeois, the council resolved that it noted with satisfaction that the economic section of the provisional economic and financial committee of the League of Nations had begun the examination of the question of the validity of arbitration clauses in commercial contracts, especially those between nationals of different States, and had decided to appoint a special committee of experts to advise on the legal and commercial aspects of the question; that it noted the view of the economic section that a conference sufficiently prepared in advance might cause much progress to be made toward greater unification of the laws relating to bills of exchange, and that it requested the secretary general, in view of the predominant part taken previously by the Netherlands Government in this matter, and in accordance with the views expressed by the economic section, to consult that Government as to its possible collaboration with the economic organization of the league, both for the convocation of a conference and the necessary preliminary work.

The council's resolution in this regard also approved the provisional conclusions of the economic section on the subject of the equitable treatment of commerce arising out of article 23 (e) of the covenant and noted that the section had appointed a subcommittee to study the question further.

It also, in recognition of the fact that the suppression of unfair competition was a step toward more equitable treatment of commerce, (a) approved the proposal to circulate to States members of the league and to principal States nonmembers the report of the economic section on unfair competition, including the tentative draft of articles for a convention which had been proposed as a basis for discussion and criticism; (b) invited the States members of the league to give careful consideration to the report circulated, including the tentative draft submitted for criticism, and to inform the secretariat at a very early date of any amendments or suggestions they might desire to offer, and authorized the economic section and the secretary general, should they deem necessary, to consult the experts of the different Governments for this purpose; (c) recommended that such of the States members of the league as were not already members of the industrial property union to take immediate steps to adhere.

The resolution also noted with satisfaction the procedure which the financial section of the Provisional Economic and Financial Committee had laid down in regard to double taxation; expressed the hope that States members would do their utmost to supply necessary information for an annual publication on public finance; noted with satisfaction that the financial section had undertaken an inquiry to give effect to the resolution adopted by the council on March 21, 1921, concerning appointment of technical advisers to certain Governments; approved the measures taken by the financial section to carry out the request made to it by the Second Assembly to urge the various Governments to reply to the inquiries regarding measures taken by them to insure application of the resolution of the Brussels conference for economic rehabilitation, reconstruction, etc.; approved the measures taken by the financial section to insure continuation of the work of organizing international credits, the foundation of which work has been so successfully laid by Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser, praising his tireless activity and competence and expressing regret that the period for which he consented to give his services to the league had ended; asked the Governments to consider giving effect in national legislation for a limited period, and in respect to a certain number of destroyed or stolen securities, a list of which would be sent them, to measures analogous to the French law concerning securities destroyed or stolen during the war, and expressing the opinion that the Governments would take all possible steps to facilitate inquiries by holders of securities or coupons which had been protested, instructing the secretariat to communicate these conclusions to the States members of the league, recommending adoption and asking that replies be made as soon as practicable.

The resolution also approved the report of the financial section on the financial reconstruction of Austria, taking note of the fact that the Austrian Government had informed the financial committee at its last meeting that for reasons of internal policy it did not believe the time had come for the appointment of a financial adviser intrusted with the duty of executing the plan of financial reform drawn up by the Austrian Government in agreement with the financial section, stated that out of regard to the opinion of the Austrian Government the Council approved the section's decision not to appoint a financial adviser, and decided to notify to this effect the British and Czecho-Slovak Governments at whose request the appointment of such adviser had been contemplated, and stated that the council would continue to hold itself at the disposal of Austria, in so far as its means permitted, for carrying out the program Austria had laid down.

Reports of the economic and financial sections of the provisional economic and financial committee were presented to the council and served as the basis of the report of Mr. Bourgeois and the above resolution.

That part of the financial section's report dealing with international credits stated that the section had noted the resolution of the council on January 14, inviting the section to present at the council's next session a report on the work which had so far been done by the international credits organization, together with an account of the section's proposals as to future activities. It stated further that in pursuance to the resolution the section had prepared a separate report covering the question of international credits from a general standpoint, as well as the history of the scheme adopted and its results, stating the section's conclusions regarding the present organization of the service which was working in London and asking the council's approval. The report stated that the international credit scheme developed by the financial section is now well known, and was also called the ter Meulen scheme, and that negotiations, official and unofficial, had been begun with certain countries which had intimated a desire to take advantage of its provisions as borrowers—that if these negotiations should result in the application of the scheme to certain countries the present organization would require considerable enlargement. The section considered that until this new phase in the activity of the League of Nations should begin it would be sufficient to keep the present organization in a sufficiently elastic condition to meet all demands. Reference was made to Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser who had accepted the post of organizer of the international credits scheme for one year and who had retired on finishing his task. The section had decided temporarily to place the current business of the organization in the hands of Mr. Le Nevev, who would cooperate with the secretariat, and who for nearly a year, as one of Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser's principal assistants, had acquired exceptional experience. The section had also decided that supreme control of the organization should remain with the subcommittee on international credits, consisting of Mr. Averal, Sir Henry Strakosch, and Mr. ter Meulen, appointed in December, 1920. The subcommittee could, when necessary, consult the section on specially important matters. By these arrangements any interruption in the continuous development of this important branch of the activities of the league would be avoided, and the strictest economy in its conduct secured. The members of the section were in constant touch with the business world, and this would enable them then properly to measure any developments in the economic and financial situation of interest in connection with the ter Meulen scheme. The section would in the future submit to the council any recommendations which circumstances might suggest.

THE TER MEULEN PLAN OF INTERNATIONAL CREDIT.

The special report by the financial section on international credits above referred to pointed out that at its meeting on December 14, 1920, the Council of the League of Nations, after examining the report of the International Financial Conference held at Brussels on September 24, 1920, had adopted, on recommendation of the Economic and Financial Committee, the plan for international credits submitted by Mr. ter Meulen, a Dutch banker.

After debating Mr. ter Meulen's proposal, the Conference adopted and developed it in detail. The scheme in full as accepted and perfected by the Conference is as follows:

"1. In order that nations, which under present circumstances are unable to obtain accommodation on reasonable terms in the open market, may be able to command the confidence necessary to attract funds for the financing of their essential imports, an International Commission shall be constituted under the auspices of the League of Nations. 2. The Commission shall consist of bankers and business men of international repute, appointed by the Council of the League of Nations. 3. The Commission shall have the power to appoint subcommissions, and to devolve upon them the exercise of its authority in participating countries or in groups of participating countries. 4. The Governments of countries desiring to participate shall notify the Commission what specific assets they are prepared to assign as security for commercial credits to be granted by the nationals of exporting countries. 5. The Commission, after examination of these assets, shall of its own authority determine the gold value of the credits which it would approve against the security of these assets. 6. The participating Government shall then be authorized to prepare bonds to the gold value approved by the Commission, each in one specific currency to be determined on the issue of the bond. 7. The date of maturity and the rate of interest to be borne by these bonds shall be determined by the participating Government in agreement with the Commission. 8. The service of these bonds shall be secured out of the revenue of the assigned assets.

"9. The assigned assets shall, in the first instance, be administered by the participating Government or by the International Commission as that Commission may in each case determine. 10. The Commission shall at any time have the right of making direct representations to the Council of the League of Nations as to the desirability of transferring the administration of the assigned assets from the participating Government to the Commission. 11. The decision of the Council of the League of Nations on this question shall be binding.

"12. After the preparation of these bonds, the participating Government shall have the right to loan the bonds to its own nationals for use by them as collateral security for importations. 13. The bonds shall be made out in such currencies and in such denominations as are applicable to the particular transaction in respect of which they are issued. 14. The participating Government shall be free to take or not to take security for the loan of these bonds from the nationals to whom they are lent. 15. The maturity and the rate of interest of the loan of the bonds shall be fixed by agreement between the participating Government and the borrower of the bonds; they need not be the same as the maturity and the rate of interest of the bonds themselves.

"16. When making application to his Government for a loan of these bonds, the importer must furnish proof that he has previously obtained from the International Commission express permission to enter into the transaction for which the bonds are to be given as collateral. 17. Each bond, before it is handed over by the participating Government to the importer, shall be countersigned by the Commission in proof of registration. 18. Having obtained the consent of the Commission and received from them countersigned bonds, the importer will pledge these bonds to the exporter in a foreign country for the period of the transaction. 19. The exporter will return to him on their due dates the coupons of the pledged bonds, and the bonds themselves on the completion of the transaction. 20. On receipt of the coupons and the bonds respectively, the importer will return them to his Government. 21. Bonds returned to the participating Government shall be canceled, and may subsequently be replaced by other bonds, either in the same or in a different currency, up to an equivalent amount. 22. The exporter, or if he has pledged the bonds the institution with which he has repledged them, acting on his behalf, would be free, in the event of the importer not fulfilling the terms of his contract, to hold until maturity the bonds given as collateral by the importer, or to sell them in accordance with the custom in his country in case of default. 23. In the second alternative an option of repurchasing the bonds direct must first be given for a short period to the Government which issued them. 24. If a sale is resorted to and results in a surplus beyond what is necessary to cover the claims of the exporter upon the importer, the exporter shall be held accountable for that surplus to the Government which issues the bonds.

"25. The revenues from the assigned assets shall be applied as follows, to the service of the bonds. 26. Out of these revenues, the Commission or the participating Government, as the case may be, shall purchase foreign currencies sufficient to meet at their due date the coupons on all bonds at any time outstanding in the different foreign currencies. 27. In addition, they shall establish abroad in the appropriate currencies a sinking fund calculated to redeem at maturity 10 per cent of the bonds outstanding in each of the different countries. 28. Further, in addition to the amounts provided for payment of coupons and for the endowment of the sinking fund, they shall establish out of the assigned revenues a special reserve in one or more foreign currencies for the redemption of bonds sold in accordance with paragraph 22. 29. The amount to be set aside for the special reserve shall in each case be determined by the Commission. 30. Any surplus remaining at the end of each year after the provision of these services shall be at the free disposal of the participating Government.

"31. A participating Government shall have the right to offer its own bonds as collateral for credits obtained for the purpose of importations on Government account. The previous assent of the Commission will in these cases also be required for the particular importations desired by the participating Government. 32. If a participating Government which has been in control of its assigned revenues should fail to fulfil its obligations, the exporter concerned will notify the Commission, and the Commission will apply to the Council of the League of Nations for the transfer of the management of the assigned revenues to the Commission.

"33. The consent of the Commission is necessary whenever bonds secured on the assigned assets are given as collateral, and shall as a rule be accorded only for the import of raw materials and primary necessities. 34. The Commission may, however, at its discretion, sanction in advance the importation of specified quantities of such goods. 35. Even in the case of imports under such a general sanction a notification of the particular transaction must be registered with the Commission. 36. The assent of the Commission must also be obtained in every case to the term of the credit which it is proposed to open."

The financial section of the provisional economic and financial committee stated in further reference to the above plan in its special report, the summary of which was interrupted by a detailed description of the plan, that it hesitated to ask the council to establish at once a large and expensive organization to carry out this plan, but preferred a procedure which would meet the pressing needs of the international credit situation and be adaptable to any important changes which might become necessary. An international credits department had been established, therefore, in London in March, 1921, under the direction of that well-known business man, Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser, director of the Manchester Liverpool District Bank, who was instructed to consider the means of putting into practice the plan recommended by the Brussels International Conference, i. e., the ter Meulen plan, to examine the feasibility of the plan and if necessary to draw up statutes for the International Commission. The department had been in operation a year. The report then spoke in praise of the untiring activity, the thorough grasp of the situation, and the unselfish devotion with which Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser had performed his task, having made both potential borrowers and potential lenders realize the scope and effectiveness of the ter Meulen plan. It had been necessary to call the attention of impoverished countries to the chance of obtaining from more fortunate nations, by means of material as well as moral guaranties, funds for the resumption of pre-war economic activities. It was also necessary to make lenders understand that in accepting credit bonds based on a restoration of public finance and a better use of the national resources of the borrowing country they would get an adequate security for repayment and bring about the stability essential to the world's development and progress. The authors of the ter Meulen scheme had realized that two elements were essential to the stability and prosperity of a country; balance in public finance between income and outgo; development of productivity. The ter Meulen plan implied that countries using it would make an effort to restore equilibrium in budgets and reduce fiduciary circulation. Furthermore, the plan not only covered importation by private persons of products enabling creditor countries to reestablish their production, but also provided for the direct use of credit bonds by the Governments.

The financial section had pointed out to possible borrowers in September, 1921, the advantage of using the ter Meulen plan as a basis for what might be termed reconstruction credits, for the guarantee of credits needed for improvement of means of communication, reorganization of factories, and in other ways for development of means of production, restoring railways, canals, ports, etc. The commercial credits available heretofore to borrowers had not been sufficient. What was needed was not a temporary accommodation but long-term credits, and these could be fully supported by the ter Meulen bonds, a real investment producing revenues in gold.

Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser had said in his report of Sept. 6, 1921, that the ter Meulen plan could be used to help a government procure funds only for productive expenditure, that it avoided foreign interference and insured the independence of the borrowing country. The report then pointed out that in machinery such as that of the International Commission provided by the ter Meulen plan the League of Nations had at its disposal an organization having the necessary authority and at the same time beyond political control. This organization would strengthen the position of a government in its effort to effect difficult financial reforms, and at the same time inspire confidence in lenders. Potential lenders had on numerous occasions shown a favorable attitude toward the plan, while negotiations had been undertaken with a number of countries manifesting an inclination to use it as borrowers.

Sir Drummond Drummond-Fraser had made the ter Meulen plan universally familiar, and one of his greatest successes had been in impressing the plan on the favorable notice of authoritative representatives of American finance. The Federal Reserve Board of the United States had supported him in his advocacy of this plan, its bulletin of February, 1922, stating that none of the proposals for international credit had any considerable weight of public opinion behind it except the ter Meulen plan, that this plan seemed to have the support and approval of Western European as well as American bankers and financial experts, probably because it met the needs of the various types of foreign trade financing, that if the Genoa Conference could secure recognition by borrowing countries of the necessity of domestic financial reforms and by lenders of the value of the security furnished by the gold bonds the necessary machinery could be made effective almost instantly. The excellence of the ter Meulen plan over other systems lay in the fact that while giving adequate guarantees to lenders it supplied the means of assuring a substantial and constant improvement in the economic and financial condition of borrowing countries.

THE HAGUE AND THE GENOA CONFERENCE.

After making his report on the work of the economic and financial section of the provisional economic and financial committee, Mr. Bourgeois said that this work was partly concerned with discussions taking place at the Genoa conference—that it was known that some questions then under discussion at Genoa were to be referred to the league, that it was evident, therefore, that the league had not lost its prestige and that the Genoa conference had paid a tribute to the achievements of the league. The council approved the report of Mr. Bourgeois as well as the resolution already described.

Mr. Bourgeois then moved a declaration to the effect that should the resolutions taken by the Genoa conference be referred to the league, the president of the council and the secretary general be instructed to transmit them to the league's technical organizations.

SIXTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 13, 1922.

CONSTITUTION OF DANZIG.

The council approved the constitution of Danzig with the addition of the amendment desired, relating to the period of office of senators.

MANUFACTURE OF AIRCRAFT IN DANZIG.

The question of the manufacture of aircraft in Danzig was referred to the permanent advisory commission on military, naval, and air questions.

ALBANIA.

The council adopted a resolution providing (1) that the council, acting on request of the Albanian Government, would retain one member and one secretary of the commission of inquiry on Albania for the present, (2) that the council send the request of the Albanian Government for economic assistance to the provisional economic and financial committee for favorable consideration, and ask said committee to send experts to Albania to report on measures for encouragement of foreign capital, (3) that the council, acting on request of the Albanian Government, request the financial section of the provisional economic and financial committee to propose to the council at the next session a list of candidates for the post of financial adviser to the Albanian Government, and that the request of said government for other technical advisers be postponed to a subsequent session, (4) that the reports of the commission of inquiry now under consideration be sent to the conference of ambassadors, whose attention should be called to the Albanian-Greek frontier, with an expression of hope that it might be defined as soon as possible, (5) that grateful recognition be accorded the commission of inquiry for its work in Albania, which had helped to pacify the country, restore better relations with neighboring people, and increase the prestige of the League of Nations.

REPORTS OF MILITARY COMMISSION OF CONTROL AT VILNA.

The council decided that the reports of the Military Commission of Control at Vilna should be published, leaving to the president of the council and the secretary general the selection of the date for publication, the date, however, to be well before the next assembly.

SEVENTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 15.

COMMITTEE ON QUESTIONS OF INTELLECTUAL COOPERATION.

Pursuant to its decision of January 14, 1922, carrying out the Second Assembly's Resolution of September 21, 1921, the council decided to ask the following persons to be members of a committee to examine questions relating to intellectual cooperation from the international point of view: D. N. Banerjee, professor of political economy at the University of Calcutta; M. H. Bergson, honorary professor of philosophy at the College de France, member of the Académie Française, member of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques; Mlle. Bonevieve, professor of geology at University of Christiania, delegate to the Assembly of the League of Nations; M. A. de Castro, director of the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Rio de Janeiro; Mme. Curie-Sklodowska, professor of physics at University of Paris and honorary professor of University of Warsaw, member of Académie de Médecine at Paris, and of Scientific Society of Warsaw; M. J. Destru, former minister of sciences and arts, member of the Académie belge de littérature et de langue française; A. L. de Torres Quevedo, director of the "Laboratorio Electro-mechanico" at Madrid, member of the committee for the extension of scientific studies, member of the Academy of Sciences of Madrid.

The appointment of the twelfth member was postponed to a later date.

MINORITIES IN LITHUANIA.

The council resolved that it took note of the declaration signed at Geneva on May 12 by the Lithuanian representative in the name of his Government concerning the protection of minorities and that it decided that the stipulations of this declaration, in so far as they affected religious, racial, or linguistic minorities, should be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations from the date on which they had been ratified by the Lithuanian Government, and that the Lithuanian Government be asked to inform the secretary general of its ratification as soon as possible.

EIGHTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 16.

FAMINE IN RUSSIA; NORWEGIAN PROPOSAL.

After considering the Norwegian Government's proposal that the council appoint a commission of inquiry to report on the famine in Russia, the council resolved to send a recommendation to the Geneva Conference, or to some commission set up by that conference, that careful consideration be given the Norwegian Government's proposal for coordinating the mass of information now available in western Europe respecting the realities of contemporary Russian life as affected by starvation and disease and as to the effect of those conditions on European economic reconstruction.

DISPUTE BETWEEN LITHUANIA AND POLAND.

The council intrusted Mr. Hymans with the task of taking up with representatives of Lithuania and Poland the matter of an administrative line of demarcation in the neutral zones established by the council's military commission, pending a permanent settlement, and also the question of mutual amnesty for the ending of reprisals.

BUDGET FOR 1923.

The council instructed the secretary general to forward the report of the Commission of Control on the Budget of 1923 to the members of the league, the members of the council reserving the right to amend or discuss the budget through their representatives during the next assembly should they in the meantime find it impossible to examine the budget.

LEAGUE'S RELATION TO LOAN BY BARING BROS., LONDON, TO CZECHO-SLOVAKIA.

The secretary general brought to the council's attention clauses in a loan contract, involving the sum of £10,000,000, between Baring Bros., London and Czechoslovakia, making the council an arbitrator in the event of certain contingencies or difficulties. The contract had been submitted to the council through the secretary general by the parties who stated that it was in line with the council's endeavors to facilitate international credits essential to the economic reconstruction of Europe and in accord with the work done by the financial section of the league's financial and economic committee. The council decided to instruct the financial section to consider what responsibilities the council would incur as a result of the arbitration clauses in the proposed loan arrangement and whether the council should approve it.

NINTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 16.

UPPER SILESIA.

The council on request of the conference of ambassadors appointed Mr. Calonder president of the mixed committee for Upper Silesia, and also, on similar request, appointed Mr. Kaeckenbeeck president of the court of arbitration for Upper Silesia. Following out the German-Polish agreement on Upper Silesia the council placed the stipulations therein regarding protection of minorities under guarantee of the League of Nations, said stipulations to the subject to further consideration by the council at its next session.

REPATRIATION OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Doctor Nansen, the League's High Commissioner for Repatriation of Prisoners of War, stated that the work was nearly finished, and gave an account of his recent efforts in behalf of Turkish prisoners and prisoners in Russia.

TRAFFIC IN OPIUM.

Mr. Hymans reviewed before the council the work of the advisory committee on the opium traffic. He said that the gravest difficulties attended the problem of controlling the opium traffic, difficulties the committee had not tried to evade or minimize. The committee had pointed out that in some parts of the world the cultivation of the poppy was far in excess of the world's legitimate requirements; that in Europe and America morphine was being manufactured in enormous quantities and was being sent into countries whose natives had never been addicted to this drug until recently. The Chinese delegate had asked the committee why countries permitted their manufacturers to make and export morphine to poison the people of the world, and had asked if this was a policy of civilization. The committee believed that civilized countries must cooperate against the evil; that there must be control of exports and imports by all countries if the trade of the countries exercising supervision was not to suffer; that the countries frankly admitting that they had become centers of illicit traffic could only fulfill their promises for the future if they had the support of exporting countries; that only through a frank exchange of information could the extent of cultivation and manufacture become known. The committee urged the council, therefore, to appeal again to all countries to become parties to the opium convention of 1912, to make an annual report to the league on their cultivation, production, and manufacture of opium, its derivatives and other dangerous drugs; to state their requirements for internal consumption, and to adopt an import certificate which the committee thought should be in use on September 1, 1922, in Europe, America, Africa, and Australia, and by January 1, 1923, in all other countries. The committee had shown that a country remaining outside the convention might be made a center for the illicit traffic; urged the especial importance of Persia and Switzerland, both members of the league, becoming parties to the convention as soon as possible. The committee believed that of those States not members of the league and not parties to the convention, the most important in connection with the opium traffic was Turkey, and had pointed out that the ratification of the opium convention by Turkey was a term of the Sevres treaty, asking that in any fresh treaty with Turkey a similar provision be made.

The committee had given special attention to the increasing abuse of cocaine, and had asked all countries to send information as to annual legitimate requirements. The committee was aware that a large illicit traffic in morphine and cocaine existed in western Europe and America as well as the Far East, that in spite of the activity of the police and the heavy penalties imposed it was difficult to check because the drugs could be secretly conveyed with such ease and because so far it had been impossible to discover the means by which the drugs were obtained or the persons organizing the traffic, that the most effective method of stopping the traffic was to control production, a method which ought not to be difficult in the case of cocaine because its manufacture was an elaborate process and could be undertaken only by expert chemists. Cocaine was employed in a much smaller degree and for much fewer purposes than morphine, and it would be easier to estimate the world's requirements. The committee realized that the world's production of opium, morphine, heroin, cocaine and other drugs must be ascertained, as well as the legitimate requirements of each country for domestic consumption. The next step would be a comprehensive policy enabling the league to aid in striking at the root of the matter by recommending limitation of world supply to needs for legitimate purposes, the control of imports and exports, and effective national legislation in all countries. A large number of countries had recently passed legislation for more effective supervision. Cooperation of countries not yet in the league was essential. Germany had helped by appointing a member of the advisory committee, and the committee hoped that it might yet obtain the active cooperation of the United States, a party to the opium convention, and one of the largest morphine manufacturing and exporting countries in the world.

A resolution had been passed by the committee that the council should, if necessity arose, invite the governments to facilitate investigations in their territories by commissioners appointed partly by governments concerned and partly by the league. The committee had accepted the offer of the league of Red Cross societies to undertake through its National Red Cross societies active propaganda work against the abuse of opium.

Serious objection had been made by one of the members of the committee to certain paragraphs of a resolution adopted by the committee; that it might be necessary for the council to refer these paragraphs back to the advisory committee for further consideration; that in such event they should be discussed at a private meeting.

The council decided on further discussion in private.

TENTH MEETING (PRIVATE), MAY 16, 5.30 P. M.

After eliminating the paragraphs objected to, which reflected on China's handling of the opium problem, it appearing that China was making every effort against it within her power, the council resolved that the Chinese Government be asked to invite the International Anti-Opium Association in Peking to nominate a representative as member of the Chinese Commission of Investigation and authorize this member to transmit through the Chinese Government a report to the league in addition to the general report of the Commission of Investigation. The rest of the report was approved after the objectionable paragraphs had been eliminated.

ELEVENTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 17.

ADMISSION TO PERMANENT COURT OF NONMEMBER STATES, ETC.

The council adopted a revised form of the resolution passed at the third meeting of the present session relating to admission to Permanent Court of International Justice of States not members of the league nor mentioned in the annex to the covenant. The revised form was substantially the same as the original.

RUSSIAN REFUGEES.

Mr. Adatci, representative of Japan, announced that his Government was ready to contribute 30,000 yen to the fund for the assistance of the Russian refugees at Constantinople—a sum equal to one-seventh of the necessary £20,000 yet to be subscribed—the contribution being made on condition that the rest would be given by other members.

DRAFT MANDATE FOR PALESTINE.

Lord Balfour, discussing further the placing of the Palestine mandate on the agenda for the present session, said that he had hoped that progress could have been made at that session toward a final settlement of all mandates in the Middle East; that further delay, however, did not mean that the general policy of the Allied and Associated Powers and of the League had been modified in any way; that the Treaty of Sevres and its remodeling had nothing to do with the policy of mandates in the Middle East or elsewhere.

He regretted the necessity of postponing again the discussion of the Palestine mandate because the task involved was one of great delicacy and difficulty, requiring large pecuniary resources. Little progress could be made until the economic capacities of Palestine had been so developed as to enable it to support a much larger population in much greater comfort than was now possible. The difficulty of obtaining capital made it necessary for the mandate to go into effect as soon as practicable.

The delay in connection with the Palestine mandate had not been generally understood. It was due to no indecision on the part of the allied and associated powers, or of the council, or the mandatory powers. It had always been contemplated, he continued, that the United States, having signed the peace treaties, would also ratify them, and would become, in that sense, a full party to the responsibilities and work of the allied and associated powers; that the United States had not ratified but had naturally claimed that this fact did not interfere with her rights and duties as one of the allied and associated powers in respect to the territories secured through the victory of said powers. The United States had claimed, he said, a voice in the mandates question, and this had necessitated fresh discussions of the mandate problem. The Palestine mandate had been discussed by the British Government and the United States Government, and the latter had accepted the entire principle of that mandate. This had all to be embodied in a treaty, and it was on the very eve of the present session of the council that the British Government had received a final statement from the United States. For this reason notice had not been given the Governments at an earlier date of the speaker's intention to ask for a discussion at the present session of the mandate. Members of the council naturally wished further time.

The powers of the league regarding mandates, he continued, had not been fully understood by the public. They were not the creations of the league and could not be altered in substance by it. It was the league's function to see that the specific and detailed terms of mandates were in accordance with the decisions taken by the allied and associated powers, the mandatory powers in carrying out these mandates being under the supervision but not the control of the league. The league had the necessary organization to obtain the fullest information as to the method in which each mandatory power was carrying out its mandate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to ask the Senator if in his investigations he has found whether or not the League of Nations has exercised any control over these mandates, especially under the provision that periodical, perhaps annual, reports of the action of the power having the mandate should be made to the League of Nations, and whether really these mandates have been treated as annexations, and the term "mandate" really just as a euphonious name for annexation; and is there any difference between an annexation of territory and a mandate in actual practice by the several nations to which the German colonies were allocated?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall cover all those points in the proceedings which I am about to describe. The "C" mandates were ratified in 1920. The "A" and "B" mandates were ratified last summer, except——

Mr. SHIELDS. Ratified by whom?

Mr. SHEPPARD. By the league council and declared to be in harmony with the spirit of the covenant; and the proceedings I am now about to relate will cover those points in considerable detail.

Mr. SHIELDS. Do they show that Great Britain and France in any way deferred to the council or the assembly of the League of Nations as to how they should conduct these great territories that were allotted to them as mandates under the treaty? I do not believe they were allotted directly under the treaty, but by the council of the premiers of the great powers, as I remember.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They were submitted to the council, and they have been approved by the council, except perhaps one, Mesopotamia, as to which final action by the council has not yet been taken; but I am setting out in the course of these proceedings a "B" mandate in detail and an "A" mandate in detail, so that the Senator can see the exact provisions; and in my address of October 5, 1921, I set out a "C" mandate in full. Those mandates have met the approval of the council.

The speaker then stated that a mandate was a self-imposed limitation by the conquerors on the sovereignty they exercised over the conquered territory; that in the general interest of mankind the allied and associated powers had placed this limitation on themselves; had asked the league to assist them in seeing that this general policy was put into effect, but that the league was not the author of the policy; that the duty of the league, most responsible and onerous, was, first, to see that the terms of the mandates conformed to the principles of the covenant; and, second, that these terms would in fact regulate the policy of the mandatory powers in the mandated areas.

Fears had been expressed by some, he said, that the Palestine mandate would injuriously affect certain Christian interests. His reply was that he did not see how anyone could suppose that Christian interests would suffer by transfer of power in Palestine from a Mohammedan power to a Christian power, especially when that Christian power was Great Britain. He said that no power had been fairer in its treatment of different religious creeds than Great Britain. Furthermore, whatever was done in Palestine at the moment or in the future was in the full light of day. The machinery of the mandate commission, of the council, and the assembly was so shaped as to direct the full glare of public opinion on all mandatory transactions.

After discussion by several other representatives the council decided to postpone further debate until its next session, which it resolved should assemble not later than July 15; and decided further that at the next session all outstanding mandates would be considered, if possible.

DISPUTE BETWEEN LITHUANIA AND POLAND.

The council, again taking up the Poland-Lithuania dispute, resolved that since difficulties were involved in the maintenance between these two countries of a neutral zone, which was at present deprived of regular administration, and since the council's recommendation of January 13, 1922, to the effect that this zone be abolished and a provisional line of demarcation fixed by agreement between the two Governments, received the consent of Poland, but was not accepted by Lithuania, the council considered it desirable from the military point of view to maintain the neutral zone through its entire extent, but renewed its recommendation as to the need of a provisional line of demarcation crossing this zone, for the purpose of the civil and judicial administration of the communes situated in the zone, and that a commission be sent by the council to study the line which might eventually be adopted and report to the council.

The resolution also requested both Governments, in the interests of peace, to annul, by act of clemency, legal proceedings in Lithuania, Poland, or the disputed territory against all persons detained or expelled for political reasons and not charged with offenses against common law.

The resolution was adopted over the protest of Lithuania, Poland consenting.

RESOLUTIONS OF HEALTH CONFERENCE AT WARSAW.

The secretary general reported that the indications were that the Genoa conference would approve the principles of the resolutions of the Warsaw Health Conference, transmitted by the council, and would recommend to the Governments concerned that they examine forthwith the methods of carrying them into effect; that the resolutions had been placed on the agenda of the Genoa conference and referred to a committee.

The council instructed the secretary-general to keep in touch with the Genoa conference, to report any further action, and to keep in contact with the Governments represented at the Warsaw conference, which had declared an interest in carrying out its program.

Mr. Chodzko, Polish minister of health, came to the council table and reviewed the work of the Warsaw Health Conference, stating that it had been summoned by the health organization of the league at the instance of Poland. Its resolutions had been unanimously adopted, a fact all the more remarkable because this was the first international conference at which representatives of nations formerly enemies had met together.

WORK OF PERMANENT ADVISORY COMMISSION ON MILITARY, NAVAL, AND AIR QUESTIONS.

The Permanent Advisory Commission on Military, Naval, and Air Questions reported through its chairman, Rear Admiral de Magaz, on the three questions submitted to it by the council. The first concerned the definition of the term, "Munitions and implements of war," in paragraph 5, article 8 of the covenant, the definition decided upon by the commission being that the term referred to material used exclusively for fighting. The second question concerned the destruction of surplus stocks of munitions, and these the commission considered had been destroyed or were in process of destruction, the problem having in this way been solved. The third question concerned the private manufacture of arms, and the commission replied that inasmuch as the temporary mixed commission on armaments had in charge preparations for an international conference on this subject and was also considering it, the permanent commission held itself ready to study from the technical viewpoint any specific questions arising in the course of the investigations by the temporary commission which the latter might refer to it.

Lord Balfour, commenting on the report in reference to surplus stocks, said that the ratification of the Arms Traffic Convention lay at the root of every effective measure against the export of arms; that the council could not consider that it was dealing effectively with the export of arms as long as that treaty remained unratified. The Council requested the Secretariat to prepare a report on this matter.

TWELFTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MAY 17, 1922.

MANUFACTURE OF AIR MATERIAL AT DANZIG.

The council, after hearing the report of the air subcommittee of the Permanent Advisory Commission on Military, Naval and Air Questions, decided to sustain the report declining to modify the regulations preventing the making of military aircraft in Danzig and permitting only civil craft, as requested by the president of the Danzig Senate.

POLAND-DANZIG RELATIONS.

General Haking, the league's high commissioner for Danzig, stated that Danzig and Poland had agreed on all questions at issue, such as conduct of Danzig's foreign relations by Poland, status of Polish property in Danzig, etc., and suggested that the council make a rule that after a decision by the high commissioner the two parties come together within the 40 days allowed them and try to agree before appealing to the council. The council agreed to this suggestion.

GERMAN MINORITIES IN POLAND.

The council, after hearing a report on the German minorities in Poland, resolved that a copy be sent the Polish Government with the request that detailed information on the questions of fact and law in the report be forwarded as soon as possible to the council; that a representative of the Polish Government be invited to consider, in company with the secretary general, the questions of law in order to help the council to decide whether, and if so, on what questions the Permanent Court of International Justice should be asked to give an opinion; that the Polish Government be requested to postpone until the council should have an opportunity to reach a decision, any administrative or judicial matters likely to affect persons of German origin engaged in agricultural work who were Polish subjects, or whose status as Polish subjects was dependent on the question of interpretation raised in the report.

ADJOURNMENT.

The council then adjourned its eighteenth session, after agreeing to hold an extraordinary session not later than July 15, and the next regular session, about a week before the opening of the third assembly.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

The official journal of the league contains replies from Belgium and Denmark to the second assembly's letter on disarmament, saying they had covered the subject in their replies to the letter of the first assembly.

Greece replied on April 10, 1922, that in view of the war with Turkey it was impossible to publish at the moment information regarding its military strength and stores, and to estimate military expenses for 1922 and 1923.

Peru replied that its war expenditure would be 1,000,000 Peruvian pounds for 1921, and 900,000 for 1922.

ARMS TRAFFIC CONVENTION; GREECE, HUNGARY, MEXICO, MONACO, SALVADOR.

As to the Arms Traffic Convention Greece advised the Secretary General that its Government had ratified in 1920.

Hungary replied that its Government was prepared to adhere to the convention on the control of the traffic in arms and munitions and to the protocol signed at St. Germain-en-Lay September 10, 1919, but under the Hungarian constitution had first to obtain legislative sanction and a decision of the governor of Hungary.

Mexico replied that the league's letter of inquiry regarding the Arms Traffic Convention had been referred to the President of Mexico, who would take such action as he deemed appropriate.

Monaco replied that in view of the fact that article 23 of the Arms Traffic Convention limited adhesion to States, members of the league, it was prepared to adhere on admission to the league.

Salvador acknowledged receipt of the letter regarding the Arms Traffic Convention, but did not indicate what action it would take.

LETTER OF SECRETARY OF STATE OF UNITED STATES ON RUSSIAN REFUGEES.

The League's official journal contains a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to Doctor Nansen, received by him May 23, 1922, stating that he had received a letter from Doctor Nansen, in his capacity as commissioner of the League for Russian refugees, requesting the United States Government to grant Russian students and refugees in the United States permission to attend, without charge, if possible, the institutions of secondary teaching and the universities in the United States, stating further that the colleges and universities in the United States were under private control and that the United States had no direction over them; that there were in the several States free public schools, embracing primary, secondary, intermediate, and high school courses of study; that while these schools were governed by State statutes or municipal ordinances and not by Federal law, the State Department knew of no reason to prevent Russian residents in the United States entering these schools on an equality with other residents of the community.

EVACUATION OF RUSSIAN REFUGEES AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Toward the desired fund of 30,000 pounds for the evacuation of Russian refugees from Constantinople, the League's journal for July, 1922, shows that Brazil had subscribed 500 pounds, Chinese Government 5,000 French francs, Switzerland 10,000 francs, Belgium 50,000 francs.

MUTUAL INSURANCE OF NATIONS AGAINST PUBLIC CALAMITIES.

The official journal contains a letter from the president of the Geneva Conference to the president of the council transmitting, by direction of the conference, the suggestion of Senator Ciraolo, president of the Italian Red Cross, for a system of mutual insurance of nations against public calamities, under the administration of the Red Cross, the suggestion having been adopted by the Tenth International Conference of the Red Cross.

PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

The league's official journal for August, 1922, shows that China had ratified the statute of Permanent Court of International Justice and the optional clause for compulsory jurisdiction on May 13, 1922, and Lithuania had done likewise May 16, 1922.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS: INDIA, COLOMBIA, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, POLAND.

India replied to the second inquiry regarding limitation of armament for the two succeeding fiscal years that the budget for military expense in 1921–22 contemplated 622,000,000 rupees, but owing to abnormal frontier conditions had amounted to 650,100,000 rupees; that the estimate for 1922–23 was 621,800,000 rupees, with reductions under consideration.

Colombia replied that it would expend about 1,000,000 gold pesos less for military purposes in 1922 than in 1921; that expenditures for such purposes were amounting to about 10 per cent of its entire budget.

The Czecho-Slovak Republic replied that its military expense amounted in 1919 to 20.20 per cent of the total budget, in 1920 to 15.47 per cent, in 1921 to 14.20 per cent, in 1922 to 15.69 per cent; that a substantial reduction would have been shown but for the pronounced rise in cost of equipment and armaments; that its military budget was well on the way to the goal of the second assembly's resolution, viz, a military expenditure confined to minimum requirements.

Poland replied that on account of its peculiar military position it was unable at present to assume the suggested obligation; that it was nevertheless sparing no effort to reduce its military budget to a reasonable minimum; that its military expenditure had been reduced from $122,400,000 in 1920 to $69,327,696.98 in 1921; that the expense for the current year would not exceed $60,000,000; that Poland was still engaged in creating her army; that she possessed neither stocks of war material nor factories for its manufacture; that in this respect she was more unfavorably situated than other western powers; that in view of these facts her small military budget was convincing proof of her fundamentally pacific intentions; that she believed thoroughly in the mission and spirit of the league.

SAAR BASIN.

The official journal contains the twelfth periodical report of the governing commission for the Saar Basin, covering April to June, 1922. It concludes by stating that the second quarter of 1922 in the Basin had shown distinct recovery in economic activity—that it was hoped that the actitivities of the advisory committee elected on June 25, 1922, would bring about a still better development.

NINETEENTH SESSION OF COUNCIL, LONDON, JULY 17–24, 1922.

At the nineteenth session of the council held at London, July 17–24, 1922, member nations were represented as follows: Spain, Mr. Quinones de Leon (president); Belgium, Mr. Paul Hymans; Brazil, Mr. da Gama; China, Mr. Tang Tsai-Fou; British Empire, Lord Balfour and Mr. H. A. L. Fisher; France, Mr. René Viviani; Italy, Marquis Imperiali; Japan, Viscount Ishii.

FIRST MEETING (PUBLIC), JULY 17.

TRANSFER OF SOCIAL INSURANCE FUNDS FROM GERMANY TO POLAND.

By authority of article 312, Treaty of Versailles, the council approved a report of the commission appointed to arrange the transfer from Germany to Poland of certain social insurance funds for former German territory ceded to Poland.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Mr. da Gama presented a report on the work of the advisory committee on traffic in women and children during its first session at Geneva, from June 28 to July 1, 1922, a report recommending, among other things, that the United States and Germany be invited to appoint members of the committee—that the council request all Governments to become parties to the convention of 1921 on the traffic, and to ask all governments signatory to the 1904 or 1921 convention to appoint central authorities under article 1 of the 1904 agreement, if they had not already done so.

The report has drawn attention, said the speaker, to the importance of intercommunication between these authorities and urged that the league secretariat keep in closest possible touch with them; had made recommendations in connection with the employment of women, and certain suggestions in connection with emigration for consideration of the International Emigration Commission of the labor office at its next meeting, and had concluded by stating that the suppression of the traffic could be secured only through constant vigilance by all governments and interested voluntary international associations, and their intimate cooperation in carrying out the international agreement and conventions.

The report was adopted and the secretary general instructed to carry into effect its suggestions.

SECOND MEETING (PRIVATE), JULY 18.

PUBLICITY OF PROCEEDINGS.

A letter was read from President Harris, of the Association of Journalists, accredited to the league, protesting against the rumored intention of the council to discuss mandates largely, if not wholly, in private. Reserving the right to hold private meetings where the situation seemed to justify it, the council decided that the B mandates should be considered in public.

THIRD MEETING (PUBLIC), JULY 18.

THE "B" MANDATES.

Viscount Ishii presented a report on the B mandates. He called attention to the fact that the B mandates had been considered at the Paris session of the council in February, 1921, and that the speaker had submitted a report on the drafts then submitted for approval; that various circumstances, especially a note from the United States, induced the council to postpone final decision. He said that at that time the council asked the Government of the United States to be good enough to send a representative to the next session of the council; that at the session held on June 17, 1921, Mr. da Cunha announced that the League of Nations had not received any reply to the invitation nor any information giving accurate knowledge of the views of the United States Government; that Mr. da Cunha then addressed a letter to the principal allied powers asking them on behalf of the council to negotiate with the United States on this subject. He added that at the following session, on September 3, 1921, the situation was still unchanged, and the secretary general was requested to send a new letter to the principal allied powers expressing the council's desire that the negotiations which had been entered into at the council's request with the United States should be speedily concluded.

Viscount Ishii then referred to the fact that on May 11, 1922, at Geneva, Lord Balfour had, in the name of Great Britain, informed the council that the negotiations with the United States, regarding the Palestine mandate, had resulted satisfactorily to both parties; that he had asked the council to meet again at an early date to make a final decision on this mandate; that the council agreed to his request, expressing the hope that an agreement with the United States would soon be made in regard to the other draft mandates which were still undetermined. The speaker then stated that the British and French B mandates had reached the secretariat about a week before; that it was gratifying that the obstacles delaying decision had been removed; that as to the Belgian mandate for Ruanda Urundi in East Africa there was no new text and since he had already commented thereon in a former report he would confine himself at present to the British and French mandates of which modifications had been made.

He said that the new draft mandates resulting from conversations with the Government of the United States differed but slightly from the texts discussed in February, 1921; that he would point out the differences and recall his comments on certain points where it appeared to him, and still did so, that slight changes might properly be made.

The majority of the proposed changes, he continued, were purely verbal, and he would direct attention to those which were substantial, there being five of these.

The first occurred in Art. 7 of the British draft mandate for East Africa and in Art. 6 of the British and French draft mandates for Togoland and the Cameroons, taking the form of additional words designed to add greater precision to the obligation of the mandatory to refrain from granting concessions having the character of monopoly, being in accord, therefore, with the spirit of the covenant and calling for no comment.

The second change was in the article concerning freedom of conscience and free exercise of all forms of worship. Article 8 of the British mandate for East Africa in its new form restricted the rights granted to missionaries only to such as were nationals of States members of the League of Nations and brought the mandate into uniformity with the provisions in this respect in the mandates for Togoland and the Cameroons, which in the earlier drafts were not in complete uniformity. The corresponding article in the mandates for Togoland and the Cameroons was article 7. The new text extends the facilities previously granted to missionaries who were natives of States members of the League of Nations, thus removing a deplorable difference on this point between the two drafts to which the speaker had called attention in his first report.

The third change was in the Togoland and Cameroons mandates. The words "subject to the following provisions" had been replaced by the words "subject to the above provisions" at the end of the first paragraph of article 9. This same condition ought to be placed in article 3 of the British draft for East Africa.

The fourth change was the insertion of the words "provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of the present mandate," in the second paragraph of article 9 of the British and French mandates for Togoland and the Cameroons, thus very wisely limiting the scope of preceding provisions regarding the constitution of customs, postal, or administrative unions or federations which might be established between Togoland and the Cameroons and adjacent territories.

The fifth change was the deletion in article 12 of the British draft for East Africa and in article 11 of the British and French drafts for Togoland and the Cameroons of a sentence authorizing the council to approve by majority vote any modification in the mandates proposed by the mandatories. This sentence had already been deleted from the C mandates and the council would doubtless be pleased with its disappearance from the others.

The speaker said that all these changes showed a desire to adhere as faithfully as possible to the spirit of the covenant. He renewed his recommendations of certain changes in the mandates in his report in February, 1921, which he said had not been followed in the new drafts.

It was explained in the discussion following the report that the modifications last referred to were questions of form, and intended to bring the texts of B mandates into conformity with C mandates which had been approved by the council in 1920.

The secretary general suggested that the necessary modifications be intrusted to a drafting committee composed of representatives of the mandatory powers, Viscount Ishii, and the director of the mandates section.

Lord Balfour expressed agreement, but wished to raise another question. Negotiations had occurred regarding mandates between the mandatory Governments on the council and the United States Government. Lord Balfour said he was happy to state that complete agreement had been reached between the British Government and the Government of the United States regarding B mandates and the Palestine mandate. As to the B mandates there remained only the question of the wording of article 8 of the draft mandate for East Africa, providing freedom of conscience and free exercise of their calling by all missionaries who were nationals of any State member of the league. The original text had been as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of any local law for the maintenance of public order and public morals the mandatory shall insure to the territory freedom of conscience and free exercise of all forms of worship and shall, subject to such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of good government, allow all missionaries, nationals of any State member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling, to acquire and possess property, to erect buildings for religious purposes, and to open schools."

The United States, said Lord Balfour, had interpreted the words "subject to such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of good government," as limiting and almost invalidating the effect of the whole article, holding that they did not cover any situation not already met by the opening words of the clause above quoted, viz., "Subject to the provisions of any local law for the maintenance of public order and public morals." The British Government did not agree to this contention but to avoid prolonged discussion, it was proposed to have recourse to a corresponding article from the Americo-

Japanese treaty concerning Yap and other islands north of the equator, and to substitute it with such changes as might be proper. Said corresponding article seemed identical with the earlier draft of article 8 and as adapted to the mandate under discussion would read:

"The mandatory shall insure in the territory complete freedom of conscience and free exercise of all forms of worship consonant with public order and morality. Missionaries who are nationals of States members of the league shall be free to enter the territory and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the territory, it being understood, however, that the mandatory shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government and to take all measures required for such control."

Lord Balfour then asserted that it was assumed by the British Government that the United States Government could have no possible objection to this text, having already accepted it in the Yap treaty; that he had therefore telegraphed to His Majesty's representative in Washington stating that he was telling his colleagues on the council that the British and United States Governments had agreed on all points of importance affecting the administration of mandated territory in Africa. He said that the British ambassadors in Paris and Brussels had at the same time communicated the revised text to the French and Belgian Governments in the hope that they would agree to corresponding changes in their mandates relating to Togoland, the Cameroons, and German East Africa.

The council then approved the B mandates, subject to such textual changes as might be suggested by the drafting committee which the council authorized in accordance with the proposal of the secretary general.

TEXT OF "B" MANDATE.

It will be of value to insert here the text of a B mandate, and I have selected for this purpose the French mandate for Togoland. The other B mandates are the Belgian mandate for East Africa (comprising the territory of Ruanda-Urundi), the British mandate for the Cameroons, French mandate for the Cameroons (the territory of the Cameroons being divided between British and French mandates), the British mandate for Togoland (Togoland being also divided between British and French mandates), British mandate for East Africa (East Africa being divided between British and Belgian mandates), and the terms of all are alike.

FRENCH MANDATE FOR TOGOLAND.

"The Council of the League of Nations:

"Whereas by article 119 of the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights over her oversea possessions, including therein Togoland; and

"Whereas the principal allied and associated powers agreed that the Governments of France and Great Britain should make a joint recommendation to the League of Nations as to the future of the said territory; and

"Whereas the Governments of France and Great Britain have made a joint recommendation to the Council of the League of Nations that a mandate to administer in accordance with article 22 of the covenant of the League of Nations that part of Togoland lying to the east of the line agreed upon in the declaration of July 10, 1919, of which mention is made in article 1 below, should be conferred on the French Republic; and

"Whereas the Governments of France and Great Britain have proposed that the mandate be formulated in the following terms; and

"Whereas the French Republic has agreed to accept the mandate in respect of the said territory and has undertaken to exercise it on behalf of the League of Nations;

"Confirming said mandate, defines its terms as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

"The territory over which a mandate is conferred upon France comprises that part of Togoland which lies to the east of the line laid down in the declaration signed on July 10, 1919, of which a copy is annexed hereto.

"This line may, however, be slightly modified by mutual agreement between His Britannic Majesty's Government and the Government of the French Republic where an examination of the localities shows that it is undesirable, either in the interest of the inhabitants or by reason of any inaccuracies in the map, Sprigade 1:200,000, annexed to the declaration, to adhere strictly to the line laid down therein.

"The delimitation on the spot of this line shall be carried out in accordance with the provision of said declaration.

"The final report of the mixed commission shall give the exact description of the boundary line as traced on the spot; maps signed by the commissioners shall be annexed to the report. This report with its annexes shall be drawn up in triplicate: One of these shall be deposited in the archives of the League of Nations, one shall be kept by the Government of the Republic, and one by His Britannic Majesty's Government.

ARTICLE 2.

"The mandatory shall be responsible for the peace, order, and good government of the territory and for the promotion to the utmost of the material and moral well-being and the social progress of its inhabitants.

ARTICLE 3.

"The mandatory shall not establish in the territory any military or naval bases, nor erect any fortifications, nor organize any native military force except for local police purposes and for the defense of the territory.

ARTICLE 4.

"The mandatory:

"(1) Shall provide for the eventual emancipation of all slaves and for as speedy an elimination of domestic and other slavery as social conditions will allow;

"(2) Shall suppress all forms of slave trade;

"(3) Shall prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor except for essential public works and services and then only in return for adequate remuneration;

"(4) Shall protect the natives from measures of fraud and force by the careful supervision of labor contracts and the recruiting of labor;

"(5) Shall exercise a strict control over the traffic in arms and ammunition and the sale of spirituous liquors.

ARTICLE 5.

"In the framing of laws relating to the holding or transfer of land the mandatory shall take into consideration native laws and customs, and shall respect the rights and safeguard the interests of the native population.

"No native land may be transferred, except between natives, without the previous consent of the public authorities, and no real rights over native land in favor of nonnatives may be created except with the same consent.

ARTICLE 6.

"The mandatory shall secure to all nationals of States members of the League of Nations the same rights as are enjoyed in the territory by his own nationals in respect of entry into and residence in the territory, the protection afforded to their person and property, and acquisition of property, movable and immovable, and the exercise of their profession or trade, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

"Further the mandatory shall ensure to all nationals of States members of the League of Nations, on the same footing as to his own nationals, freedom of transit and navigation, and complete economic, commercial, and industrial equality; except that the mandatory shall be free to organize essential public works and services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just.

"Concessions for the development of the national resources of the territory shall be granted by the mandatory without distinction on grounds of nationality between the nationals of all States members of the League of Nations, but on such conditions as will maintain intact the authority of the local government.

"Concessions having the character of a general monopoly shall not be granted. This provision does not affect the right of the mandatory to create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in the interest of the territory under mandate and in order to provide the territory with fiscal resources which seem best suited to the local requirements; or, in certain cases, to carry out the development of natural resources, either directly by the State or a controlled agency, provided that there shall result therefrom no monopoly of natural resources for the benefit of the mandatory or his nationals, directly or indirectly, nor any preferential advantage which shall be inconsistent with the economic, commercial, and industrial equality hereinbefore guaranteed.

"The rights conferred by this article extend equally to companies and associations organized in accordance with the law of any of the members of the League of Nations, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

ARTICLE 7.

"The mandatory shall insure in the territory complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship consonant with public order and morality; missionaries who are the nationals of state members of the League of Nations shall be free to enter the territory and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings and to open schools throughout the territory; it being understood, however, that the mandatory shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government, and to take all measures required for such control.

ARTICLE 8.

"The mandatory shall apply to the territory any general international conventions applicable to his contiguous territory.

ARTICLE 9.

"The mandatory shall have full powers of administration and legislation in the area subject to the mandate. This area shall be administered in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory and subject to the above provisions.

"The mandatory shall therefore be at liberty to apply his laws to the territory subject to the mandate with such modifications as may be required by local conditions and to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal, or administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his sovereignty or control, provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate.

ARTICLE 10.

"The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council. The report shall contain full information concerning the measures taken to apply the provisions of this mandate.

ARTICLE 11.

"The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for the modification of any of the terms of the present mandate.

ARTICLE 12.

"The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations, relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the permanent court of international justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

"The present instrument shall be deposited in original in the archives of the League of Nations. Certified copies shall be forwarded by the secretary general of the League of Nations to all members of the league.

"Done at London, the 20th day of July, 1922."

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The council resolved that owing to the danger to the native populations of central Africa, arising from the scourge of alcoholism, it recommend that the mandatory power do everything possible to protect the said populations from such danger, and that the permanent mandates commission investigate most carefully the measures taken by the mandatory powers in this connection and to report to the council on the application of the provisions in the mandates regarding alcoholism.

FOURTH MEETING (PUBLIC), JULY 18.

JURISDICTION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOR OFFICE OVER QUESTIONS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION.

Mr. Albert Thomas, director of the international labor office of the league, having been invited to the council table in connection with the question of the request of the French Government for a supplementary opinion from the permanent court of international justice as to the jurisdiction of the international labor office in matters relating to agricultural production, stated that the office had never claimed such jurisdiction; that it had discussed the whole question with the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, and had formed a joint commission with that institute for the examination of the question; that he could not see why the French Government had asked that the permanent court be consulted.

He said that the French Government had based its opinion that the labor office was claiming jurisdiction on an amendment to the text of a recommendation concerning the prevention of unemployment in agriculture proposed by Mr. Zumeta during the third session of the international labor conference; that it was clear, however, that this amendment was much more restricted in scope than seemed apparent on first consideration; that it was merely intended that the labor office should examine certain questions of agricultural production closely connected with questions of unemployment in agriculture, but that these questions were considered exclusively in their bearing on labor problems.

Mr. Viviani asked why the labor office should object to the submission of the question to the permanent court if it had never claimed jurisdiction. He said the international labor conference might some day claim jurisdiction; that the French Government was much concerned, the work of some 7,000,000 agricultural laborers being involved; that a formal decision of the court now would remove all difficulties later on.

Mr. Thomas replied that the labor office did not concern itself with the technical problems of agriculture except as they were bound up in problems affecting protection of workers; that the automatic transmission to the court of every request for an opinion would weaken the authority of court and council; that the reference of the present question to the court would be unjust, because it suggested that the labor office had claimed a jurisdiction it had never sought.

Mr. Viviani contended that failure to submit would constitute a dangerous precedent; that if the French Government found it could not appeal to the court other Governments would be discouraged in other cases; that it would be advantageous to ask the court for an opinion which would establish an adjudication to which States could refer.

The council voted to forward the request of the French Government for the opinion to the permanent court.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER NORWEGIAN AND SWEDISH PROCEDURE OF CONCILIATION.

The committee appointed by the council pursuant to the assembly's recommendation of October 4, 1921, and authorized to examine the amendments to the covenant suggested by the Norwegian and Swedish Governments in relation to procedure for conciliation with a view to formulating a body of rules on the subject, reported a draft resolution providing for the voluntary formation of commissions established by conventions between States in dispute, looking to peaceful settlement and providing rules of operation. The draft resolution suggested no amendment to the covenant, but contemplated a machinery to be employed in an attempt at amicable settlement, subject to rights and obligations mentioned in article 15 of the covenant, and before application of said article might become necessary.

FIFTH MEETING (PRIVATE), JULY 19, 1922.

THE "A" MANDATES.

Mr. Viviani asked that the Syrian mandate be discussed before the Palestine mandate, saying the situation would be intolerable for France if the Palestine mandate should be awarded to Great Britain and the discussion of the Syrian mandate postponed, involving administrative difficulties of the gravest nature for the French authorities in Syria.

Lord Balfour replied that the present session was an extraordinary one, called primarily to deal with the Palestine mandate, that he hoped both mandates would be discussed at that session, but did not think the Syrian mandate should be handled first; that he was willing at once, however, to take up the question whether both mandates should be considered during the current session.

The Marquis Imperiali recalled his insistence on the postponement of the Palestine mandate at the last session, so that the Italian and British Governments might exchange views on certain phases of that mandate of serious importance to the former, stating that the exchange had resulted in agreement. He said that he had learned only a few days before that the conversations between the French Government and the United States Government as to the Syrian mandate had been concluded, and that the question would be discussed at the present session; that the mandate was now being debated by the French and Italian Governments; that pending a conclusion he was unable to agree to final action, and asked postponement to allow sufficient time for the exchange of views.

Mr. Viviani replied that this request would precipitate a serious condition for France; that it was nearly two and a half years since the French Government had communicated the Syrian mandate to the Italian Government; that during this time the latter had raised no objections; that the objection now made could refer only to modifications suggested by the United States, which were unimportant and purely matters of detail; that continued delay would have a most prejudicial effect on the territories involved.

The Marquis Imperiali stated that the Italian Government had announced its views on the A mandates two years before; that in its opinion the future of these mandates should be bound up with the fate of the treaty of Sevres, a point of view adopted by the last assembly in accordance with the opinion of the subcommittee on mandates, of which there was a French member. He said that under the circumstances it was but natural that the Italian Government should have awaited a suitable moment to begin conversations on certain points in the mandates between Great Britain and France; that an agreement had been reached with the former, but that before giving his consent to the Syrian mandate, he would have to await the outcome of the conversations now in progress between Italy and France.

Lord Balfour said that when the question came to be discussed in a public session, as would inevitably be the case, he thought the Marquis Imperiali would agree that his position would not favorably impress the public; that the question of the mandates had been delayed more than two years; that there had been no new factors in the problem, no new proposals; that but for the letter in February, 1921, from the Government of the United States, all mandates would have been then and there awarded; that the intervention of the United States had caused a delay in granting the mandates most regrettable from an administrative point of view, a delay, however, which had given the Italian Government even better opportunities than before for making up its mind.

He was surprised to learn that now the Italian Government objected to a discussion of the Syrian mandate; that the Italian Government must have seen in May last that the French contention that it was impossible to bestow one of these mandates and withhold the other on account of the close historical, national, and geographical relations between the two territories made it inevitable that the question of the Syrian mandate would be presented when the Palestine mandate was taken up. He said that further delay would endanger the Palestine mandate; that every possible counter-influence would be encouraged and the gravest difficulties in administration caused; that the league itself would suffer in public estimation. He urged the Marquis Imperiali to withdraw from his position.

The Marquis Imperiali replied that his Government had made its statement as to the extent to which the fate of the treaty of Sevres was bound up with that of these mandates even prior to the discussion aroused by the intervention of the United States; that he could not bind his Government before the council, especially since the question at issue was one of vital policy, and that above all he must carry out his Government's instructions.

After further debate the council decided to suspend consideration of its mandates until the Marquis Imperiali could get in touch with his Government.

SIXTH MEETING (PUBLIC), JULY 19.

ARMED BANDS IN FRONTIER DISTRICTS OF COUNTRIES BORDERING ON BULGARIA.

In reference to the matter of the incursions of armed bands into the frontier districts of countries bordering on Bulgaria, the council, after hearing a report by Viscount Ishii, adopted on his motion a resolution to the effect that having heard explanations by representatives of Bulgaria, Greece, Rumania, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and having learned that direct conversations as to the means of putting an end to these incursions were in progress among the interested Governments who, through their representatives, had declared themselves ready, in case of disagreement, and if the terms of the covenant should become applicable, to bring the question again before the council, the council expressed the hope that these negotiations might result in ending a situation which might endanger peace, and requested the Governments to inform the council at its next session of the result of the negotiations, placing itself at their disposal should intervention again be required to prevent the possibility of a conflict.

AUSTRO-HUNGARIAN FRONTIER; PROTOCOL OF VENICE.

The council, having been invited by virtue of the protocol of Venice, to settle a question submitted to it by the conference of ambassadors as to whether at certain points indicated by the commission for the delimitation of the Austro-Hungarian frontier certain modifications of the frontier should be made, decided to undertake the task, to authorize the secretariat, under the direction of Mr. Hymans, to study the question with the assistance of technical representatives of the two countries concerned, and to place the subject on the agenda of the next session.

SEVENTH MEETING (PRIVATE), JULY 20.

The secretary general announced that it was of the utmost importance that the first amendment to article 6 of the covenant should be ratified by the members of the league before the third assembly—otherwise the assembly would be unable to fix a new scale of allocation of expenses. He requested the representatives of the various countries to draw attention to this situation.

RELIEF OF RUSSIAN REFUGEES AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Doctor Nansen announced that the sum of 30,000 pounds for the evacuation of Russian refugees from Constantinople had been collected, that half this amount had been guaranteed by the American Red Cross, and part had come from private sources. League members contributing were Great Britain, Belgium, China, Brazil, Czechoslovakia, and Switzerland. Japan's subscription of 30,000 yen had been conditioned on contributions by all other council members and had been withheld on failure of the condition. The speaker hoped that more league members would contribute so that the American Red Cross donation might be kept in reserve. He requested and was granted authority to transfer a small balance left in the council fund for repatriation of prisoners to the Russian refugee fund.

EXPENSE OF POLAND-LITHUANIA CONTROVERSY.

The secretary general announced that on June 30 the Polish Government had paid the league 200,000 gold francs, or $39,092.66, its share of funds advanced by the league in connection with the Poland-Lithuania controversy.

FRONTIER BETWEEN HUNGARY AND SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE STATE.

The council, having received from the conference of ambassadors a report of the delimitation commission on the boundary between Hungary and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and having been requested by Hungary to use its good offices in regard to the modifications proposed by the commission, decided to ask Mr. Hymans in consultation with interested parties and with the assistance of the secretariat, to present a statement at the council's next session on the controversial points involved in the possible exercise by the council of its good offices, and to appeal to the good will of the parties in order that this preparatory work might have its effect.

EIGHTH MEETING (PUBLIC), JULY 20.

RUSSIAN REFUGEES IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

Doctor Nansen reported satisfactory progress in his work in the league's name for the evacuation of the Russian refugees in Constantinople and proposed a resolution to the effect that States members of the league, and Governments of all countries interested in the problem of Russian refugees, be requested to adopt the form of identity certificate and the arrangement attached thereto approved by the conference of Government delegates July 3–5, 1922, for their territory and to recognize similar documents issued by other Governments, and to make known their agreement to the secretary general as soon as practicable. The resolution was adopted by the council.

FAMINE IN RUSSIA; PROPOSAL OF NORWAY.

Doctor Nansen presented the proposal of the Norwegian Government for a commission of inquiry into the economic effects of the famine in Russia and into the probability of reestablishing Russian agriculture.

The council, on motion of the Marquis Imperiali, then enacted a resolution authorizing the secretariat to collect, arrange, and tabulate all information obtainable from the various Governments and the different relief organizations and other agencies working in Russia and other possible sources in order to present to the council as complete a summary as practicable of the actual situation in Russia and to make the information accessible to the public. The resolution further provided that on completion of this work, if the information seemed to justify it, a commission of experts should be appointed to study the material thus obtained, with a view to determining the effect of Russian famine on the Russian situation in general and on the financial, economic, and health situation of Europe as a whole, and the connection between Russian conditions and European reconstruction.

HEALTH COMMITTEE OF THE LEAGUE.

Mr. Viviani presented a report on the work of the Health Committee of the League, which had held its third session at Paris, May 11–16, 1922.

On his motion a resolution was passed by the council (1) taking note of the resolutions of the Health Committee joining with the Office International d'Hygiene Publique in requesting the French Government to convene a new international health conference, and calling the council's attention to the necessity of the earliest possible revision of the International Sanitary Convention of 1912; (2) congratulating the committee on epidemiological inquiry in the Near East and assisting authorities on the important results accomplished in so limited a time; (3) pointing out the great importance of the health conference to be convened by the French Government to the nations members of the League; (4) deciding to forward to the Office International d'Hygiene Publique for consideration the preliminary work of the Health Committee on that part of the convention dealing with epidemics in the Near East; (5) authorizing the secretary general to place the technical organizations of the League at the disposal of the French Government and the forthcoming health conference, and expressing the hope that the conference would strengthen the cooperation between the Office International d'Hygiene Publique and the Health Committee of the League of Nations.

On Mr. Viviani's motion the council adopted another resolution stating that the council had considered the correspondence exchanged between the Rockefeller Foundation and the Health Organization of the League of Nations; expressing gratitude to the Rockefeller Foundation for its generous assistance in the constructive work undertaken by the Health Organization; requesting the Health Committee to consider in detail at its next meeting the employment and administration of the funds placed at its disposal by the Rockefeller Foundation for the purposes it had proposed.

SANITARY CONVENTION BETWEEN LATVIA AND POLAND.

The council decided, after having noted the Sanitary Convention between Latvia and Poland submitted to it by the Polish Government, to instruct the health section of the League to receive and distribute all sanitary reports transmitted to the Health Organization of the League under article 5 of the convention as soon as such convention was ratified; also to invite the Health Committee to mediate in case of a difference under article 40 of the convention.

TEMPORARY MIXED COMMISSION FOR REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

In the reference to the temporary mixed commission for reduction of armaments Mr. Viviani stated that its work had to some extent been nullified by events; that he thought reduction would be difficult unless simultaneous and universal; that the league had the difficult duty of working out a plan of disarmament while its members were obliged to look to their national security; that the temporary mixed commission at its fourth session, held in Paris July 3–7, 1922, had two proposals on disarmament before it—that by Lord Esher allowing each nation a certain definitely limited number of army corps, and that of Lord Robert Cecil holding no disarmament possible unless simultaneous and universal.

On behalf of the commission, Mr. Viviani, after presenting its report, moved a resolution to the effect (1) that the council invite the committee on intellectual cooperation to consider methods by which the cooperation of scientific men throughout the world be secured with a view to the publication of their discoveries concerning poisonous gases and the development of chemical warfare in order to reduce the possibilities of the use of poisonous gases; (2) that the council once more urge on league members the importance of the Arms Traffic Convention of St. Germain to the cause of universal peace, requesting those not yet ratifying to do so in order that formal ratifications could be deposited as soon as the principal signatory powers, including the United States, were ready to deposit theirs; (3) that governments not yet sending a statement as to national security, geographical situation, etc., be requested to act before August 15 in accordance with the second assembly's request; (4) that governments not yet replying as to limitation of armaments and military budgets in response to the second assembly's inquiry be requested to take action before August 15; (5) that the council noted the suggestion of the commission that the principle of limitation of naval armaments on which the agreement at the Washington conference was based be studied with a view to its application to all States members of the league; (6) that the permanent advisory commission on armaments be invited to consider from a technical point of view Lord Esher's plan for limitation of land armaments.

The resolution was agreed to and it was decided to notify States members to be prepared to have their delegates discuss the extension of the naval armament limitation of the Washington conference at the next meeting of the assembly.

NINTH MEETING (PRIVATE), JULY 21.

THE "A" MANDATES.

Mr. Fisher suggested that on the following day, Saturday, July 22, the Palestine mandate be discussed at a private meeting, final approval to be reserved for a public meeting on Monday morning, July 24, the understanding being that the Palestine and Syrian mandates would be considered together. The Marquis Imperiali called attention to the position in which he was placed on account of the ministerial crisis in Italy, made no objection to the public meeting, but asked that the state of Italian public opinion be kept in mind.

Mr. Fisher's suggestion was adopted.

ARMENIA.

Mr. Hymans announced that he had been visited by certain Armenian delegates who had asked him to request the council to call the attention of the powers to the condition of their country and to the need of establishing a national home for the Armenians, who had expressed the fear that on account of the stress laid on the rights of minorities the main issue, national independence, might be neglected.

Mr. Fisher stated the powers were aware of the difficult situation of Armenia; that the league's sympathy for Armenia had always been widely known; that the Armenian problem was one of the main difficulties of the oriental question and must always be considered in connection with the affairs of the Near East; that the council should hesitate to approach the Governments when it had no practical solution to offer; that the council could not well receive deputations not strictly official.

The secretary general stated that, in accordance with the assembly's decision, the secretariat was continuing to consider the Armenian question and to collect all available documentary information; that the secretariat could receive the Armenian delegates and obtain the information they brought.

No action was had by the council beyond taking note of the announcement of Mr. Hymans.

TENTH MEETING (PUBLIC), JULY 21.

PROVISIONAL ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. Viviani made a report covering the recent session of the provisional economic and financial committee at Geneva in June.

As to the economic section, he submitted a resolution approving its efforts and inviting it to continue them, giving special attention to the matters submitted to the league by the economic committee of the Genoa conference.

As to the financial section, he proposed resolutions:

(1) Stating that the council considers the financial section especially fitted to aid in solving international monetary problems without interfering with Governments or other organizations, and invites it to consider methods best suited to foster monetary stability and to avoid difficulties caused by too abrupt changes in value of currency, and too rapid deflation;

(2) Inviting the secretariat to ask a certain number of States for information concerning evasion of taxes, communicating to them the text of a resolution by the Genoa conference on this subject, and asking the opinion of these States as to the advisability of international conventions on this problem;

(3) Congratulating the economic and financial committee of the league on the recognition by the Genoa conference of the value of the committee's publications on public finances and approving the committee's work in connection with current publications and those in preparation;

(4) Approving the transfer to Geneva from London of the department of international credits and putting its administration in the hands of the secretary general; also joining the committee in thanks to Mr. Le Neveu for his faithful and active assistance to the international credits department from its beginning;

(5) Deciding that in future expense of special investigations by the international credits department in any country should be met by its Government;

(6) Thanking the committee for its unceasing efforts to save Austria—stating that the financial scheme adopted was universally regarded as sound—that certain obstacles still barred the way, but they were obstacles no one had yet been able to surmount;

(7) Approving acceptance of arbitration function for league in connection with loan of Baring Bros. to Czechoslovakia;

(8) Approving measures taken by the financial section as to Albania, instructing the expert it sent there to report on the general situation, indicating the best method of appointment of a financial adviser by the league in conjunction with the Albanian Government.

THE GENOA CONFERENCE AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Referring to the many important matters submitted to the league by the Genoa conference—such as customs treaties and conventions, trade arbitration, treatment of foreigners in conduct of business, migration of capital, evasion of taxes, international credits, questions of communication and transit, anti-epidemic campaign, etc.—the Marquis Imperiali, in his report on this subject, pointed out that the Genoa conference had given new evidence of the confidence of the Powers in the league. His report was received and noted.

ELEVENTH MEETING (PRIVATE), JULY 22.

THE "A" MANDATES.

The Marquis Imperiali announced that the Italian Government would agree to the Syrian mandate on receipt of assurances from the French Government similar to those received in connection with the Palestine mandate from the British Government.

Lord Balfour stated the general feeling that the adoption of one of these mandates depended on the adoption of the other, and suggested that pending a settlement between the French and Italian Governments the council discuss article 14 of the Palestine mandate, the only point in that mandate which had not been agreed upon.

This course was followed. Article 14 related to religious claims and rights in Palestine. It provided that in order to determine existing rights in the holy places and religious buildings or sites in Palestine, which the mandatory was pledged under article 13 to maintain, a commission of not less than seven members should be appointed by the mandatory subject to the approval of the council of the League of Nations, that the commission should frame a report defining such rights, including rights of ownership, user, and access, the report to be laid before the council, and when confirmed by that body to be binding on the mandatory.

Objection was made to this article on the ground that it was too vague as to the religious faith of the majority, that a majority might under its terms be of a single religion, and that the commission might set up temporarily a new régime in religious customs, reversing the practices of centuries and causing serious complications.

Debate continued and no action was taken at this meeting.

TWELFTH MEETING (PRIVATE), JULY 22.

"A" MANDATES ADOPTED FOR PALESTINE AND SYRIA.

Discussion of the Palestine mandate was resumed.

The president of the council proposed that article 14 be revised so as to provide that a special commission should be appointed by the mandatory to study and define the rights and claims in connection with the holy places, and the rights and claims relating to the different religious communities in Palestine, that the method of nomination, the composition and the functions of this commission should be submitted to the council of the league for its approval, the commission not to be appointed or to enter on its functions until approved by the council. This revision was accepted.

It was understood that the council would at a later session determine the method of appointment of members of the commission, its constitution and duties.

The council decided to approve the mandate for Palestine with the revised text of article 14, and to approve the mandate for Syria, the latter to come into effect automatically as soon as the French and Italian Governments reached an agreement. It was also decided that both mandates would come into effect simultaneously.

THIRTEENTH MEETING (PUBLIC), MONDAY, JULY 24, 1922.

COMMENTS ON WORK OF LEAGUE; THE "A" MANDATES; ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. Viviani said that it was a great day for the League of Nations when in addition to its other achievements it made practical application of the mandate principle; that when the war ended the Great Powers had not wished as in the past violently to annex territories and to oppress their inhabitants; that the mandatory would take the inhabitants under its protection, administer the territories in the interest of all, and would be responsible to the council and the assembly until these people were able to conduct their affairs without further assistance.

He said that the league had made considerable progress since its beginning less than three years before; that the Brussels conference had put forward useful economic and financial principles; that the Permanent Court of International Justice had been set up; that the question of Upper Silesia had been amicably settled; that the league's various committees were at work, and that the league had made this record under conditions without precedent in history.

Lord Balfour indorsed Mr. Viviani's tribute to the league, saying that it had been in existence only a short while but had already done a great work, a work too often overlooked by the public.

The Syrian and Palestine mandates, he said, had been approved at last. He pointed out that the Palestine mandates had two parts, one relating to Palestine and its inhabitants, the other to the holy places. As to the latter, further discussion would be had, long historical controversies being involved requiring careful and earnest consideration. It was the desire of the British Government to administer historic justice as between the communities concerned, to deprive no community of its ancient rights or to overlook the religious interests involved.

Controversies had arisen, he continued, over the first part, also, the part relating to Palestine itself, controversies encouraged by the long delay in settling the mandates. It was claimed that the interests of the Arabs had been neglected but that most anxious attention had been accorded the position and interests of the Arab populations by the British Government, there being no wish or intention that the provision of a Jewish home in Palestine should in any way injure Arab interests. The greatest precaution had been taken to see that the Jewish home project would in no way encroach on the interests or susceptibilities of any part of the population. The course contemplated by the British Government would advance the material prosperity and moral interests of all the people concerned. He appealed for harmony. Discussion and dispute had been inevitable and legitimate while the mandate was being developed, and now that it had been settled it would be a crime to encourage animosities in Palestine and throughout the world by emphasizing racial, religious, and historical differences.

The Marquis Imperiali thought that an agreement would soon be reached between the Italian and French Governments on the Syrian mandate.

The council again approved the mandates for Syria and Palestine, stipulating that they should go into force automatically and at the same time as soon as the Governments of Italy and France notified the president of the council that an agreement had been reached. The council also decided that the next session should be held on August 30, to solve the questions submitted for its decision under article 14 of the Palestine mandate.

The nineteenth session of the council then came to an end.

In order that an accurate idea may be had of the Palestine and Syrian mandates, known as "A" mandates, I shall set them out in full as an appendix to my remarks.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator have those mandates read at the clerk's desk? They come so well in connection with what the Senator is so eloquently presenting that if they could be read at the desk instead of being printed, Senators would more fully understand the situation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have not asked that they be printed in the RECORD. I intend to read such parts as I think are of significance.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will have them all read.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In describing the council proceedings of December 17, 1920, in my address to the Senate of October 5, 1921, I set out in full one of the "C" mandates. In the present address I have already quoted one of the "B" mandates.

It will be helpful to note, in connection with the subject of mandates, the contents of article 22 of the league covenant, the article defining the spirit and purpose of the mandatory system, and I shall therefore include this article in the appendix with a word of explanation.

This brings the work of the league to July 24, 1922.

I have not had opportunity to bring the account further at this time, but I hope to carry it forward so as to cover the third assembly before the present Congress adjourns, or in the next Congress.

It is apparent that the work of the league within the scope assigned it by the covenant has continued to grow in usefulness and helpfulness to mankind.

It has settled controversies, notably those of Upper Silesia and the Albanian frontier, which might have developed into conflicts of alarming proportions and possibilities.

It has kept a restraining hand and a watchful eye on the long quarrel between Poland and Lithuania, with the result that open hostilities have on many occasions been averted.

Its greatest creation, the Permanent Court of International Justice, has been in operation for a year and gives every promise of permanence, affording history's first illustration of a world court on lasting foundations—the realization of one of the sublimest dreams of the ages.

It has examined and confirmed nearly all the mandates under which the allied powers are administering the vast territories which changed hands as a result of the World War, thus assuring for the first time in history the administration of territory taken through war as a sacred trust for civilization, in the supreme interest of the inhabitants, protecting them against exploitation and oppression, and with a view to their final control of their own countries—administration on a basis of just laws and equal opportunities under the observation of an impartial world tribunal to which annual reports are to be made—administration in the spirit of the league covenant, the spirit of the Lord of Lords and King of Kings.

It has continued to administer with success neutral territories, such as the Saar Basin and the free city of Danzig, assigned it for administrative supervision by the Treaty of Versailles, and has thus kept in peaceful condition areas that would have been sources of danger to international relations.

It has continued to discharge with efficiency and vigilance the task of securing the protection of minorities in various parts of the world—another function assigned it by the Versailles treaty.

It has systematized and coordinated, on a scale more effective than has heretofore been possible, the struggle of private organizations and governments against the emanation from infected sections of epidemics which threaten the world.

It is directing with increasing effectiveness world efforts against the traffic in habit-forming drugs and the traffic in women and children, two of the chief curses of humanity.

Its labor office continues to enlist nation after nation in the crusade to secure better conditions for the toilers on whose shoulders rests the gigantic and complicated structure of modern civilization.

It has instituted a scientific study of the question of armaments, assembling definite information regarding the situation of each country as to national security, resources, etc.—information essential to any general plan of disarmament or limitation of armament.

It has given comprehensive attention to the question of the world's economic reconstruction developing at the Brussels Conference which it called in 1920, a declaration of principles constituting the last word in sound finance and practical monetary legislation, and also developing the only system of international credits, the ter Meulen plan, which has met the general approval of the business world, including the World Cotton Conference and our own Federal Reserve Board.

Above all, it remains the chief hope of mankind for universal peace, the first example in history, as I have before pointed out, of an organization embracing nearly all the civilized countries devoted to the abolition of war, and giving every indication of steady and beneficent growth.

The fact that the United States still stands aloof from the league while the rest of the world is making so heroic an effort to combat the principal menaces of humanity continues to be one of the overshadowing tragedies of all time.

APPENDIX.

I.—BRITISH MANDATE FOR PALESTINE—(AN "A" MANDATE).

The Council of the League of Nations:

Whereas the principal allied powers have agreed, for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, to entrust to a mandatory selected by the said powers the administration of the territory of Palestine, which formerly belonged to the Turkish Empire, within such boundaries as may be fixed by them; and

Whereas the principal allied powers have also agreed that the mandatory should be responsible for putting into effect the declaration originally made on November 2, 1917, by the Government of His Britannic Majesty, and adopted by the said powers, in favor of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, it being clearly understood that nothing should be done which might prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country; and

Whereas, recognition has thereby been given to the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine and to the grounds for reconstituting their national home in that country; and

Whereas the principal allied powers have selected His Britannic Majesty as the mandatory for Palestine; and

Whereas the mandate in respect of Palestine has been formulated in the following terms and submitted to the Council of the League for approval; and

Whereas His Britannic Majesty has accepted the mandate in respect of Palestine and undertaken to exercise it on behalf of the League of Nations in conformity with the following provisions; and

Whereas by the aforementioned article 22 (paragraph 8), it is provided that the degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised by the mandatory, not having been previously agreed upon by the members of the league, shall be explicitly defined by the council of the League of Nations;

Confirming the said mandate, defines its terms as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The mandatory shall have full powers of legislation and of administration, save as they may be limited by the terms of this mandate.

ARTICLE 2.

The mandatory shall be responsible for placing the country under such political administrative and economic conditions as will secure the establishmnet of the Jewish national home, as laid down in the preamble, and the development of self-governing institutions, and also for safeguarding the civil and religious rights of all the inhabitants of Palestine, irrespective of race and religion.

ARTICLE 3.

The mandatory shall, so far as circumstances permit, encourage local autonomy.

ARTICLE 4.

An appropriate Jewish agency shall be recognized as a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the administration of Palestine in such economic, social, and other matters as may affect the establishment of the Jewish national home and the interests of the Jewish population in Palestine, and, subject always to the control of the administration, to assist and take part in the development of the country.

The Zionist organization, so long as its organization and constitution are in the opinion of the mandatory appropriate, shall be recognized as such agency. It shall take steps in consultation with His Britannic Majesty's Government to secure the cooperation of all Jews who are willing to assist in the establishment of the Jewish national home.

ARTICLE 5.

The mandatory shall be responsible for seeing that no Palestine territory shall be ceded or leased to, or in any way placed under the control of the government of any foreign power.

ARTICLE 6.

The administration of Palestine, while insuring that the rights and position of other sections of the population are not prejudiced, shall facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions and shall encourage, in cooperation with the Jewish agency referred to in Article 4, close settlement by Jews on the land, including State lands and waste lands not required for public purposes.

ARTICLE 7.

The administration of Palestine shall be responsible for enacting a nationality law. There shall be included in this law provisions framed so as to facilitate the acquisition of Palestinian citizenship by Jews who take up their permanent residence in Palestine.

ARTICLE 8.

The privileges and immunities of foreigners, including the benefits of consular jurisdiction and protection as formerly enjoyed by capitulation or usage in the Ottoman Empire, shall not be applicable in Palestine.

Unless the Powers whose nationals enjoyed the aforementioned privileges and immunities on August 1st, 1914, shall have previously renounced the right to their reestablishment, or shall have agreed to their nonapplication for a specified period, these privileges and immunities shall, at the expiration of the mandate, be immediately reestablished in their entirety or with such modifications as may have been agreed upon between the Powers concerned.

ARTICLE 9.

The mandatory shall be responsible for seeing that the judicial system established in Palestine shall assure to foreigners, as well as to natives, a complete guarantee of their rights.

Respect for the personal status of the various peoples and communities and for their religious interests shall be fully guaranteed. In particular, the control and administration of Wakfs shall be exercised in accordance with religious law and the disposition of the founders.

ARTICLE 10.

Pending the making of special extradition agreements relating to Palestine, the extradition treaties in force between the mandatory and other foreign powers shall apply to Palestine.

ARTICLE 11.

The administration of Palestine shall take all necessary measures to safeguard the interests of the community in connection with the development of the country, and, subject to any international obligations accepted by the mandatory, shall have full power to provide for public ownership or control of any of the natural resources of the country or of the public works, services, and utilities established or to be established therein. It shall introduce a land system appropriate to the needs of the country, having regard, among other things, to the desirability of promoting the close settlement and intensive cultivation of the land.

The administration may arrange with the Jewish agency mentioned in article 4 to construct or operate, upon fair and equitable terms, any public works, services, and utilities, and to develop any of the natural resources of the country, in so far as these matters are not directly undertaken by the administration. Any such arrangements shall provide that no profits distributed by such agency, directly or indirectly, shall exceed a reasonable rate of interest on the capital, and any further profits shall be utilized by it for the benefit of the country in a manner approved by the administration.

ARTICLE 12.

The mandatory shall be intrusted with the control of the foreign relations of Palestine and the right to issue exequaturs to consuls appointed by foreign powers. He shall also be entitled to afford diplomatic and consular protection to citizens of Palestine when outside its territorial limits.

ARTICLE 13.

All responsibility in connection with the holy places and religious buildings or sites in Palestine, including that of preserving existing rights and of securing free access to the holy places, religious buildings and sites and the free exercise of worship, while insuring the requirements of public order and decorum, is assumed by the mandatory, who shall be responsible solely to the League of Nations in all matters connected herewith, provided that nothing in this article shall prevent the mandatory from entering into such arrangements as he may deem reasonable with the administration for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this article into effect; and provided also that nothing in this mandate shall be construed as conferring upon the mandatory authority to interfere with the fabric or the management of purely Moslem sacred shrines, the immunities of which are guaranteed.

ARTICLE 14.

A special commission shall be appointed by the mandatory to study, define, and determine the rights and claims in connection with the holy places and the rights and claims relating to the different religious communities in Palestine. The method of nomination, the composition and the functions of this commission shall be submitted to the Council of the League for its approval, and the commission shall not be appointed or enter upon its functions without the approval of the council.

ARTICLE 15.

The mandatory shall see that complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, are insured to all. No discrimination of any kind shall be made between the inhabitants of Palestine on the ground of race, religion, or language. No person shall be excluded from Palestine on the sole ground of his religious belief.

The right of each community to maintain its own schools for the education of its own members in its own language, while conforming to such educational requirements of a general nature as the administration may impose, shall not be denied or impaired.

ARTICLE 16.

The mandatory shall be responsible for exercising such supervision over religious or eleemosynary bodies of all faiths in Palestine as may be required for the maintenance of public order and good government. Subject to such supervision, no measures shall be taken in Palestine to obstruct or interfere with the enterprise of such bodies or to discriminate against any representative or member of them on the ground of his religion or nationality.

ARTICLE 17.

The administration of Palestine may organize on a voluntary basis the forces necessary for the preservation of peace and order, and also for the defense of the country, subject, however, to the supervision of the mandatory, but shall not use them for purposes other than those above specified save with the consent of the mandatory. Except for such purposes, no military, naval, or air forces shall be raised or maintained by the administration of Palestine.

Nothing in this article shall preclude the administration of Palestine from contributing to the cost of the maintenance of the forces of the mandatory in Palestine.

The mandatory shall be entitled at all times to use the roads, railways, and ports of Palestine for the movement of armed forces and the carriage of fuel and supplies.

ARTICLE 18.

The mandatory shall see that there is no discrimination in Palestine against the nationals of any State, member of the League of Nations (including companies incorporated under its laws) as compared with those of the mandatory or of any foreign State in matters concerning taxation, commerce, or navigation, the exercise of industries or professions, or in the treatment of merchant vessels or civil aircraft. Similarly, there shall be no discrimination in Palestine against goods originating in or destined for any of the said States, and there shall be freedom of transit under equitable conditions across the mandated area.

Subject as aforesaid and to the other provisions of this mandate, the administration of Palestine may, on the advice of the mandatory, impose such taxes and customs duties as it may consider necessary, and take such steps as it may think best to promote the development of the natural resources of the country and to safeguard the interests of the population. It may, also, on the advice of the mandatory, conclude a special customs agreement with any State the territory of which in 1914 was wholly included in Asiatic Turkey or Arabia.

ARTICLE 19.

The mandatory shall adhere on behalf of the administration of Palestine to any general international conventions already existing, or which may be concluded hereafter with the approval of the League of Nations, respecting the slave traffic, the traffic in arms and ammunition, or the traffic in drugs, or relating to commercial equality, freedom of transit and navigation, aerial navigation, and postal, telegraphic, and wireless communication, or literary, artistic, or industrial property.

ARTICLE 20.

The mandatory shall cooperate on behalf of the administration of Palestine, so far as religious, social, and other conditions may permit, in the execution of any common policy adopted by the League of Nations for preventing and combating disease, including diseases of plants and animals.

ARTICLE 21.

The mandatory shall secure the enactment within 12 months from this date, and shall insure the execution of a law of antiquities based on the following rules. This law shall insure equality of treatment in the matter of excavations and archæological research to the nationals of all States members of the League of Nations.

(1)

"Antiquity" means any construction or any product of human activity earlier than the year 1700 A. D.

(2)

The law for the protection of antiquities shall proceed by encouragement rather than by threat.

Any person who, having discovered an antiquity without being furnished with the authorization referred to in paragraph 5, reports the same to an official of the competent department, shall be rewarded according to the value of the discovery.

No antiquity may be disposed of except to the competent department, unless this department renounces the acquisition of any such antiquity.

No antiquity may leave the country without an export license from the said department.

(4)

Any person who maliciously or negligently destroys or damages an antiquity shall be liable to a penalty to be fixed.

(5)

No clearing of ground or digging with the object of finding antiquities shall be permitted, under penalty of fine, except to persons authorized by the competent department.

(6)

Equitable terms shall be fixed for expropriation, temporary or permanent, of lands which might be of historical or archæological interest.

(7)

Authorization to excavate shall only be granted to persons who show sufficient guarantees of archæological experience. The administration of Palestine shall not, in granting these authorizations, act in such a way as to exclude scholars of any nation without good grounds.

(8)

The proceeds of excavations may be divided between the excavator and the competent department in a proportion fixed by that department. If division seems impossible for scientific reasons, the excavator shall receive a fair indemnity in lieu of a part of the find.

ARTICLE 22.

English, Arabic, and Hebrew shall be the official languages of Palestine. Any statement or inscription in Arabic on stamps or money in Palestine shall be repeated in Hebrew and any statement or inscription in Hebrew shall be repeated in Arabic

ARTICLE 23.

The administration of Palestine shall recognize the holy days of the respective communities in Palestine as legal days of rest for the members of such communities.

ARTICLE 24.

The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council as to the measures taken during the year to carry out the provisions of the mandate. Copies of all laws and regulations promulgated or issued during the year shall be communicated with the report.

ARTICLE 25.

In the territories lying between the Jordan and the eastern boundary of Palestine as ultimately determined, the mandatory shall be entitled, with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations, to postpone or withhold application of such provisions of this mandate as he may consider inapplicable to the existing local conditions, and to make such provision for the administration of the territories as he may consider suitable to those conditions, provided that no action shall be taken which is inconsistent with the provisions of articles 15, 16, and 18.

ARTICLE 26.

The mandatory agrees that, if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 27.

The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of this mandate.

ARTICLE 28.

In the event of the termination of the mandate hereby conferred upon the mandatory, the Council of the League of Nations shall make such arrangements as may be deemed necessary for safeguarding in perpetuity, under guarantee of the league, the rights secured by articles 13 and 14, and shall use its influence for securing, under the guarantee of the league, that the Government of Palestine will fully honor the financial obligations legitimately incurred by the administration of Palestine during the period of the mandate, including the rights of public servants to pensions or gratuities.

The present instrument shall be deposited in original in the archives of the League of Nations and certified copies shall be forwarded by the secretary general of the League of Nations to all members of the league.

Done at London the twenty-fourth day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

II.—FRENCH MANDATE FOR SYRIA AND THE LEBANON—(AN "A" MANDATE).

The Council of the League of Nations:

Whereas the principal allied powers have agreed that the territory of Syria and the Lebanon, which formerly belonged to the Turkish Empire shall, within such boundaries as may be fixed by the said powers, be entrusted to a mandatory charged with the duty of rendering administrative advice and assistance to the population, in accordance with the provisions of article 22 (paragraph 4) of the covenant of the League of Nations; and

Whereas the principal allied powers have decided that the mandate for the territory referred to above should be conferred on the Government of the French Republic, which has accepted it; and

Whereas the terms of this mandate, which are defined in the articles below, have also been accepted by the Government of the French Republic and submitted to the Council of the League for approval; and

Whereas the Government of the French Republic has undertaken to exercise this mandate on behalf of the League of Nations, in conformity with the following provisions; and

Whereas by the aforementioned article 22 (paragraph 8), it is provided that the degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory, not having been previously agreed upon by the members of the league, shall be explicitly defined by the Council of the League of Nations;

Confirming the said mandate, defines its terms as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The mandatory shall frame, within a period of three years from the coming into force of this mandate, an organic law for Syria and the Lebanon.

This organic law shall be framed in agreement with the native authorities and shall take into account the rights, interests, and wishes of all the population inhabiting the said territory. The mandatory shall further enact measures to facilitate the progressive development of Syria and the Lebanon as independent States. Pending the coming into effect of the organic law, the Government of Syria and the Lebanon shall be conducted in accordance with the spirit of this mandate.

The mandatory shall, as far as circumstances permit, encourage local autonomy.

ARTICLE 2.

The mandatory may maintain its troops in the said territory for its defense. It shall further be empowered, until the entry into force of the organic law and the reestablishment of public security, to organize such local militia as may be necessary for the defense of the territory, and to employ this militia for defense and also for the maintenance of order. These local forces may only be recruited from the inhabitants of the said territory.

The said militia shall thereafter be under the local authorities, subject to the authority and the control which the mandatory shall retain over these forces. It shall not be used for purposes other than those above specified save with the consent of the mandatory.

Nothing shall preclude Syria and the Lebanon from contributing to the cost of the maintenance of the forces of the mandatory stationed in the territory.

The mandatory shall at all times possess the right to make use of the ports, railways and means of communication of Syria and the Lebanon for the passage of its troops and of all materials, supplies, and fuel.

ARTICLE 3.

The mandatory shall be entrusted with the exclusive control of the foreign relations of Syria and the Lebanon and with the right to issue exequaturs to the consuls appointed by foreign powers. Nationals of Syria and the Lebanon living outside the limits of the territory shall be under the diplomatic and consular protection of the mandatory.

ARTICLE 4.

The mandatory shall be responsible for seeing that no part of the territory of Syria and the Lebanon is ceded or leased or in any way placed under the control of a foreign power.

ARTICLE 5.

The privileges and immunities of foreigners, including the benefits of consular jurisdiction and protection as formerly enjoyed by capitulation or usage in the Ottoman Empire, shall not be applicable in Syria and the Lebanon. Foreign consular tribunals shall, however, continue to perform their duties until the coming into force of the new legal organization provided for in article 6.

Unless the powers whose nationals enjoyed the aforementioned privileges and immunities on August 1, 1914, shall have previously renounced the right to their reestablishment, or shall have agreed to their nonapplication during a specified period, these privileges and immunities shall at the expiration of the mandate be immediately reestablished in their entirety or with such modifications as may have been agreed upon between the powers concerned.

ARTICLE 6.

The mandatory shall establish in Syria and the Lebanon a judicial system which shall assure to natives as well as to foreigners a complete guarantee of their rights.

Respect for the personal status of the various peoples and for their religious interests shall be fully guaranteed. In particular, the control and administration of Wakfs shall be exercised in complete accordance with religious law and the dispositions of the founders.

ARTICLE 7.

Pending the conclusion of special extradition agreements, the extradition treaties at present in force between foreign powers and the mandatory shall apply within the territory of Syria and the Lebanon.

ARTICLE 8.

The mandatory shall insure to all complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality. No discrimination of any kind shall be made between the inhabitants of Syria and the Lebanon on the ground of differences in race, religion, or language.

The mandatory shall encourage public instruction, which shall be given through the medium of the native languages in use in the territory of Syria and the Lebanon.

The right of each community to maintain its own schools for the instruction and education of its own members in its own language, while conforming to such educational requirements of a general nature as the administration may impose, shall not be denied or impaired.

ARTICLE 9.

The mandatory shall refrain from all interference in the administration of the councils of management (Conseils de fabrique) or in the management of religious communities and sacred shrines belonging to the various religions, the immunity of which has been expressly guaranteed.

ARTICLE 10.

The supervision exercised by the mandatory over the religious missions in Syria and the Lebanon shall be limited to the maintenance of public order and good government; the activities of these religious missions shall in no way be restricted, nor shall their members be subjected to any restrictive measures on the ground of nationality, provided that their activities are confined to the domain of religion.

The religious missions may also concern themselves with education and relief, subject to the general right of regulation and control by the mandatory or of the local government, in regard to education, public instruction, and charitable relief.

ARTICLE 11.

The mandatory shall see that there is no discrimination in Syria or the Lebanon against the nationals, including societies and associations, of any State member of the League of Nations as compared with its own nationals, including societies and associations, or with the nationals of any other foreign State in matters concerning taxation or commerce, the exercise of professions or industries, or navigation, or in the treatment of ships or aircraft. Similarly, there shall be no discrimination in Syria or the Lebanon against goods originating in or destined for any of the said States; there shall be freedom of transit, under equitable conditions, across the said territory.

Subject to the above, the mandatory may impose or cause to be imposed by the local governments such taxes and customs duties as it may consider necessary. The mandatory, or the local governments acting under its advice, may also conclude on grounds of contiguity any special customs arrangements with an adjoining country.

The mandatory may take or cause to be taken, subject to the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, such steps as it may think best to insure the development of the natural resources of the said territory and to safeguard the interests of the local population.

Concessions for the development of these natural resources shall be granted without distinction of nationality between the nationals of all States members of the League of Nations, but on condition that they do not infringe upon the authority of the local government. Concessions in the nature of a general monopoly shall not be granted. This clause shall in no way limit the right of the mandatory to create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in the interest of the territory of Syria and the Lebanon, and with a view to assuring to the territory the fiscal resources which would appear best adapted to the local needs, or, in certain cases, with a view to developing the natural resources either directly by the State or through an organization under its control, provided that this does not involve either directly or indirectly the creation of a monopoly of the natural resources in favor of the mandatory or its nationals, nor involve any preferential treatment which would be incompatible with the economic, commercial, and industrial equality guaranteed above.

ARTICLE 12.

The mandatory shall adhere, on behalf of Syria and the Lebanon, to any general international agreements already existing, or which may be concluded hereafter with the approval of the League of Nations, in respect of the following: The slave trade, the traffic in drugs, the traffic in arms and ammunition, commercial equality, freedom of transit and navigation, aerial navigation, postal, telegraphic, or wireless communications, and measures for the protection of literature, art, or industries.

ARTICLE 13.

The mandatory shall secure the adhesion of Syria and the Lebanon, so far as social, religious, and other conditions permit, to such measures of common utility as may be adopted by the League of Nations for preventing and combating disease, including diseases of animals and plants.

ARTICLE 14.

The mandatory shall draw up and put into force within twelve months from this date a law of antiquities in conformity with the following provisions. This law shall insure equality of treatment in the matter of excavations and archæological research to the nationals of all States members of the League of Nations.

(The eight subdivisions under this article are the same as under the article relating to excavations in the Palestine mandate.)

ARTICLE 15.

Upon the coming into force of the organic law referred to in article 1, an arrangement shall be made between the mandatory and the local governments for reimbursement by the latter of all expenses incurred by the mandatory in organizing the administration, developing local resources, and carrying out permanent public works, of which the country retains the benefit. Such arrangement shall be communicated to the council of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 16.

French and Arabic shall be the official languages of Syria and the Lebanon.

ARTICLE 17.

The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council as to the measures taken during the year to carry out the provisions of this mandate. Copies of all laws and regulations promulgated during the year shall be attached to the said report.

ARTICLE 18.

The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of this mandate.

ARTICLE 19.

On the termination of the mandate, the Council of the League of Nations shall use its influence to safeguard for the future the fulfillment by the Government of Syria and the Lebanon of the financial obligations, including pensions and allowances, regularly assumed by the administration of Syria or of the Lebanon during the period of the mandate.

ARTICLE 20.

The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by Article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

The present instrument shall be deposited in original in the archives of the League of Nations and certified copies shall be forwarded by the secretary general of the League of Nations to all members of the league.

Done at London on the 24th day of July, 1922.

III.—ART. XXII OF THE LEAGUE COVENANT RELATING TO MANDATES.

To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.

The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations, who, by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.

The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized, subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of a mandatory.

Other peoples, especially those of central Africa, are at such a stage that the mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience or religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic, and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and for the defense of the territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the league.

There are territories such as South-West Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands which owing to the sparseness of their population or their small size or their remoteness from the centers of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the mandatory, and other circumstances can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

In every case of mandate the mandatory shall render to the council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the league, be explicitly defined in each case by the council.

A permanent commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the mandatories and to advise the council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.

IV.—A, B, AND C MANDATES.

The mandates covering the communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire and referred to in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the league covenant set out above have been further defined by the council as the A mandates, those covering territories of Central Africa mentioned in the fifth paragraph of article 22 as the B mandates, and those including territories of South-West Africa and certain South Pacific Islands specified in the sixth paragraph of said article as the C mandates.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am always sorry to differ with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He and I have served the public here together, or have attempted to serve it, for something like 28 years. We have been very warm personal friends and we have agreed, upon the whole, in opinion and in policies; but I must take issue with some things that he said upon yesterday.

I agree to the general idea, of course, that this is a Government of majorities and minorities. That is a truism in any properly organized democracy. But in order to apply it we must determine what majorities and what minorities we are talking about. The majority in a democracy which rules, or ought to rule, is a majority of the people, and not an accidental or incidental left-over majority in either one of the two Houses of Congress or in both of them. When it comes to the question of the justification of Federal legislators delaying legislation, an inquiry into that source and nature of majorities is the very keystone of all of it.

Mr. President, this is the only democratic country in the world where, after the people have spoken at an election and have clearly indicated that they do not want certain legislation, a majority of left overs—"lame ducks," as they are popularly called, why I never knew—can proceed to put over legislation for the express purpose of defeating the will of the people before the new representatives recently elected to take their places can take their seats and be sworn in. There are enough of the "left overs" to hold the balance of power in the voting.

Mr. President, I voted for the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] providing for a submission to the people of a constitutional amendment for the purpose of changing the time of the meeting of the two Houses of Congress. I have been here now for nearly 30 years, and I have found that nearly every piece of bad legislation and about half of the crooked legislation is always "put over" at the short session of a Congress, after that Congress is about ready, or a great many Members of it are about ready, to go out of office. I am speaking without any bad feelings, for Senators all know I am about ready to go out myself; but, Mr. President, when a man is going out of office, especially if he go out by defeat, there is a certain degree of iron in his soul.

He feels not only a lack of responsibility to a constituency which he thinks has rebuked him or removed him, but he feels to a certain degree in many cases a feeling of anger; in all cases, however, there is a lack of responsibility.

The defect of the American Government as compared with parliamentary democracies all over the world is this: In any other democracy—Great Britain or Canada or Australia or Cape Colony or France, I care not which one be taken—after an election those just elected to the legislature all go into office almost immediately and the will of the people as expressed at the election is enacted into legislation immediately, or very soon. One of the defects that our forefathers left in our institution was the so-called left-over session of Congress.

Mr. President, while I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Alabama that the majority ought to rule, I say that he has what logicians call an ambiguous middle when he speaks that way; he is referring to a majority of the two legislative bodies, but the maxim refers to a majority of the people and their representatives. When he says that a majority of the representatives of the poeple must be heard, that is also true; but not a majority of the misrepresentatives of the people or not a majority of which the misrepresentatives of the people hold a balance of power. Undoubtedly a man who has been defeated is a misrepresentative of his constituency in the opinion of that constituency. Whether properly or improperly, wisely or foolishly, that is their opinion. A man voluntarily retiring is no longer responsible to any constituency, because he expects no future reward and no future punishment. If there be any responsibility, it is that of a high-minded man who wishes to do the right thing as thoroughly as if he had anticipation of punishment or reward before him.

Mr. President, I do not believe that "filibustering," as it is called, is ever justified except in two classes of cases: One of them the Senator from Alabama illustrated when he filibustered against the so-called antilynching bill, because that was a bill which proposed to make murder in a State a Federal offense punishable by a Federal court. Of course, if we once step out on the pathway of making common crimes within the States punishable entirely in the Federal courts, or chiefly there, or at all, we shall have deprived the States of their very life, which is their police power. Whatever else might have been said and however great the abuses which ought to be corrected—and they are great, and I regret them, especially in so far as they apply to my own section—the remedy was not in placing the police power of the States in the hands of the Federal Government. I have grown sick and tired of lynching bees, even if they were justified in some cases, perhaps, or if not justified extenuated by the nature and the gravity of the crime which led and provoked the people to act, as was the case long ago in the history of California, when the Vigilantes acted; but there is no excuse where there is organized government for lynching people for ordinary crimes, whether they be white people or black people or red people or Mongolian people. Rape, to my mind, is the only crime I can now think of which extenuates, if not excuses, it. But a vast majority of the lynchings are not for rape. I say I especially regret that part of it which applies to my section, but I regret it all over the country, and I am sorry to say that it exists all over the country. The only difference is that when a northern mob goes out for a criminal it is not satisfied with getting the criminal and punishing him, but it punishes all of his race, religion, or type against whom the prejudice exists or may, by the passion aflame on the occasion, be aroused at the time.

Mr. President, that was one instance where a filibuster is justified, because I think as we stand here as ambassadors of the States in a Congress, just as much so as delegates in a European congress, where the powers are met in concert, are ambassadors from their several governments, and it is our duty, therefore, to protect the State's rights of our constituents. It is a mistake to assume that there are no States' rights left. They are rapidly disappearing, but there are some yet remaining. Wherever a great, vital, fundamental constitutional question is presented and a majority is trying to override the organic law of the United States, then, I repeat, a filibuster is justified. That was the case to which the Senator from Alabama referred.

But there is another class of cases, and that is when an accidental and incidental temporary majority in a legislative body tries to forestall the future and defeat the will of the majority of the people as expressed at an election, and as will be expressed by a majority of their recently elected representatives. I dare say there is not a man in this body who will have the hardihood to say that the ship subsidy bill can pass through the next Congress. If there be one who has that amount of hardihood, who is capable of that degree of recklessness of assertion, I should like to hear him now tell me that he thinks I am mistaken about it. Ah, Mr. President, the very reason why this bill is being pushed along to a conclusion at this tail end of an expiring Congress, where the "left overs" hold the balance of power, is because every man, from the President in the White House down to the pages upon the floor of the legislative halls, knows that it can not be passed in the next and recently elected Congress of the United States fresh from the people.

I do not believe in delaying legislation. As the Senator from Alabama said, the legislature "must function"; that is true; but it does not follow that it must function in order to put over things to keep a fair expression of the will of the people, as expressed at the last election, from being functioned. Why do you want to put this bill over at this session? Because if you once get it upon the statute books, it can not be repealed so long as the present administration is in power, at any rate, because the law repealing it could be and would be vetoed, as everybody knows, and it would take not a majority but two-thirds of both Houses to override the veto. That is the reason. Let us speak plainly to one another and let us speak honestly and candidly to the country.

The Senator from Alabama said that the tariff act recently passed, in his opinion, would do more harm than the shipping bill, if enacted. I shall not discuss that assertion, but, grant that it be true, the difference is this: There was a mandate of the people for the passage of the tariff law, however mistaken that mandate may have been. But there is a mandate of the people against the passage of this law, however mistaken that mandate may be. If this be a country where the majority ought to rule, then I can plant myself much more stably upon that principle than the Senator from Alabama can plant himself while I am taking my present position and he is taking his.

Mr. President, the immorality of this thing is great, if you think of it as a political philosopher loving democracy. It is unethical and immoral to put this legislation over at this session of Congress. It is treason to the spirit of democracy; that is what it is. There ought to be some way by law to punish it, but there is not. Then, what is the next best thing? It is to prevent it. Prevent it how? By every means within your power; that is all. How else are you going to rebuke an act of treason to the spirit of democracy which is yet legal, technically lawful, but which, once accomplished, can not be undone for a long time?

Mr. President, that is not all. If this bill went upon the statute books, not only could the President veto it as long as his term continued, or, if reelected, during another four years, but such is the nature of our politics in America that after you get through another election nobody could say whether the affirmative or the negative side of the ship-subsidy contention had won; there would be so many other issues involved, some of them overshadowing and outbalancing it. The only way you could tell would be by seeing whether a majority of the newly elected Members were in favor of or opposed to the legislation; that would be all, and even then some of them holding one opinion might have been elected upon some other issue. Still, Mr. President, the fact remains that when you do find out that a majority of the newly elected legislators are opposed to it, as is the case right now, then there can be no question of what the will of the people is upon that issue.

I would not have stood here to attempt to delay the passage of the tariff bill, as bad as I thought it was, and as bad as I think the American people ultimately will find it to be, because the principle of the right of the majority to rule did apply in that case, and it was not an accidental, nor an incidental, nor a temporary majority, and it was passed by those who were the representatives of the people upon that question, and were sent here to do that thing among other things; and, to use the language of the Senator from Alabama, these two bodies had a right on that issue to function. Function how? As representatives of the people. They had not been superseded. But misrepresentatives of the people have no right to function, if I can help it, on a question where they are misrepresentatives. Your neighbors to the north of you—the Canadians—stare almost paralyzed with wonderment at the spectacle of a democracy whose popular will as expressed at an election can not be put upon the statute books; aye, whose popular will as expressed at an election can be defeated by left-over misrepresentatives before the real representatives of the people can begin to "function."

That is the difference between the Senator from Alabama and me, and I am awfully sorry to have had to express it. There are few here I love better. He came into public life at the other end of this Capitol only two or four years—I have forgotten which—after I did. We have been working in unison ever since, as far as I know, and as far as I can remember now I believe this is the first great question we have ever differed about—the first fundamental difference of opinion or of policy, either one. He possesses a head that is exceedingly level, and it is very rarely, indeed, that anything carries him wrong, but it has carried him wrong this time. As a logician he is deficient. He has used an ambiguous middle. He has talked about the sacredness of the majority, when he does not tell what a majority is. The majority which is sacred is a majority of the electorate, and the legislative majority which is sacred is that which is representative of the electorate, and not that which has been left at home, either by voluntary retirement or by defeat for nomination or for election.

In order that it may impress itself upon the country, I again say that this effort to pass this bill at this session is immoral and unethical, because it is an attempt to "put over" legislation that the recently elected and true representatives of the people do not want and to rush it through before they can begin to function as the Members of either House; and to impress the other point I repeat that, in my opinion, there is not a man within the sound of my voice with the hardihood even to pretend to believe, even to assert that he does believe, that if this legislation does not pass at this session it will pass the next Congress.

Mr. President, if that were true, the special interests that are so much in favor of this bill would not be so anxious to put it over now. They would know that all they had to do was to wait a short time, and it would go through the next Congress. They would know, moreover, that the present incumbent of the White House—a man whom I like very much personally—would not hesitate to call an extra session to have it enacted. It would not be a month before it would go on the statute books, or two months at the most. Now, let us deal honestly with one another and with the people. Is not that true? Does anybody deny it?

Mr. President, bad as this ship subsidy bill is, if conditions were such that it could be heard upon its merits—or rather on its demerits, because it has no merits—by the representatives of the people really representing the people's views upon that particular subject, I would not attempt to delay it. I say this, though, I think it is about the worst thing that could be conceived of. I am opposed always to taxing all the people in order to give the taxes to a part of the people, no matter what the circumstances are, except in cases of great suffering, natural catastrophes, like earthquakes and fires, where charity is appealed to, and not justice.

Those cases are somewhat different; but here gentlemen propose deliberately to subsidize an industry so well protected already by law, so completely fenced in and buttressed about in its special privileges that in several lines of its operations it is a monopoly. It has by nature the monopoly of the lakes and the rivers, and we give it by law the monopoly of the coastwise trade, with all the incidents that follow, to the benefit not only of the masters and owners of ships but of the American builders of them, whereas Great Britain would allow me or the Senator from North Carolina to-morrow, if we chose, to sail or steam a ship from Glasgow to London at the mouth of the Thames and engage in fair competition publicly with any shipowner of its land. Here is a class of people who have been protected already far beyond their deserts, and yet they are seeking more. Then gentlemen tell me: "Well, if you do not give it to them, we will spend more money the way we are doing now than this would come to." My answer is that all you have got to do is to stop it. Quit spending that money and quit it now. Do not keep it as a losing game and purposely continue as a losing game for the purpose of forcing opinion to a ship subsidy.

One more point: A sort of pseudopatriotism is appealed to every now and then. "You want to ship your cotton and your wheat in a cargo boat that is flying the flag of the American Republic." Well, other things being equal, yes; I would rather help a neighbor than an outsider; but the interest that my cotton has and that the Northwestern farmer's wheat has in this controversy is getting to the consumer as quickly and as cheaply as possible. Moreover, Mr. President, all the subsidies in the world are not going to build up in the immediate future any American merchant marine. Why? Because the American boy is not going to do that sort of work. As long as he can get more profitable employment on land, he would rather leave it to Norwegians and Swedes and Dutchmen and Englishmen and Scotchmen. It is true you might pass a law, and have done it, saying that a certain proportion of the sailors shall be American citizens, but the result would be nothing but this: You would find that a majority of the so-called American citizens serving as sailors were naturalized foreigners, and then you would find that the balance, not required to be citizens, were unnaturalized foreigners.

There was a time when young boys now and then liked to go to sea out of romance. I passed through that period once myself, from reading Fenimore Cooper's novels, and Dana's Two Years Before the Mast, and various things of that sort; but that sort of literature has ceased to be popular now even with that sort of reader, so you can not even rely upon sentiment—outside of a few fishing villages in New England, perhaps—to furnish any American men for sea service outside of the Navy, where genuine patriotism and not pseudopatriotism makes an appeal.

Why should a boy want to leave his mother, his sisters, his sweetheart, and probably his wife to live one of the hardest lives in the world, with food not too good, with atmosphere to breathe at night not too unlimited in amount nor pure in character and under a discipline harsh and rigorous, when he could stay on land and earn more money, and be near his kith and kin, with his feet upon his native sod? Do you think you can furnish enough money to overcome that; and do you think that if you once did furnish money enough for you to seem to be overcoming it, all the other nations in the world would not begin to issue subsidies as effective as yours or a little bit more so? It would be the old endless race over again, only in peace instead of in preparation for war, of one nation building more battleships and enlisting more soldiers, and another at the very next meeting of its legislative assembly capping them, "calling the bluff"—the old endless race in armor and armament and land and sea forces. It would be the same thing for a merchant marine race.

You need not think, because the balance of the world just now looks as if it were a bit bankrupt, or nearly bankrupt, and you have money untold in your Treasury and almost unrealizable in potentiality, that therefore they will not spend money to keep you from pushing them out of a legitimate business. They will do it if they have to economize on something more important. Not only is their pride enlisted, but if you take countries like Holland and Norway and Great Britain and several others which I might name, the very livelihood of a great number of their people is enlisted.

For every dollar you put down they could put down a half a dollar, and a half a dollar would go just about as far with them in operating ships as a dollar will with you; or, if that is an overstatement, 75 cents would undoubtedly go just as far. They could put less money down and still be equal with you in the results attained.

But I did not intend to discuss the merits of the bill, or rather, its demerits, because it has no merits, except in the eyes of its beneficiaries, and except in the eyes of gross, maudlin sentimentalists, who think that a flag sanctifies a bushel of wheat or a bale of cotton carried behind it. I did not intend to discuss the bill. I merely intended to make a reply to the line of argument made by my friend from Alabama, which, in my opinion, is not only illogical and mistaken, but would lead to positively unethical political results.

Another Senator says that he fears that if we delay this legislation we might be understood as denying or delaying other legislation. Of course, we can not help what somebody may think, but anybody who would think that can not have very much sense. The thing that is denying and delaying other legislation is the keeping of this bill constantly before this body. The real filibuster in this case is this procedure, and the chief and head of the filibusters is the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who obstinately keeps this legislation before this body all the time, thereby denying an opportunity to the Senate to pass other measures which the people are in favor of. I do not use the word "filibuster" in any insulting or offensive sense, but it has been hurled at men over here, and my friend from Montana says he fears we will be thought guilty of filibustering against other measures. The people who are filibustering against other measures are the men who are keeping this—oh, I started to use an adjective—this measure before this body. They can not plead that they are ignorant of the fact that if they keep this thing up to the end of the session a great many meritorious bills will have to fail. They know it just as well as I do, and if the people have not sense enough to learn it, then they have not sense enough for self-government, and the whole thing might as well go to pot; we might just as well stop the experiment of self-government.

The Senator from Alabama said that one reason why nobody ought to delay the ship subsidy bill was that it was an appropriation for a specific purpose. I would like to know what could be a more indefinite utterance than that. An appropriation; yes. How much? For a specific purpose; yes. What specific purpose? As long as you leave that statement out in the open by itself, subject to be rained upon and snowed upon, it is the most defenseless thing I have witnessed in a long, long time, and when you begin to define it you find there is nothing to it. Of course, everything is an appropriation "for a specific purpose," if it is an appropriation at all. The specific purpose in the heart of the beneficiary in this case is to put money in his purse, and if he does not know how to put it in by honest thrift and industry in open competition, to put it in by taxing my constituents, the farmers of Mississippi, black and white, poor as they can be, the darkies especially, when that beneficiary is rich already. Where is the man who is going to build a ship who is not already worth a quarter of a million or half a million?

"An appropriation for a specific purpose." It is the specific purpose which makes it hellish, and it is the fact that it is an appropriation that makes it a steal. There might be an appropriation for the specific purpose of helping the starving somewhere, in Europe or here at home, and this phrase would apply to it as well as to any other legislation I could conceive of which costs the Government a dollar.

The antilynching bill would have involved sooner or later "an appropriation for a specific purpose," the specific purpose of depriving the States of jurisdiction over cases of murder, because, after all is said or done, a man who is lynched is murdered, and that which can legally be said of those who have lynched him is that in the law they are murderers. If we started once to giving the Federal Government jurisdiction over murder, I do not know where we would stop in the catalogue of crime.

We would go next, I suppose, to arson, and after that to rape, and after that to grand larceny, and in the course of time we would get down to petty larceny. I know a distinction in grade, but I do not know any distinction in character or kind between crimes which have uniformly and universally been supposed to be punishable by the States under their police powers. Yet, if we start out on that pathway we will not only have appropriations for specific purposes but we will have very numerous and very large ones for a great many specific purposes.

Mr. President, I expect I owe somewhat of an apology for having spoken at this time. I have been feeling exceedingly badly all day long. My chief occupation for about a week has been blowing my nose, now and then interrupted by a sneezing spell, and to-day I have a little, dull, mean, bad headache with it, which makes me feel peculiarly stupid. In fact, I do not know of any physical ailment that attacks a man's mind quite as quickly as having his nose stopped up; and if I have not done my subject justice, please attribute it to the fact that my nose is not disciplinable.

REMOVALS FROM THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I regret to refer to the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] in his absence. Some time ago, however, I introduced a resolution asking for an investigation touching the discharge of the director and 27 chiefs of divisions in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. They were discharged by an Executive order with the statement that it was "for the good of the service," an indictment against them both as to honesty and efficiency. After months of investigation the President gave out an indefinite interview to the effect that possibly in the future he might make a statement. In the meantime he permitted three women, who for 25 or 30 years had toiled faithfully for the Government, to creep back into the Government's employ at half their former salaries, while he put in their former places men of no experience and in some cases men of no character.

Recently the President issued another order restoring to the civil service status the remaining people whom he had stricken from the rolls, with two exceptions, one, Doctor Beach, who had been killed by this unjustifiable charge, the other, the former director, Mr. Wilmeth, whom he seeks to punish because Wilmeth comes from my State. He has such little respect for other men's reputations that he is willing to damn for all time to come the reputation of Mr. Wilmeth because he imagines thus he is punishing me. Oh, Mr. President, if he wanted to strike me, why did he not strike me and not attempt to do so through a helpless individual who can not strike back?

I said the other day that this discharge was for a division of spoils, and that among the people who were the beneficiaries were some of the Senators who were blocking the investigation. The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] immediately asked if I was talking about him. He guessed correctly, because I was talking about him.

I have here a statement which I shall put in the RECORD when the Senator from New York is present, which tends to show that he in fact was awarded one of the places. I thought he got that as his part of the spoils, and now he helps to deny an investigation.

Honestly, now, I think he is inconsistent.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I wish to file a report on behalf of the Judiciary Committee on a certain resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me withdraw that consent until the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is present. He wants to have something to say. That is on the child-labor question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall have to refuse to yield until the Senator from North Carolina is present, because I know he wants to say something about it. The Senator will pardon me for not yielding?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was about to say that the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], whom I like, who is a delightful, pleasant gentleman, was named the other day by General Cronkhite, who says he helped smother an investigation into the charges against Captain Rosenbluth, whom he thinks killed his son; and when that charge was made, Senator CALDER said last night that he was willing that there should be an investigation so that all might know he was innocent of this charge, but he smothers an investigation where 28 men and women are laboring under a charge and denies them a forum in which they may be heard to vindicate their names against this charge made against them. He is quick to say, "I am willing to have an investigation of the killing of Major Cronkhite, when they say I induced the Attorney General to desist in the probe to determine who was guilty of the murder. I am willing that there should be a thorough investigation"; but when 28 men and women who are helpless ask and plead for an investigation, he will not let them have it because he does not want to embarrass the President, I understand he says.

I do not know what representations were made to the President to induce him to do this unthinkable thing of striking down the reputations of 28 men and women who heretofore have lived lives that entitled them to the respect and confidence of those who knew them. I do not know what representations were made to him, but I shall always believe, whatever the denials may be, that it was a political doling out of patronage to which the President yielded. I have said let them take the offices. I do not complain about that. Let them have the offices, but let them take them like spoilsmen that they are, and let the administration dole them out as the spoils broker that it is and not take them by robbing the men of their reputations.

This afternoon the President gave out an interview that I shall read. It appears in the Evening Star of this date, and is headed:

Ousted bureau officials will be denied old jobs. President Harding feels no regret over changes and feels matter now closed incident.

I do not think he feels any regret over the incident, because he belongs to that school of politicians who think, if a place is to be had, his friends should get it, whatever the means, and have no regret. He wanted those places for people, some of them, I fear, here in the Senate, who were demanding the jobs for their henchmen, and he now says, "Why, of course, we got the offices. What regret should I feel?"

In the interview he is quoted as saying:

President Harding feels no regret over the changes made at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, has "laid all his cards" before the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses, and probably will make no further statement in the matter.

I do not know what cards he laid on the table before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but I do know, even though he is the President of these United States, that when he does a thing in secret that injures another man he ought not to be content to lay his cards in secret before a secret committee and then say, "I have nothing further to say." Lay them on the table before the public, which is his master and mine, and let the public judge and not let a committee that he knows will not report the resolution and will not make public the facts which he is supposed to have revealed. I understand—and there is a member of that committee sitting present to correct me if I am misinformed—that while he permitted everybody who wanted to crawl up out of the filth and cast their aspersions upon the character of these men to appear before the committee and to make charges indefinite and vague and principally by insinuation, yet when the men and women whose characters have been besmirched pleaded at the committee door to be heard they were denied.

It was explained that the committee was sitting like a grand jury; it would seem like a packed grand jury.

I continue to read:

In making this known at the White House to-day it was said that the President feels that restoration of the civil service status of the dismissed employees was sufficient to satisfy their claims, in the absence of any specific charges against them.

Oh, my goodness, Mr. President, to tell a man he may get a job if he can find it is not sufficient. When he has done that it is sufficient, although he struck them down when they had a job and destroyed their right to be reemployed when they were employed; that because he made no specific charges against them, it is sufficient because a year later he says, "If you can find some other place to work I am satisfied, and if you can not you can starve, and it does not concern me." I am sure the American people will be shocked to know that that is the sentiment of the President of the United States toward the people whom he has ruined.

But that is not all. I read further:

The President was also represented as feeling that it was "neither possible nor desirable" to restore any of the dismissed chiefs to their positions in the bureau.

Whether the Senate committee before which the President laid his facts, according to the statement to-day at the White House, will ever make public further details was problematical. It was thought, however, in view of the developments to-day, that no more official statement may be expected on the dismissals of March 31, last year.

I continue reading the article:

Chairman CALDER of the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses, following a conference with President Harding at the White House to-day, indicated that the committee might make no report of any kind on the Caraway resolution to investigate the Bureau of Engraving and Printing dismissals.

Hearings have been concluded, Senator CALDER said, the committee calling in only one witness, Charles B. Brewer, special investigator of the Department of Justice. No witnesses were called to represent the dismissed employees, the Senator said. His committee was sitting in the nature of a "grand jury," it was explained, and, although having concluded its hearings, had not definitely decided what to do about it.

The probability is, however, the Senator intimated, that there will be no report at all. "It would be a serious thing," he said, "to investigate the President."

Oh, yes; it would, Mr. President, but the most serious charge ever made against the President of the United States is made in the statement which is quoted from the Senator from New York, that the President has been guilty of some act that it would be a "serious" offense to let the public know what it was the President did. I have said some things that were not exactly complimentary about the President, and suppressed a good many I wanted to say, but I have never thought, much less ever said, anything that so reflects upon the President as his particular friend, who is smothering the resolution to which I have referred. He said, and I want to quote it, because it is in his own language:

It would be a serious thing to investigate the President.

He knows what the President has done, because the President said he has told him, and he knows it. But he said that he will not permit others to know what the President said, because "it would be a serious thing to investigate the President."

Reading further from the article:

Wide difference of opinion exists in the Senate committee, Senator CALDER admitted, over the value of Brewer's testimony. Senator MCKELLAR, Democrat, Tennessee, member of the committee, has stated that Brewer failed utterly to substantiate the charges upon which it is alleged President Harding based his action.

Senator MCKELLAR was understood to-day to be still intent on doing further justice to the dismissed employees, and meant to try to get through the committee a proposed bill to pay the dismissed persons all back pay for the time since March 31, when they were let out, and, further, to replace them in positions similar to those from which they were dismissed.

I shall not read the remainder of the interview. I ask permission to insert the entire interview in my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUSTED BUREAU OFFICIALS WILL BE DENIED OLD JOBS—PRESIDENT HARDING FEELS NO REGRET OVER CHANGES AND FEELS MATTER NOW CLOSED INCIDENT.

President Harding feels no regret over the changes made at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, has "laid all his cards" before the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses, and probably will make no further statement in the matter.

In making this known at the White House to-day, it was said that the President feels that restoration of the civil-service status of the dismissed employees was sufficient to satisfy their claims, in the absence of any specific charges against them.

The President was also represented as feeling that it was "neither possible nor desirable" to restore any of the dismissed chiefs to their positions in the bureau.

Chairman CALDER, of the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses, following a conference with President Harding at the White House to-day, indicated that the committee might make no report of any kind on the Caraway resolution to investigate the Bureau of Engraving and Printing dismissals.

No witnesses were called to represent the dismissed employees, the Senator said. NO REPORT LIKELY.

The probability is, however, the Senator intimated, that there will be no report at all. "It would be a serious thing," he said, "to investigate the President."

Wide difference of opinion exists in the Senate committee, Senator CALDER admitted, over the value of Brewer's testimony. Senator MCKELLAR, Democrat, Tennessee, member of the committee, has stated that Brewer failed utterly to substantiate the charges upon which it is alleged President Harding based his action.

Senator MCKELLAR was understood to-day to be still intent on doing further justice to the dismissed employes, and meant to try to get through the committee a proposed bill to pay the dismissed persons all back pay for the time since March 31, when they were let out, and, further, to replace them in positions similar to those from which they were dismissed.

Whether Senator CALDER conferred with the President over this phase of the situation it was not learned to-day.

Brewer's testimony impressed members of the committee in various ways, Senator CALDER indicated. The chairman himself had entered the "grand jury" hearings on the Caraway resolution with an open mind, he said, and had learned from Brewer many valuable things, but added that his mind was still open on the question.

From confidential sources close to the committee it was learned further to-day that Brewer was not only asked to present his case, but that he was severely cross-examined by members of the committee as to the reasons why he had gathered the charges which were presented to President Harding, and upon which the President acted, without the knowledge and advice of Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Brewer was an early caller at the White House to-day. He refused to discuss his mission there or to make any statement on the Bureau of Engraving matter. Upon leaving the White House he was photographed for the first time since his implication in the bureau matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. I rose to inquire how the resolution reached the committee of which the able Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] is chairman, and, secondly, if I may be permitted to ask two questions, if it did reach that committee properly, and I assume that it did, what reason has the committee to smother an investigation of a matter which obviously, under all the facts known to the public and known to the Senate, does demand an exhaustive inquiry?

Mr. CARAWAY. There were about two dozen Senators who objected to its immediate consideration, so it went to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The reason why that committee smothered it is plain. I shall read again from the language of the chairman of that committee, though I read it a moment ago. Here it is again:

It would be a serious thing to investigate the President.

That is the reason why the committee smothered it, because he said, "It would be a serious thing to investigate the President." The resolution did not necessarily mean to investigate the President. The resolution asked that we might know why these people were dismissed, what their reputations and characters were, and what are the reputations and characters of the individuals whom the President put in their places. Now, the Senator from New York said it would be a serious thing to investigate the President. The committee, as I understand, stood on a division on purely political lines. The committee consists of Mr. CALDER, of New York, as chairman; Mr. KEYES, of New Hampshire; and Mr. MCCORMICK, of Illinois; and then the two Democrats, Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. MCKELLAR, of Tennessee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point will he yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator whether, under the procedure of the Senate as he understands it and under the rules of the Senate as he interprets them, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have the right to deny an investigation? My understanding is, by way of interrogation, that they have the right merely to determine whether or not the funds are available to pay for the inquiry. If the object of the inquiry is at all legitimate, and it is for the Senate to determine that question, it is their duty to report back the resolution. Is not that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the way they have treated every resolution heretofore; but this resolution, for the reasons I have explained, is one tending to prevent people getting together to share the spoils in the way of a division of offices, so I suppose they feel they ought to stand together. Here are 28 helpless men and women, who have spent a lifetime in faithful service as employees of the Government. They have been despoiled of their right to make an honest living. They have had their characters besmirched and reputations destroyed, and yet the people who profit thereby will not even give them back their reputations. They will be compelled to go on down through the years with the finger of suspicion pointed at them. One of them is already dead, having died of a broken heart.

But this I wish to emphasize. Mr. Wilmeth is to be denied restoration altogether, because he comes from my State and I had the bad taste to say anything about his removal. Therefore he is to be perpetually barred because I have offended the President by calling the attention of the country to his unwarranted removal of these people. Mr. Wilmeth went into the Government employ as a messenger. For 30 years he toiled upward, with never a charge against him at any time by anybody. He is never to be restored, because he comes from my State.

Doctor Beach, 30 years with the Government, an educated, cultivated gentleman, was taken out of a little position when he was old, when he was getting $1,600 a year, and sent to his grave with a broken heart, and his place filled by a politician from Pennsylvania at $3,000 a year—a man who had no civil-service status at all and never had been in the employ of the Government before.

Mr. Wilmeth was removed, a man of high character, a Christian gentleman, and in his place was put a Mr. Hill, a man whose wife was then suing him for divorce. Among all the other unmentionable charges against Mr. Hill, which have never been denied so far as I know and have subsequently been sustained by proof, was that he has a daughter who is about grown, and he had the brutality to beat her in the face with his fist because she protested against the life he was living and the indignities he was heaping upon her mother.

Well, I do not much blame them not to want to air the reputation of Mr. Hill, whom the President put in charge of the bureau which has in it more women than are in any other division of the Government; but there are other things about Mr. Hill, to a few of which I wish to call attention.

I want to make the paper which I am preparing to read really interesting. I wish to call attention to the fact that Mr. Hill and his wife were separated, were living separated and apart; that he had thrown the furniture into the street, so that the family could not live with him; no member of his family I am informed, is living with him; and yet I have here the order which he gave for an automobile with certain equipment to which I wish to call attention. I am going to suppress the name of the automobile company to which the order was given, for I do not wish to do them an injury, but I have a copy of the order here and any Senator will be at liberty to see it.

Mr. Hill was appointed director of the bureau on the 1st day of April, 1922. On the 27th day of June following he made this requisition for an automobile, which he wished the Government to buy for him.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me first read this requisition.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. CARAWAY. By way of explanation, I desire to say that the Government is expected to furnish the director of the bureau an automobile. This is the automobile for which Mr. Hill asked, and its equipment is what I wish to call to the attention of the Senate. The order is dated June 27, 1922.

I will leave off the name of the company, which is here. I shall also leave off the name of the car, because otherwise it could be identified. Mr. Hill wanted:

One * * * four-door, six-passenger sedan; equipped with cord tires, motometer, and bar cap—smoking set, lady's vanity case.

[Laughter.]

I pause to ask who the lady is who was to use the vanity case? Hill was separated from his wife; she was not using the car with him. He had beaten up his daughter as though she were a slave, and she would not ride with him; and yet he wanted his automobile equipped with a lady's vanity case!

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will yield merely for an inquiry.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean that Congress appropriated money for a car for a man of that character and for a man holding that office?

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, Congress does not appropriate the money for that particular purpose.

Mr. KING. However, we provided this car?

Mr. CARAWAY. Congress provides the funds and they are used to buy cars.

I desire to digress here long enough to say that Mr. Mellon, in my judgment, however one may criticize his views, is a real man. Of all the master minds, not even excluding Doctor Sawyer, I think that Mellon is the best appointment the President made; and I have in mind that he also appointed Harry Daugherty when I make that statement. However, Mr. Mellon turned this order down, lady's vanity case and all, because Mellon could not understand what Hill needed with a vanity case for a lady when his wife would not live with him. So he did not get the vanity case nor the smoking set.

Mr. Ashworth was also dismissed. He was a man who had been for about 30 years in the employ of the Government. He was at the head of the division which had the custody—he is called the custodian—of dies, rolls, and plates.

He had under his care all the plates from which bonds and currency and stamps are printed and all the rolls and dies. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon he had a letter of commendation from the Treasury Department. It came about in this way: Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury must have a committee appointed once a year to check up that division to ascertain if the custodian has been faithful in his duty as custodian of the rolls and dies and plates. That committee had just concluded its investigation and made its report. Not only had his work been satisfactory but it had been so satisfactory that it transmitted to him a letter of commendation for the intelligent and faithful discharge of his duties. That letter reached him at 4 o'clock. At 6 o'clock he was dismissed from his place and put out of the service altogether "for the good of the service." Let us see what "the good of the service" meant. In his place was put a man named McCauley. McCauley's wife was then suing him for divorce on statutory grounds, naming about half a dozen ladies—well, other folks—as corespondents. Among the exhibits in this case Mrs. McCauley filed with her complaint was a letter that McCauley had written to a 15-year-old girl here in the District, asking her to meet him on Pennsylvania Avenue at 4 o'clock, and that he would give her the money and direct her to a doctor. We all know why she was to go to a doctor. That is the man who was put in the place of Mr. Ashworth "for the good of the service."

As to Mr. Perry, the man who comes from Brooklyn and the man who I think stands in the way of this investigation, his wife had a divorce from him, I am informed. In other words, the notice ought to read: "No man who is living with his own wife need apply, because there will be no place for him. None but 'gentlemen' who have beaten up their daughters and who have debauched children and divorced their wives or been divorced by their wives need apply for employment in this bureau."

Mr. Perry had some other qualifications. He had been dismissed from the service because he was a bookmaker and had solicited gambling bets from other employees, and yet "for the good of the service" he was installed as the custodian of this most important bureau.

I am not through with Mr. Hill, although I think that possibly he has had all the notoriety he is entitled to receive.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield for an inquiry.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean to state to the Senate that the President of the United States is retaining these men in office and keeping out of office men of the character to which the Senator has referred who for 30 years earnestly devoted themselves to the discharge of their duties?

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, and also women who had toiled up through the years—and the Senator knows what discriminations have been practiced against women in public employment until recently—who had gone in there as girls and had toiled until their hair was as white as the driven snow; women against whom never a word had been uttered until the President of these United States struck their reputations down in the dark with a statement that they were dismissed "for the good of the service," and then allowed like whipped slaves to crawl back into public employment at half their former salary, while men of the character I have described were given their places.

I have another interesting document here that will show why Hill was appointed. It is a photostatic copy. It reads:

Republican State Voters' Association in the District of Columbia.
Application for membership.
Make checks payable to the Republican State Voters' Association.
Republican State Voters' Association.
Temporary headquarters, 808 Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.
I hereby apply for ——— membership in ——— the Republican State Voters' Association.

Then the applicant states what kind of membership he will take; he may be an active member or he may be a half member or he may be a sustaining member, which, I presume, is a "boss"; I do not know what else a "sustaining member" would be.

Then the important thing follows:

I inclose check (or currency) in the amount of $——— for the payment of my dues, pro rata, for the period January 1 to June 30, 1923, consisting of one-half the regular annual dues of the association applicable to my membership.

Here the contributing member will choose whether he will become an active or a half-active or a supporting or a sustaining member. The paper continues:

I am a Republican—

He must say that—of the city or town—

He must name that—and county—

Naming that—

and State—

Naming that.

He must also tell in what congressional district he originally had his residence and what voting precinct or ward. Then—

My business or occupation is—

So he must set down here whether he has charge of one machine or another. Then the blank says:

Recommended by L. A. Hill.

Mr. Hill, of course, is the director of the bureau.

In other words, he is having given to every man and woman in the bureau this blank, and they are required to fill it out and contribute toward a campaign fund for some purpose, which is presumed to be to elect Republicans.

The matter does not stop there, but I shall put the other document which I have in mind in the RECORD a little bit later, but not to-day.

After these people had contributed or not contributed, it has been told me, then somebody was to visit each Republican Member of the Senate and each Republican Member of the House and report the names of those who are from his State or district and whether they have contributed all they ought to have contributed. Some have already been visited. And in return for all that Mr. Hill and Mr. McCauley and Mr. Perry and all of that other bunch are to be kept in office. There is a community of interest. "Contribute to the fund and then tell your Senator what State you are from and that you vote the Republican ticket there, and for him to keep us in"; and they will do it until the people get a chance in another election.

That is not all of this interesting document:

If in any branch of the public service, complete the following statements:

I am employed in _____ _____ Government department. Title of position.

The status of my Government employment is _____.
(Classified civil service, unclassified civil service, presidential appointee, elective office) _____

And so on, and so on.

If elected to membership, I agree to support the constitution and observe the by-laws of the association.

Here he signs, and then here is something else:

OFFICE RECORD.

Examined by membership committee _____. Elected to membership _____.
Reported to executive committee _____. Membership card No. _____.
Action by executive committee _____. Membership card mailed _____.

Why, I presume no man could get back to his desk and go to work if he did not have a membership card from Mr. Hill's Republican bureau, showing that he had paid his dues as a half member at least, and if he wants to be promoted he had better be a sustaining member.

Here, on the back of that interesting thing, is article 2 of the constitution:

MEMBERSHIP.

(Definition of classes.)

SEC. 2. The membership of this association shall be of five classes: Active, registered, sustaining, contributing, and honorary.

I presume Mr. Hill is an honorary member.

SEC. 3. Active members in this association shall have the right to vote and a voice in its management, and such other privileges and benefits as prescribed by this constitution.

SEC. 4. Registered members of this association, both sustaining and contributory, who are in the classified service shall take no active part in the management of the association or of its partisan objects, but will otherwise enjoy the privileges and benefits of the association as prescribed in its constitution.

That is, the right to contribute, and the right to hold a job as long as they do contribute.

There is some more of it.

SEC. 5. Sustaining members in this association shall be those active or registered members who pay voluntarily—

I want you to notice that:

Who pay voluntarily.

The other fellow did not pay voluntarily. He paid because they made him pay or lose his job; but—

Sustaining members in this association shall be those active or registered members who pay voluntarily such dues as are hereinafter prescribed by this constitution.

Do you imagine that there was not something meant by that word "voluntarily"? The other fellow was not a voluntary payer at all. He paid because he had a job, and Mr. Hill was the director, and Mr. Hill was organizing and circulating in his department this document; but if you are not employed by the Government, then you may pay voluntarily.

SEC. 6. Contributing members in this association shall be those active or registered members who voluntarily subscribe any sum in excess of $20, biennially, to the association.

SEC. 8. Applications for membership shall be made to the association, setting forth that the applicant is a Republican, the legal residence, Washington address, and character and place of official or business employment. Application shall be referred to the membership committee of the association, whose report thereon shall be submitted to the executive committee and acted upon at its next regular meeting, unless otherwise determined, by a majority vote of those present.

ARTICLE IV OF THE CONSTITUTION.

DUES.

SECTION 1. The annual dues for active membership shall be $3.

SEC. 2. The annual dues for registered membership shall be $2.

SEC. 3. The annual dues for class A—sustaining membership—shall be $10. The annual dues for class B—sustaining membership—shall be $5.

SEC. 4. The fiscal year of this association shall begin on the 1st day of July.

SEC. 5. All dues are payable from July 1, annually in advance, unless otherwise provided for by the executive committee for the period prior to July 1, 1923.

SEC. 6. Payment of membership dues, as hereinbefore prescribed, satisfies obligations to this association, and no increase of dues nor assessments for any purpose shall be made during the period for which membership dues have been paid in advance. No form of coercion shall be used in obtaining or maintaining membership.

Is not that a wonderful thing that they are not going to coerce you? But, you know, it says that you shall be recommended, and on this blank it says:

Recommended by L. A. Hill.

So everybody in his bureau is to be recommended by none but Hill, because Hill's name is in the blank. Nobody else may make a recommendation, and nobody can get into the club without Hill's recommendation, and nobody can work in the bureau, of course, we know, unless Hill recommends him.

Mr. President, we have a law that guarantees civil-service employees against being driven into contributing to campaign funds, but it does not run in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing as long as Mr. Hill is director. We have a law against punishing civil-service employees who do not contribute, but it has no effect as long as Hill is Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and as long as these people expect to hold a place in that bureau.

Mr. President, the President said in the interview which I have just read that he has no regrets; that is, he is glad he struck down these people's reputations, glad that he made them walk the streets and beg for a place to earn an honest living, glad that he made these women with 30 years of faithful service creep back like whipped slaves and take any place that he would give them at half their previous salary. He is glad he drove Doctor Beech into his grave with a broken heart. He is glad that feelings of injustice are rankling within all these other men, because he thinks they can not reach him, Mr. President.

The immunity against malicious slander does not clothe the Executive. Wisely or otherwise, the Constitution clothes us with the right to express opinions in debate in the Senate and in the House and not be required to answer elsewhere, but such immunity does not run with the President of these United States; and I feel certain, Mr. President, that what never happened before in the history of this country is going to happen now—that one of these discharged employees is going to sue the President of these United States for willful, malicious defamation of character, and the President, like any other citizen, is going before the bar of justice in a court room in the city of Washington and answer that charge. That is their last resort. They hoped that the President would have regard for their rights, and restore their reputations he so ruthlessly destroyed; but he says now: "I will not do it, and I am not sorry for what I did."

Therefore, Mr. President, the mere fact that it never happened is no reason why it is not going to happen; and the President, I fear, must answer to the Senate or to a jury, as he sees fit. There must be a tribunal before which even the President of the United States must answer.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] said in his interview to-day that it would be a serious thing to investigate the President. Then it must be that the President has done some terrible thing, because if he had done the thing that is right, the President would not object to being investigated, you know. But here is the remarkable thing: The Senator from New York gave out that interview about "how serious it would be to investigate the President" just after he had had an interview with the President on this matter, so I am sure the President said, "Now, there are things about this that I do not want the public to know," so the Senator from New York says, "It would be a serious thing to investigate the President."

Oh, well, the President will be investigated. In spite of all that may be done by the Senator from New York and those with him on the committee who want to smother the investigation, he is now being investigated by hundreds of thousands of people over this country, and they have a feeling of astonishment and indignation that a man, simply because he is the Chief Magistrate of this great country, could strike down the reputations of honest men and women and refuse to tell them why.

Let me tell you, the President can not now say that these people were guilty of any wrongdoing. In the first place, under the law in regard to accessories after a fact, if these men had been guilty of the wrongful things that he intimated that they had done, if they had stolen bonds and duplicated numbers and profited thereby, and he did not reveal it, he himself would be guilty of an offense as an accessory after the fact. So I know they were not guilty of any wrongdoing.

Again, the law requires that a man or woman who enters civil-service employment must be a person of good character, and of some attainments, at least; and since the President has issued another order restoring these people to their former civil-service status he has certified that they are men and women of good characters. Therefore he had no right, no justification, for striking down their standing as civil-service employees, and he is without a defense. So far as Mr. Ashworth is concerned, he never had any reason to believe that he was not an efficient and honorable man, because Brewster, who seems to have been the man who was sent by Mr. Daugherty to help clear the way for these places, himself says he never mentioned Ashworth's name to the President at all; and Ashworth's direct chief, the Secretary of the Treasury, had transmitted to him a letter showing that he was not only a man of good character and efficient, but that he had performed his duties in an extraordinarily efficient and honorable way, and recommended him. So the President did not have any probable grounds for believing that Ashworth was unworthy or incompetent, and he knows it, and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] knows it, and yet he says "it would be a serious thing to investigate the President."

Mr. President, it is a serious thing for the President to have to be investigated; but you can not surround yourself with "certain influences" and escape; you can not incur obligations and pay them at the public expense and escape. Why, who ever suspected that the Attorney General was appointed because he was a lawyer? You could not prove by the court records of Ohio that he tried a lawsuit there in 15 years. He not only has no knowledge of the law but has no curiosity about it. He is going to quit, Mr. President. He got whitewashed by some lame ducks in the House who hope to be appointed to some place where they can get a living without working for it, and now, while he has got whitewash on him as thick as a negro puts on a cabin down in Arkansas, he is going back home, and if anybody says anything about it will say: "Why, just look at this whitewash all over me! It is just dripping off of me"; and it is going to drip off of him, Mr. President. It is running now. He is going to quit before the Sixty-eighth Congress can have anything to say about his whitewash, and we know it; and there is another member of the Cabinet "fixing" to quit also, Mr. President. Whenever the lid on the Teapot Dome blows off—and it is already stewing—another who was a party to giving away all the naval-reserve fuel this country had, and one man for nothing got a hundred million dollars' worth of it, is going to quit. Fall is not going to have to carry the entire responsibility for giving away all of the national wealth.

He is entitled to only his part of it. The President also "whitewashed" him. He said, "All this thing that Mr. Fall has done I sanctioned." I rather imagine they promised to divide the spoils, including the naval-reserve oils, before he was in a position to appoint a Cabinet. Anyway, there will be but two or three of the master minds when we get back here in December next. The Secretary of State will possibly still be sitting on his iron safe, keeping anybody from finding out what the foreign policy of this country is. He will not even get off it long enough to get a shave. Doctor Sawyer will still be rattling his spurs around, just 2 inches beneath his ears. But all the other master minds will have gone the way of all the earth.

But in conclusion let me say if anybody is being sued by his wife on statutory grounds, and she can prove her case, let him apply and he will be given a place in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but if he has a good character he must apply elsewhere; he is not wanted.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED of Missouri obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	George	McCormick	Robinson
Bayard	Gooding	McKellar	Sheppard
Brandegee	Hale	McKinley	Shortridge
Brookhart	Harreld	McLean	Smith
Bursum	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Calder	Harrison	Moses	Spencer
Capper	Heflin	Norbeck	Sutherland
Caraway	Johnson	Oddie	Townsend
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Dial	Keyes	Pepper	Warren
Edge	King	Phipps	Watson
Ernst	Ladd	Ransdell	Weller
Fernald	Lenroot	Reed, Mo.	Williams
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed, Pa.	Willis

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, merely by way of possibly shortening the labors of the Senate, I call attention to the fact that there is some discussion going on about agreeing to adjourn this evening and to vote on the pending motion at some hour to-morrow, to be fixed. If that is to be done, I think it ought to be done now before I begin my remarks.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think perhaps we had better go on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate has now been in session nine hours to-day, and I think we ought to take a recess until to-morrow at 11. I believe the Senator from Washington ought to make that request.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator does not mean that that should be done without any agreement to vote?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think we would be willing to vote upon the pending motion at 12 o'clock to-morrow, if a recess could be taken now, and I make that proposal.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it is true that we have been in session since 11 o'clock this morning. We have had just three speeches and not one has touched the pending question. I think we had better go on to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. May I suggest, then, if no agreement is to be entered, that the Senator from Missouri is entitled to have a quorum present during his speech this evening? It is an important matter that he is going to discuss, and Senators should stay here to listen to him. Some of us will see to it that there is a quorum present.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, anything that is agreeable to the Senate is agreeable to me. I am prepared to proceed. I am not only prepared to vote on the question of substituting the filled milk bill for the ship subsidy bill, but I would like very much to have a vote on the resolution I have offered, and I say that in the best of faith, and very earnestly, because this is probably the last opportunity I will have at this session of Congress to be present and to ask for a vote. I do not believe there will be any opposition to the resolution. There should not be, in my humble judgment, and I am making the suggestion now in order that Senators may consider it.

I ask permission to place here in front of the Senate, where those Senators who are interested in this question may be able to see them, two maps which I have now in the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and the maps will be placed in appropriate places.

PROPOSED CESSION OF CERTAIN WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. REED of Missouri resumed the speech begun by him on the 10th ultimo, upon the following resolution (S. Res. 396) submitted by him January 5, 1923:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to ascertain whether the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, etc., is willing to discuss the cession by it to the United States of all or any part of its possessions in the West Indies, including the island of Trinidad, and also the Bermuda Islands.

The President is further requested to ascertain whether the Government of the Republic of France is willing to discuss the cession by it to the United States of all or any part of its possessions in the Lesser Antilles, including the islands of Grande Terre, Guadeloupe, Marie Galante, and Martinique.

The speech of Mr. REED of Missouri is, entire, as follows:

Wednesday, January 10, 1923.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, a day or two ago the Senate passed a resolution, which I introduced, requesting that the American troops be recalled from Germany. We were promptly told by the official reporter of unofficial news that it had been determined by the White House, notwithstanding the action of the Senate, that the troops should remain in Germany. But the scenes of the international drama now being played upon the stage of the world change nowadays with marvelous rapidity. Accordingly it appears that the logic of events transpiring within a few hours after the passage of the Senate resolution has forced the administration to reverse its defiant attitude and to admit the wisdom and imperative necessity for immediately returning American troops to American soil. I congratulate the country upon the fact that our soldiers are to be withdrawn from a position which every thoughtful man has for the past two years recognized as one of menace to the peace and good will that we desire to maintain with all of the nations of the world.

I remark in this connection that the order of the President should be extended. He should direct his official "unofficial" representative at the Lausanne conference to come home with the troops. An official "unofficial" representative is only an unfrocked meddler. Incapable of bargaining for our benefit, he yet possesses the capacity for incalculable injury. By improvident statements or speeches he may involve our country in the disputes of Europe at least to the extent of engendering all the ill will which an official representative might be able to arouse. It appears that this, our representative, who denies that he is a representative at all and who concedes that he is only a diplomatic cipher, is nevertheless surcharged with a great variety of opinions regarding a multitude of questions, coupled with an irresistible impulse to make speeches and a pronounced delusion that his "unofficial" voice is the voice of the American people. If some one will draw a line between the declaration by an official "unofficial" representative that "the United States regards Germany in default" and a declaration by "official" representative that "the United States regards Germany in default," he will be a better master of logical refinements than Sir Hudibras, whom Butler declared "could distinguish and divide a hair twixt south and southwest side." In very truth the President in the maintenance of his "unofficial representative" at the conference of foreign powers violates the spirit of the law that provides there shall be no American representative on the commission unless and until Congress shall specifically grant the necessary authority. When, therefore, the President sends a man to the conference to do everything or substantially everything that might be done were Congress to grant the authority to appoint a representative and were the appointment made pursuant to the act, he is proceeding to annul by subterfuge the plain letter of the law. How pitiable that device is will be understood when we remember that the man sent is employed, paid, and accredited by the United States to attend the conference and to take part in the conference, and yet is described as an "unofficial representative." Such an avoidance of the letter and violation of the spirit of the statute is, I submit, unworthy the President of a great Republic. Either America is at the conference or it is not there. The pretense that a man can sit at the conference, listen to its deliberations, take part in them, and assume to express the opinion of the United States with reference thereto and yet that he is not speaking officially for the United States is utterly contemptible. I venture, therefore, to indulge the hope that the change of heart which the President has recently experienced will extend to a recall of this "unofficial" meddler.

[At this point Mr. REED of Missouri yielded the floor for the day.]

Tuesday, February 20, 1923.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to Members of the Senate that I regard it as highly unfortunate that I am compelled to present the question at this time. I beg to assure the Senate that the resolution (S. Res. 396) which I offered and which I intended to discuss on the 10th day of January, would have been pressed upon the attention of the Senate at that time, but, as Senators know, I was compelled to leave the city because of the unfortunate death of my business associate. I have been waiting since my return for an opportunity to call this important matter to the attention of the Senate. I would not present it to-night except that I feel compelled to leave the Senate in the very near future. May I, therefore, ask the Senate to disabuse its mind of any thought that there is any purpose in my remarks except to seek to impress the great importance of the question upon the Congress?

In a word, and merely by way of introduction, it is proposed to ask the State Department to communicate with Great Britain and France in order to ascertain if they will consider the question of transferring to the Government of the United States any or all of their possessions in what is generally called the West Indies.

It seems to me that this is a singularly appropriate time for the consideration of the resolution. It is appropriate in its general sense because we have just voted to ratify an agreement with Great Britain by which we relieve her from her solemn written obligation to pay the United States 5 per cent interest upon her indebtedness of $4,600,000,000 and accept in lieu of that a rate of interest of 3 per cent for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent for the remainder of the time the debt is to run. Moreover, we have varied the terms of the contract in another important respect.

The stipulations of the contract which we now hold with Great Britain were that her bonds must mature at the same time our bonds mature. As we all know, the bonds which we have issued mature within a very few years. We have extended the time of payment to Great Britain so that the final payment will not be made for 62 years. Besides this, we have agreed to relieve Great Britain from her obligation to pay a higher rate of interest, even though the United States shall be obliged to pay a higher rate than was exacted when she negotiated her bonds to the American people.

In addition to that, we have agreed, at the option of Great Britain, to permit her to defer one-half of the interest payments during the first five years and to pay them by additional bonds. On top of this we have agreed that she may mature her indebtedness whensoever she pleases, so that if ever the money market of the world should enable her to borrow at a less rate of interest she can immediately discharge her obligations to the United States. And, finally, we have agreed that she can pay her obligations to us in the bonds of the United States.

Thus we have taken or proposed to take from her obligations that will bear but 3 per cent interest during the next 10 years, one-half of which interest payments can be deferred. We have placed her in the position where, if she sees fit, she can purchase in the open market American bonds at 4¼ per cent and, by carrying them in her treasury and balancing interest against interest, can actually during the first 10 years of her indebtedness escape with a net payment of 1¾ per cent interest.

We made these concessions well knowing that the American taxpayer must pay 4¼ per cent for money upon which Great Britain will only pay 3 per cent interest. We made the contract with full knowledge of the fact that we must be prepared to meet our obligations when they mature, regardless of the money market at that time, but that Great Britain, during the sweep of 62 years, can choose her time to negotiate her new loans and seize the most favorable opportunity to refund her indebtedness in order to discharge her obligations.

When these considerations were urged upon the Senate there was but one reply that I think was worthy the name of reply, namely, that we were bound to Great Britain by ties of amity and good will; that we desired to prolong that feeling of mutual respect and good will; that it would make for the continuance of the friendship of these two great powers if the United States should now, in her fiscal transactions with Great Britain, exhibit a degree of generosity not hitherto shown in any transaction between modern nations. If the transaction we have just concluded, so far as we are concerned, shall bring that amity and good will, and shall cause it to last through the years of the future, then perhaps our action will have been justifiable and our investment wise.

But if that be a sound doctrine and a wise policy for America to pursue, the doctrine of mutuality would seem to indicate that Great Britain might at least be willing to transfer to the United States on some kind of terms those islands which command our waters, which menace our coasts, and which are of no substantial value to Great Britain save as they might be of strategic importance in case of naval conflict. But if we have entered upon a period in which we are to extend and magnify the good will and brotherly affection of the past, and if it be true that we should in recognition of that make heavy financial sacrifices for the benefit of Great Britain, it would appear that mutually she should be willing to concede something to the United States, particularly when it will take from her practically nothing except a strategic advantage which could only be employed practically against the United States, now her sworn brother and her recent benefactor.

With that as a preliminary, in all earnestness, and in the hope that I may have disabused the minds of those who imagine that I am endeavoring merely to take up the time of the Senate this evening, I invite the attention of the Senate to the matter with every assurance that the question will not down; that it must be answered eventually; and that this is the most appropriate time and the best occasion to hope for a favorable answer.

Mr. President, we have returned our troops from Europe. Let us hope we are getting ourselves entirely out of European entanglements, disputes, and conflicts. Is this not also an exceedingly appropriate time to take a preliminary step toward the getting of foreign nations out of American waters and the removal of the guns of foreign nations from positions which command passages of the sea vital to the commerce and defense of our country?

It is not intended, Mr. President, by anything I may say here to-day, or by the resolution which I have introduced, to arouse resentment or to question the friendly attitude of either France or Great Britain. I invite particular attention to the resolution, which reads:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to ascertain whether the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, etc., is willing to discuss the cession by it to the United States of all or any part of its possessions in the West Indies, including the island of Trinidad and also the Bermuda Islands.

The President is further requested to ascertain whether the Government of the Republic of France is willing to discuss the cession by it to the United States of all or any part of its possessions in the Lesser Antilles, including the islands of Grande Terre, Guadeloupe, Marie Galante, and Martinique.

The resolution goes no further, be it observed, than to inquire whether these two great and friendly nations will "discuss the proposition." It does not propose to fix or to suggest conditions. It leaves to the State Department a free hand for the opening of negotiations upon the broadest possible lines. It does not contemplate, I repeat, any particular conditions. It does not foreshadow any special line or course of conduct. It simply requests the State Department to ascertain whether either of these countries is willing to discuss the proposition at all. Such a resolution can not by any stretch of construction be tortured into one that will give offense to friendly powers.

Upon the other hand, if the resolution be adopted by the Senate and shall receive favorable consideration by Great Britain and France, the suspicion and distrust which always naturally obtain when a distant foreign power holds positions of advantage near the coast line of another power will give place to sentiments of confidence and amity.

Let it be distinctly understood that the resolution offered is not because of any crisis immediately impending or likely to arrive in the near future. Entirely aside from such considerations there are many reasons why we should now take the initial step toward the acquisition of the land described in the resolution. (1) The islands indisputably are within the zone of our national influence. (2) They are essential to the defense of the American Republic. (3) They are of slight value to their present holders except for their strategic importance in case of war against the United States. (4) Their possession by foreign powers is repugnant to the spirit of the Monroe Doctrine. (5) They embrace and command the Caribbean Sea, which is as much an American gulf as is the Gulf of Mexico. (6) They lie directly athwart the path of our manifest national destiny. (7) They form a barrier between our own coasts and could be employed to close not only the Panama Canal but as well the mouth of the Mississippi. (8) They dominate all our trade routes to the South American and Central American States. At the same time all European countries have a free and direct access to all South American ports. (9) They form a connecting link between the United States and South America whose protection we have assumed. (10) Their trade naturally flows to the United States despite the influence of these European masters and our own tariff monstrosities. (11) Under foreign rule their commerce and wealth have been for many years decreasing. (12) They can be made a source of wealth to us and their own condition be vastly improved.

Mr. President, a glance at the map will appeal strongly to those patriotic citizens who recognize the plain lesson of history that the security of the future is not guaranteed by the friendship of the past.

The British possessions in Canada and Newfoundland constitute an area substantially as large as the United States, including Alaska. This vast domain stretches along our entire northern border and completely separates us from land communication with Alaska. It embraces on both its eastern and western extremities impregnable harbors in which the combined British navies could lie in safety beneath the protection of almost invincible land fortifications. Such a fleet would be within a few hours of striking distance of Boston and New York City on the Atlantic side and a similar fleet could readily attack our western coast.

It is not proposed in this resolution to in any manner disturb these immense possessions of Great Britain upon the North American Continent. It is well, however, to bear in mind that the resources of Canada are very largely undeveloped and that they are so great as to be incalculable. At the same time, the present population, numbering nearly 9,000,000 souls, can be multiplied several times and not yet have exhausted the natural wealth of the Canadian Dominion.

In this connection also keep in consideration the fact that by agreement with Great Britain we are not to fortify the Canadian border or to place upon the waters of the Great Lakes men-of-war. The contract, of course, is mutual and is based upon the theory of reciprocal good will. Springing out of that doctrine is the very sound argument that Great Britain should not insist upon holding island possessions not essential to her security, although vital to the security of the United States.

Turn again to the map and you will observe that the British Empire holds dominion over the Bermuda Islands. They lie within approximately 1,000 miles of the city of New York and only a little over 500 miles from our coast line. These islands are fortified. They are so situated that they could be made a base of operations against New York and all of our eastern coast cities. They could be used as a point of attack by submarines and airplanes preying upon American commerce. They are of substantially no value to Great Britain except in case of conflict with the United States, when they would at once assume the importance of a deadly menace.

We should not forget that substantially all of our north and south commerce passes between the Bermudas and our own coast, so that our ships bound for the canal or southern ports would be obliged to go either far from their course or to pass through seas infested with submarine and airplanes operating from the Bermuda Islands.

Proceeding southward, the map discloses that opposite the Florida coast begins a chain of islands owned by Great Britain and France which form an immense segment of a circle from a point 50 miles off the Florida coast to the island of Trinidad, which embraces the heavily fortified Port of Spain. These islands include the Bahamas, the British Virgin Islands, the Leeward Islands, the Windward Islands, as well as the island of Trinidad and the island of Jamaica.

In this connection, while not referred to in the resolution, we must not lose sight of the fact that Great Britain holds of the mainland British Honduras, which naturally constitutes a part of the coast line of Guatemala, and British Guiana, which likewise naturally constitutes a part of the Venezuelan coast line.

These island possessions form a barrier which commands the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea, the Panama Canal, and every trade route between North and South America. It is not too much to say that in the hands of a hostile power they could be so employed as to close the Panama Canal, rendering it practically useless, and that the Gulf of Mexico, including the mouth of the Mississippi River, could be placed under terrible menace. At the same time, I repeat and shall continue to repeat, these islands are of no substantial value to either France or England save as positions from which America may at some time be attacked.

I invite attention to certain well-established principles of national policy and naval warfare. (1) It is a sound national principle that small areas located near the territory of a great power should belong to it rather than to a distant country. (2) A nation's navy should be concentrated or capable of immediate concentration, as dispersion inevitably leads to disaster. (3) Of almost equal importance—indeed, a part of the foregoing doctrine—is the rule which emphasizes the value of central position and interior lines.

The value of a central position and interior lines arises from the fact that such a position enables a power to throw the forces there located in either direction to the point of attack by proceeding upon shorter lines than can its antagonist.

This one advantage has been decisive in many of the great historic land and naval contests. It is illustrated on a great scale by the position of Germany in the late war, that country being able to withstand for a long time the attacks of Russia upon one front, and of Italy, France, Great Britain, and Belgium upon the others, because she could unite great forces for attack on either front while her antagonists could not thus concentrate their widely scattered armies.

What I have said illustrates the importance of the Panama Canal in the defense of our country. Indeed, one of the chief reasons for building the canal was the argument that we could, through the canal, unite our Atlantic and Pacific fleets in a few days' time and thus be able to meet an enemy in either ocean with the full strength of our Navy. It must, therefore, be manifest that any condition which places the control of the canal in a foreign power is one of extreme gravity.

In this connection I call attention to the warning of Admiral Mahan, perhaps the greatest authority on naval strategy this country has yet produced. He declares:

> One thing is sure. In the Caribbean Sea is the strategic key to the two great oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific, our chief maritime frontiers.

Of course, the canal itself is the great strategical objective in the Caribbean Sea. In the immense semicircle of islands that embrace the ocean side of the Caribbean Sea from northeast and southeast, Britain controls the following: Bermuda, Bahamas, Vandyke, Tortola, Anegada, Anguilla, Barbuda, St. Kitts, Antigua, Montserrat, Dominica, Santa Lucia, St. Vincent, Barbados, Grenadines, Grenada, Tobago, and Trinidad.

The entrances from the Atlantic into the Caribbean Sea are as follows: Florida Straits between Florida and the Bahamas, Windward Passage between Cuba and Haiti, Mona Passage between Haiti and Porto Rico, Anegada or Virgin Passage between Porto Rico and St. Thomas, and more easterly passages between various islands east and south to Trinidad.

As can be seen from the map, the control of the Florida Straits is shared by Great Britain with America through the control by the former of the Bahamas. This strait, in the event of war with Great Britain, would be infested with British cruisers, British submarines, and British airplanes based on the Bahamas.

I read now from Admiral Mahan's "Naval Strategy":

> A glance at the map will show that the combination of these three conditions, narrowness, length, and difficulty, are all found to the greatest extent about the Straits of Florida and the Windward Passage; while the position of Jamaica, and of its dockyard Kingston, with reference to the Windward and Yucatan Passage, to the rear though somewhat on the right flank of Cuba, regarded as facing the North Atlantic, admirably meets the requirements of a position guarding two defiles; being in the rear, with facility for moving the whole force in either direction.

> The Bahama Bank and Islands, extending from near the coast of Florida, along the northern shores of Cuba and Haiti, nearly to the longitude of the eastern end of Haiti, will have a strong influence upon the approaches to the western passages, and must be included in the general field for study.

There is a long chapter here devoted to the importance of the Straits of Florida, and some naval authorities at least have arrived at the conclusion that if that passage were controlled the power of the United States to defend itself would be enormously decreased.

Speaking now of the outlying islands, and omitting Jamaica from consideration for the present, the command of the Windward Passage may be said to be like the Florida Straits, divided between Great Britain and the United States, with the advantage on the side of Great Britain.

Speaking now alone of the outlying islands, the command of the Windward Passage may be said to be likewise divided between Great Britain and the United States.

In the Mona Passage we have through the possession of Porto Rico perhaps the advantage so far as mere entrance into the Caribbean Sea is concerned. But that would take us far from our course if we were seeking to enter or leave the canal upon a direct route from New York.

The command of the Virgin Passage between Porto Rico and St. Thomas is as to the mere entrance to the Caribbean Sea divided with Great Britain.

All of the more easterly passages between the various islands east and south to Trinidad are absolutely controlled by Great Britain.

Thus far I have dealt with the mere entrance to the waters of the Caribbean and the Gulf. But, as I shall show, Great Britain holds the key to all these passages and the command of the waters of the Caribbean Sea, as well as the Gulf itself, through the possession of Jamaica.

JAMAICA.

That island furnishes Great Britain a base nearer to the canal than any of our possessions, and affords a point from which, moving along interior lines, all vessels proceeding into the waters of the Caribbean Sea, either to or from the canal, can be successfully attacked. Jamaica is situated only 600 miles from the mouth of the canal. Our closest fortified base, Guantanamo in Cuba, is 750 miles distant; Key West, 1,200 miles; New Orleans, 1,500 miles; and Pensacola, 1,650 miles. Jamaica is, therefore, within four or five hours' airplane distance from the canal and constitutes the strategic key to all of the passages into and through the waters of the Caribbean Sea. Commenting upon this important fact, Admiral Mahan states:

The military and commercial objectives within the Caribbean, as distinguished from points on its circumference, reduce themselves thus to two, namely, Jamaica and the Isthmus. (Mahan's Naval Strategy, p. 351.)

He adds:

Jamaica has this particular advantage over all approaches to the Isthmus, and that against the greatest local power in the Caribbean, namely, Cuba. Ships of war from Jamaica, scarcely venturing out of sight, still less out of support of their base, sweep both the approaches to the Isthmus from the greater island. Jamaica flanks both routes, and when to this we add that it is nearer the Spanish Main by 150 miles than Guantanamo, and so has 300 miles less coal to burn on lines covering the sea in its breadth, it is seen that Jamaica has a decided advantage over Cuba in controlling communications from the edge of the sea to the objectives, including the Isthmus. Both islands flank the routes from the eastern Antilles, but Jamaica is the nearer. (Mahan's Naval Strategy, pp. 354–355.)

The same author further declares:

Every line of communication from Europe to the Isthmus must pass nearer Jamaica than it necessarily does to any particular one of the eastern islands. (Mahan's Naval Strategy, p. 355.)

On pages 356 and 357 he asserts:

Taking all together, control over transit depending upon situation only, other conditions being equal, is greatest with Jamaica, next with Cuba, least with the Lesser Antilles. * * * The situation of Jamaica gives such command over all the approaches to the Isthmus as to make it, in a military sense, the predominant factor in the control of the Caribbean. Jamaica is a preeminent instance of central position, conferring the advantage of interior lines, for action in every direction within the field to which it belongs. Taking into consideration situation only, Jamaica is admirably placed for the control of the Caribbean. It is equidistant from Colon, from the Yucatan Passage, and from the Mona Passage. It shares with Guantanamo and Santiago control of the Windward Passage and of that along the south coast of Cuba, while, with but a slight stretching out of its arm, it reaches the routes from the Gulf of Mexico to the Isthmus. Above all, as toward Cuba, it so blocks the road to the Isthmus that any attempt directed upon the Isthmus from Cuba must first have to account with the military and naval forces of Jamaica.

The author, in dealing with this question in a general way, has referred to Cuba as though it might be regarded as an American possession, but such is not the case. It is easy enough to conceive a condition of affairs in which Cuba might be hostile to the United States and might either be captured or even open her ports to an enemy.

The immense advantage of Jamaica as a base of operations against the canal can not be exaggerated. Airplanes carrying immense bombs now being experimented with and used might be able in a few hours' time to cover the distance between Jamaica and the canal and to completely destroy that artery of communication. In this connection it must not be forgotten that the Port of Spain on the Island of Trinidad completely controls the waters of the Gulf of Paria, in which the entire British fleet could lie at anchor.

NAVAL STATIONS.

It is interesting to note that the British have at Bermuda a naval dockyard equipped with a floating dock capable of receiving a vessel of 17,500 tons. At St. Georges, in the Bermudas, there is a marine slipway capable of caring for smaller craft. She has coast fortifications located at Ireland Island and a dockyard; also at Spanish Point, Prospect Camp, and at St. Georges. She has fortifications at the latter. She has located here two large oil storage tanks of 35,000 barrels capacity each. She also maintains here a battalion of infantry.

At Jamaica she possesses fortifications and keeps stationed there a battalion of troops, but the strength of her fortifications and the type of her guns are not even known to authorities of the American Navy.

The Admiralty is now engaged in building oil-storage tanks and moorings, which for 1922–23 will cost 80,000 pounds sterling.

If it be asserted that these dockyard facilities and fortifications are not presently of great capacity or power, the answer is that they can be increased in size at any time, and that we have no legal right to protest.

The cold, unadulterated truth is that if the American and English Navies were equally matched the possession of these islands would probably turn the balance in favor of Great Britain, and she would be able to effectively deprive us of the use of the canal, and, as indicated by Mahan, might even turn it into an instrumentality for our destruction.

[At this point Mr. FLETCHER raised the point of no quorum, and the roll was called, when various parliamentary motions were made, which were debated, all of which appear following the speech of Mr. REED of Missouri.]

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I was speaking of the importance of this semicircle of islands embracing the waters of the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf and was endeavoring to impress upon Senators the importance of these islands to the defense of the canal and of our American waters.

THE VIRGIN ISLANDS.

I challenge attention to one bit of proof that I have not overstated this question. That is the purchase by our Government of the Virgin Islands just preceding our entrance into the war. Those islands are indicated by little specks upon the map, so small that Senators can not distinguish them on the map. They are insignificant and inconsequential compared with the vast mass of island possessions held by the British Empire and by the Republic of France in the West Indies.

We were asked to purchase the Virgin Islands and were told that they were of the highest strategic importance. The Executive department, backed by Army and Navy authorities, joined in this insistence. Accordingly we purchased the islands from Denmark, a friendly power, and at the same time a power which would never menace us. We paid for these islands, which embrace a total territory of 138 square miles, $25,000,000. Turn now to the map and you will find that they are but mere specks compared with the vast West Indies possessions of Great Britain and France. They are located 483 nautical miles farther from the canal than the Island of Jamaica, and they are so situated that they could have been readily attacked from our base in Porto Rico. It should also be borne in mind that Great Britain controls islands which by good naval authorities are believed to command and therefore greatly reduce the value of these islands which we paid $25,000,000 to obtain. No man who voted to pay $25,000,000 to acquire the Virgin Islands from Denmark can consistently oppose the resolution I have offered.

In the purchase of those islands we were deceived, either by the Executive or by our naval and military authorities, for the possession of any one of the larger islands which Great Britain holds is a menace to the United States. The Virgin Islands do not compare in their strategic importance with many other islands controlled by Great Britain.

I have thus far treated the question largely from the standpoint of war. Let me not be misunderstood. I am neither seeking to stir up animosity toward Great Britain nor to arouse a feeling of distrust against that great nation. We all entertain the hope that the great English-speaking race will never be engaged in a death struggle. Reasonable men, however, will concur in the conclusion that if the view I have just expressed is sound, then there is no strategic reason why Great Britain should insist upon holding these islands against us, her friend and brother. They are not necessary for her defense against other countries. If we are to indulge the hope of eternal peace with Great Britain, then they are of no use for attack against us, because we are not to be attacked.

Nothing could so much make for the peace of the present and its perpetuation into the distant future as an expressed willingness by Great Britain to turn these islands over to America upon the broad ground that they are contiguous to our coast and would be of great value to America in case of any contest with any other foreign power other than herself. Their possession by America would render the canal secure and enable us to keep it open against any nation in the world.

ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS.

Let us examine now whether the British or French islands are of any special economic value to their respective proprietors, and in that connection let me a little later discuss briefly the continental possessions of Great Britain in Central and South America.

First, as to the island possessions there was a time when they were a considerable factor in the trade of the parent countries. But that time has long since passed. The London Times of Saturday, January 27, 1923, in an article commenting upon the three hundredth anniversary of the acquisition of the West Indies, after dwelling upon the achievements of her heroic seamen in that quarter of the globe and insisting that the West Indies "make substantial contribution to the wealth of the Empire," is forced to say that "the West Indian trade has been faced with a serious crisis, that neither the generous preferential treatment given by Canada nor the guaranty furnished by the British Government that the existing preference, one-sixth of the duty, will be renewed for another 10 years, has been sufficient to save the situation. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain once referred to the Crown Colonies of the Empire as undeveloped estates which can never be developed without imperial assistance, and in present circumstances the planter may be readily excused for asking that such assistance should be granted on a more generous scale." The article then proceeds to advocate further concessions and expenditure of money in the West Indies, as follows:

However loyal the Jamaican planter may be, it must throw a severe strain on his loyalty to look across the waters to Porto Rico where his American fellow planters ship their sugar to the markets of the United States free of all duty.

In an article submitted to the Royal Colonial Institute, Sir Edward Davson plainly stated the desperate financial condition of the colonies. He insisted that a 50 per cent preference in duties by Canada in dealing with the West Indies was necessary to their prosperity if not to their preservation.

These islands have been in the possession of Great Britain for 300 years. They have for a long time held contiguous continental possessions. The effect of this situation is well summed up by William R. Shepherd, professor of history, Columbia University, in a pamphlet issued in 1917. He said:

As colonization is carried on to-day, the real test of the right of a European nation to retain control of American territories, like those in and around the Caribbean, is determined, not alone by their actual utility to the nation in question, but by the amount of service thus rendered to their inhabitants. For many years past Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands have centered their oversea activities in the eastern hemisphere, in Africa, Asia, Australia, and Polynesia. The islands and parts of continents they hold in the Caribbean region are little more than relics of ancient grandeur, burdensome rather than a source of advantage. No sentimental value worth mentioning attaches to these areas. Few Englishmen, Frenchmen, or Dutchmen reside in them longer than is necessary for commercial purposes. Possibly the colonies may have some strategic value to their owners as naval bases. If so, against what power? This is an obvious question that has an obvious answer—the United States. In that case no doubt remains as to our duty in the premises.

Practically all the Caribbean colonies have fallen long since into a state of absolute or relative neglect. Their population either crowds the means of subsistence or tends steadily to fall off. That any of the areas flourish at all is due mainly to their connection with the United States and to the introduction of Asiatics for work on the plantations. The trade of the British possessions with this country is worth upward of $4,000,000 a year more than that with Great Britain itself, and if British Guiana is excepted, more than $13,000,000. In the case of British Guiana the reason for the larger amount of commerce carried on with the mother country is found in the labor of Asiatics. Both here and in Jamaica, as well as in the French and Dutch colonies, the practice of using orientals prevails. However legitimate the bringing over to America of Hindus, Japanese, Siamese, and Chinese by the tens and hundreds of thousands may seem to the British, Dutch, and French owners of the Caribbean region, it is altogether opposed to the principles which the United States has steadfastly championed in defense of the American workingman. Legitimate it may be in point of law, though not in point of morals, for its object is, not the advancement of civilization in the areas concerned, but solely the exploitation of them by the agency of cheap labor.

Railroads, furthermore, almost unknown in the islands, are relatively much scarcer still in the continental sections. British Guiana, which is somewhat smaller than Oregon, has 97½ miles of railway, run on three different gauges; British Honduras has 25 miles; Dutch Guiana, about as big as New York—for which, by the way, it was exchanged back in 1667—has 104 miles; whereas French Guiana, a bit larger than Maine, has no railways at all. Both the French and the Dutch colonies show a declining commerce and they are dependent, also, for their financial existence upon annual subsidies furnished by the home government. To recognize, therefore, that, economically at least, the British territories already form part of the United States, and to relieve the taxpayers of France and the Netherlands of the burden of meeting the deficits of their backward dependencies in America, would not seem on the face of it an unwelcome act.

Nor is this all of the story. None of the British colonies in and around the Caribbean enjoys self-government in anything like the measure of it accorded to Canada and Newfoundland. So far as the privilege is granted at all, the people thus favored stand more or less on a level with the inhabitants of India. In the French and Dutch areas the situation is worse. Even if the French colonists are represented in the home parliament, the representation is illusory rather than otherwise, whereas the folk under Dutch rule have to depend on what the good Queen sends them. Whatever the amount of attention, also, given to education in the British possessions, it is pitiably scant among their French and Dutch neighbors. In partial compensation for the drawbacks, however, many of the inhabitants speak English after the American fashion and use dollars and cents more commonly than they do pounds, shillings, and pence, francs and guilders.

Given these circumstances, it seems clear that, taken as a whole, the colonies in and around the Caribbean are a loss to the European nations that own them and a detriment to the people who live in them. Were they to be made, instead, a part of the United States in the political sense, as essentially they already are a part of it in the geographical, linguistic, and economic sense, their lot would be a happier one and so would ours.

Mr. President, in that connection I desire to call attention to the character of the population of these islands. Professor Shepherd declares:

A more extraordinary mixture of races, colors, and religions, a more singular juxtaposition of oriental and occidental, of folk from Europe, Africa, Asia, and the South Sea Isles, all brought face to face in America, it would be hard to find anywhere in the world. Beneath the thin crust of a few thousand whites, of British, French, Dutch, Spanish, and Portuguese origin, are massed millions of negroes and mulattoes, hundreds of thousands of Hindus, tens of thousands of Javanese, and thousands of Chinese, Siamese, and Indians. Here are black, brown, red, and yellow Christians, Mohammedans, and Jews, devotees of Brahma and Buddha, followers of Confucius, and worshippers of nature, transplanted from Africa and Asia, made dwellers in America, and yet owing allegiance to European masters.

Now, reading from the same distinguished authority, it is interesting to compare this retrograde movement that afflicts these islands that have for 300 years been under foreign rule with the blessings conferred in the island of Porto Rico, which began the moment our flag floated over that island and which continue to this hour. Speaking of the other islands in connection with Porto Rico, Professor Shepherd says:

Were they to be included in the American Union, there is every reason to believe that the benefits which have followed the American occupation of Porto Rico would be extended to them also. What we have accomplished in 19 years—for the material, mental, and moral advantage of that island and its American citizenry, needs no expatiation here, for the evidence is too well known. If the destinies of the Caribbean colonies, therefore, were committed to our charge, we could assure to their inhabitants an interest in their welfare which the countries now ruling them can not possibly display.

Additional evidence, Mr. President, of the bad condition of affairs in these islands and of their natural alliance in trade and commerce with America is found in a recent editorial in the London Times printed on Saturday, January 27, last. It is a labored argument in favor of British control, but it contains unwilling admissions of the highest importance. The writer says:

* * * In the present circumstances the planter in Jamaica may be readily excused for asking that such assistance—

That is in the nature of preferential tariffs—

should be granted on a more generous scale. He has before him the strong recommendation contained in the report made by Mr. Edward Wood after his return from his mission to the West Indies last year. Mr. Wood said that, having regard to the political and economic issues advanced by the settlers, their request that the preference rate on West Indian sugar in the United Kingdom should be increased from one-sixth to one-third, and that the rate should be not allowed to fall below the present figure of £3 15s. per ton, was entitled to favorable consideration.

A most important result of the valuable work of Mr. Wood and his colleagues was the increased confidence it gave to the people of the West Indies in the control of the colonial office. If this confidence is not to be betrayed, there must be immediate and practical evidence that the labor of the mission was not in vain, for the "political issues" of which Mr. Wood spoke are inevitably linked up with the economic aspect of the question. In a memorable speech when he was at Port of Spain in 1920 the Prince of Wales referred to the suggestion that the Empire might be willing to part with one or more West Indian islands for a financial consideration. "I should like to say here what I have said before," he stated, "that British subjects are not for sale."

I want to digress a moment. The Prince of Wales says that "British subjects are not for sale." No, Mr. President, they are for exploitation. What does the Prince of Wales care for the mixed population on these islands, which has been degraded and further degraded by the importation of cheap Asiatic labor? It is not the inhabitants he is interested in; it is the land, the harbors, the strategic advantage, the gain to British merchants who maintain an advantage over the traders of other countries as they deal with these British subjects.

This editorial writer continues:

His—

That is, the Prince of Wales's—words are as true to-day as they were then. But there are other ways—

Notice this language:

But there are other ways of acquiring colonies than by annexation, and, loyal, for instance, as the Jamaican may be, it must throw a severe strain on his loyalty to look across the waters to Porto Rico, where his American fellow planters ship their sugar to the markets of the United States free of all duty.

Thus recognizing that the superior advantages afforded by America are so important that Great Britain's great editor at least recognizes the fact that if Great Britain retains the loyalty of these subjects she will not sell, she must mete out to them a different treatment than she has in the past.

The editor proceeds:

The West Indies do not ask for "imperial assistance" as a charity. They have already given an example of reciprocal treatment in their existing preference to British goods, and the broad imperial basis on which the recently opened West Indian Agricultural College has been founded is a striking instance of that mutual cooperation so essential to the future of the Empire.

The future of the islands themselves must depend upon their economic prosperity. The members of the mission recognized the benefits that would ensue from a closer federation, and in a series of articles contributed to the Times by Mr. Ormsby-Gore—whose first-hand knowledge should be of infinite value to him in his present office—attention was drawn to the absurd position in the Leeward Islands, where a population of fewer than 150,000 people supports six executive councils and five legislatures. A necessary preliminary to federation is an improvement in communication between the islands, and it is satisfactory to know that the Postmaster General has promised immediate improvement in the cable system. Meanwhile the people of this country owe it to these colonies, who are celebrating their tercentenary to-day, that the most sympathetic treatment be accorded to their aspirations; that alleged grievances as to their administration—unfortunately frequent of late—be satisfactorily settled according to their merits; and, above all, that a definite and logical policy of control, affected neither by change of Government nor change of administrator, be established as a safe and sure foundation upon which they may build their faith in the mother country.

After 300 years of rule, this editorial in fact makes the concession that these people are compelled to grant preferential rates to British trade; that they are taxed upon their sugar at enormous rates when they send it into British dominions; that the advantages of Porto Rico under the American flag are such that they are producing discontent, and alienating the affections, if any they ever had, of the British subjects in Jamaica; and that a reform, or numerous reforms, must be inaugurated by Great Britain. If the Prince of Wales will not sell a British subject, it would seem that his government ought to treat the subject a little better—perhaps liberate him without selling him. We are not engaged in the business of buying subjects.

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. REED of Missouri,

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the point of order that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call.

Mr. FLETCHER. Since the last quorum call there was negotiation for a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was simply a conversation between Senators.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the record will show that there was an offer of a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but no action taken by the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was declined. I consider that to have been business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Since the last roll call the present occupant of the chair recalls that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] at least tendered the plan of a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 12 o'clock to-morrow on the pending motion offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], and upon objection from the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the plan for the proposal was abandoned.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senate did not act upon it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It could not act upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was about to observe that the proposition having been submitted and rejected, it constitutes the transaction of business. There was nothing further that could be done. Under the unanimous precedents of the Senate, the roll should be called to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was nothing more than conversation between the Senator from Arkansas and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has in mind the precedents and is firmly convinced after perusal and consideration thereof that no roll call at this time would be pertinent unless there had been the transaction of business in some form. The Chair thinks the rule should be liberally construed. It is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair that business did transpire in the proposal of the plan offered by the Senator from Arkansas. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	McNary	Sheppard
Bayard	Johnson	Moses	Smoot

Mr. WILLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Having a pair with that Senator, I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If the Senator from North Carolina were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (at 9 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.). I move the adoption of the order which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed order.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE. Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). In the absence of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], with whom I have a pair for the evening, I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the affirmative). In the absence of my pair [Mr. BAYARD], and being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I understand the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has not voted. I have a general pair with that Senator. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this motion the yeas are 32 and the nays are 8. The motion prevails. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the point of order against the motion that a motion to reconsider is not in order except when we have a quorum. I cite from page 16 of the Precedents the following:

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Blair in the chair) decided a motion was not in order, in the absence of a quorum, to reconsider a vote directing the Sergeant at Arms to compel the attendance of absent Senators. Decision sustained on appeal.

I make the point of order that the motion to reconsider is out of order.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not think a decision by Mr. Blair some years ago is binding upon the Senate at this time. I would like to discuss the question.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will state the point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. The question is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. There is no debate permissible on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that debate is out of order and business can not be transacted without a quorum. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. REED of Missouri. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington withdraw his point of order?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I made the point of order that the motion to reconsider could not be made until a quorum is present. I do not withdraw that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Not at this moment.

Mr. LODGE. All debate is out of order at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that appeal I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. REED of Missouri. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Under the same circumstances as announced on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIS. I transfer my pair with my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I understand that Senator has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who is absent. As I am unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If I were voting, I would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Again announcing my pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN];

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state the point of order.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The point of order is that there not being a quorum in the Senate, no business of any kind can take place except that specially authorized by the rules, to wit, the necessary orders to bring in absent Senators or to adjourn. A motion to lay any matter upon the table is in the nature of business. It can no more be enacted by a body of men lacking a quorum than any other business. Neither can the Chair announce the result of the roll call of such a body. I make the point of order that the motion itself was out of order and the Chair is without power or authority to announce the result of the roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the motion was made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; the motion was made by the Senator from Washington, and I asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the appeal was taken by the Senator from Missouri from the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And no business could have been transacted because the Senator is arguing that his own motion was out of order.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That may be true, but the question of jurisdiction——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Chair permit me to read a precedent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair withholds his ruling for that purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On page 430 of Gilfry's Precedents——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish simply to say that I think the position taken by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is correct. There is no business in order except the securing of a quorum. That was decided by Vice President Marshall upon a point raised by the present occupant of the chair. If the Chair desires the decision, I will call his attention to it. It will be found on page 213 of Gilfry's Precedents, and is as follows:

The roll was called and no quorum responded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order that until a quorum appears there is nothing in order except to secure a quorum, and that that order has been entered.

The VICE PRESIDENT (Mr. Marshall). The point of order is sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be of the same opinion still. The question, however, in this case arose on a point of order, not in the transaction of ordinary business. No point of order was made against the motion of the Senator from Missouri when the motion was made, and therefore the Chair entertained it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the precedent which I have before me is not very complete, but it is quoted as follows on page 430 of Gilfry's Precedents:

During the consideration of the conference report on H. R. 21871 "to amend the national banking laws," Mr. LA FOLLETTE raised a question as to the presence of a quorum.

Mr. Aldrich raised a question of order, viz, that a Senator must be in the possession of the floor, and that he can not take the floor by asking to make a parliamentary inquiry and then make any motion.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) sustained the question of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE appealed.

Mr. Aldrich moved to lay the appeal on the table, and on a division the yeas were 32, nays 14, no quorum voting.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) counted the Senate and announced that a quorum was present, and so the motion prevailed.

It is sort of a negative statement of the case but it implies evidently that if the Chair had not been able to count a quorum as being present the appeal could not have carried.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. Under the rules no debate of any kind is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll is in process of being called by the Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. No debate or motion is in order pending the roll call.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I observe he is not in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Being unable to secure a transfer of that pair, I am not at liberty to vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. That Senator being necessarily absent from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCKINLEY (when his name was called). I inquire if the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. As I have a pair with that Senator and am unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], who is absent. I am informed that, if present, he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as previously with regard to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement as to the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to state that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If the Senator from North Carolina were present, he would vote "yea" on the pending motion.

Mr. BALL. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. WATSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who is absent. Therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE). The present occupant of the chair announces his pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote if present, the present occupant of the chair withholds his vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—9.

Ashurst	Heflin	McKellar	Robinson
Capper	Ladd	McNary	Sheppard

NAYS—30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to take a recess is lost.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what was the announcement of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas are 9 and the nays are 30.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has developed. The Sergeant at Arms stands instructed to compel the attendance of absent Senators, but no report has been received from the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, with all respect, I make the suggestion to the Chair that the order to the Sergeant at Arms to bring in Senators to develop a quorum was made some time ago, and since then a quorum has been developed and announced by the Chair. If I recollect correctly, that is the situation. A quorum having been developed, that order, of course, is a dead order.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It does not stand for the whole night.

Mr. WATSON. The order is a continuing order until revoked by action of the Senate.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then there are a thousand of such orders out, for I never heard of one of them being revoked in my life.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator did not stay until they were revoked.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have been here as long as has the Senator from Indiana, and I say that I never heard of one being revoked. That order was made to develop a quorum. A quorum having been developed, the reason for the order ceases to be. Of course that is the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not rule upon that question with the authority of any precedent, because he has had no time to look up the precedents. The Chair would be of the opinion——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Chair would be of the opinion that the order of the Senate to compel the attendance of absent Senators was designed to develop a quorum at the time at which it was made. A quorum was developed. The order can not stand to develop the lack of another quorum occurring subsequently. The Chair distinctly remembers many such orders to the Sergeant at Arms to have been discontinued or revoked. The Senator from Texas is now recognized.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I make the point of order that the last vote having disclosed the lack of a quorum, the roll should be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator that the presence of a quorum was developed. Then, on the motion to take a recess, the lack of a quorum was shown. At the last session the Chair in a similar circumstance, where the vote disclosed a lack of a quorum, suggested the absence of a quorum and ordered the Secretary to call the roll, and the Senate took exception to that procedure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask the Chair to rule on this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the vote discloses the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I make the point, Mr. President, that the Chair should order the roll to be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas suggests the absence of a quorum?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Curtis	Hale	Ladd
Brandegee	Edge	Heflin	Lenroot
Bursum	Ernst	Johnson	Lodge
Calder	Fernald	Jones, Wash.	McCormick
Cameron	Frelinghuysen	Kellogg	McCumber
Capper	George	Keyes	McKellar
McKinley	Oddie	Shortridge	Warren
McNary	Pepper	Smoot	Watson
Moses	Phipps	Spencer	Weller
Nelson	Ransdell	Sutherland	Willis
New	Reed, Pa.	Townsend
Norbeck	Sheppard	Wadsworth

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. REED of Missouri, and Mr. ROBINSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. COLT entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. While a quorum is here, I desire to call the Chair's attention to a ruling that was made a few moments ago that is clearly erroneous.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the statement at this time——

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The pending question is the motion to take a recess.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas rises to a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Kansas did not say so. He said he desired to discuss the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. I am calling the Chair's attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Kansas to say that he rose to a point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. That was the intention of the Senator from Kansas. In 1908——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the point of order made by the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not inform the Senator until he has heard it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, we can not hear the conversation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Neither can the Chair. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. CURTIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. Is a motion to take a recess debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a point of order. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the roll called on the motion to take a recess, and the roll call is in progress. The absence of a quorum developed upon the motion to take a recess, upon the call of the roll.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I can call the Chair's attention to this matter later.

Mr. ROBINSON. The roll call can not be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not recollect about that. The Chair will ask the Secretary whether the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to take a recess was voted upon, a quorum voting. The Chair is informed that a quorum did not vote, so that is the pending motion. Does the Senator demand the yeas and nays on it?

Mr. ROBINSON. The yeas and nays have been demanded, and the roll call is in progress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. ERNST (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I am unable to get a transfer of my general pair, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before of the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCORMICK (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). Being unable to secure a transfer of my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCKINLEY (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I withhold my vote. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired for the evening with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and I desire this announcement to stand for all votes this evening. I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague, the senoir Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the negative). I find that my general pair, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], has not voted, so I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. COLT. I have a pair with that Senator. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator to whom I transferred my pair having returned to the Chamber and voted, I withdraw my announcement of transfer and withdraw my vote, and leave my pair standing with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a pair with that Senator, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If the Senator from North Carolina were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 8; the nays are 30. There are present and not voting the following Senators who are paired: Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. LODGE, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. WATSON, Mr. BALL, and Mr. COLT, making a quorum. The motion does not prevail.

Before Mr. REED of Missouri concluded his speech for the day,

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Some while ago there was an order entered for the Sergeant at Arms to bring in absent Senators. I desire to inquire what report has been made under that order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the inquiry of the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Some time ago there was an order made by the Senate for the Sergeant at Arms to bring in absent Senators. Some time has elapsed. A quorum developed. Has there been any report made by the Sergeant at Arms under that order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not recall any report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the Senator from Missouri off the floor, and I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not do so.

Mr. HARRISON. I am only propounding a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has answered the inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. The answer was that no report had been made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no report that has been made.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Chair if a report may now be made to the Senate on that order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no requirement that a report shall be made.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for a report from the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say that if the Senator from Missouri is yielding for that purpose he is yielding the floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am obliged to yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think not for this purpose.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, yes. Otherwise a Senator could be taken off the floor at any moment, because a point of order is always in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Mississippi rose for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry. He has made the parliamentary inquiry and the Chair has answered the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. I asked the Chair——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object to the Senator from Missouri yielding for this purpose.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am not yielding. The Senator from Mississippi rose to a point of order and it is not for me to refuse to yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Washington is afraid that a report from the Sergeant at Arms would disclose the fact that a large number of Republican Senators were brought in under the order, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is not afraid of that, but he does not desire the Senator from Missouri to be taken off the floor. The Senator from Missouri has been taken off the floor once and can only make one more speech on the subject.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have two speeches on it if I want to make them. I am still making the first one.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; the Senator lost the floor awhile ago.

Mr. REED of Missouri proceeded with his speech, as appears earlier in the proceedings, and was interrupted by,

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that the Senator's throat is troubling him, and I do not want to keep him going on unnecessarily. Frankly, some of the older Senators who are here I do not like to keep here, and I do not believe we ought to do it; so Mr. President, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not object to that, but I do object to having it put in the RECORD that my voice is anything but music.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, it was not the Senator's voice; it was his throat. His voice is music; I agree with the Senator about that. Would the Senator like to have that stricken out of the RECORD?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, no; let it stay in. It will be an evidence that I have been serving my country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington that the Senate take a recess until 11 a. m. to-morrow? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Thereupon (at 11 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 21, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We are still beneath Thy guardian care, blessed Lord. Do Thou mercifully receive of tributes of gratitude. As we come into new days there come also new circumstances and new tasks. Reveal unto us the tide of Thy purpose and may we pursue it with unwavering confidence. If any are in perplexity, clear the way; if any are unduly burdened, help with the load; if any are tempted, be at their side; if any are sick, give them comfort; if any are in sorrow, dry their tears. O make the darkest day of life the path that leads to Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the matter of experiments in relation to the cotton-boll weevil, and in that connection I wish to state that there is to-day in session at Atlanta, Ga., a conference of world-wide significance; and I want to print in connection with my remarks a short statement showing the results of experiments with calcium arsenate and of the use of the airplane in connection with the destruction of the boll weevil.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE COTTON-BOLL WEEVIL.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, a conference is in session in the city of Atlanta Ga., to-day of nation-wide and world-wide importance. This conference is composed of leaders in science, in industry, and in agriculture, and has met for the purpose of devising ways and means for the eradication or control of the cotton-boll weevil.

The boll weevil now covers the entire area of the cotton-production section of the Union, and to all those who have studied the problem of cotton production in the Southern States in connection with the ravages of the boll weevil it must be evident that a most serious condition is confronting that industry.

World cotton production last year was approximately 16,000,000 bales, while world consumption was more than 20,000,000 bales, and this with industry normal nowhere except in America. During the last two years cotton production has fallen about 8,000,000 bales short of the actual consumption. There will be practically no carry over this year from which a deficit in production can be supplied.

The decrease in production is running about 6,000,000 bales annually and is confined to this country and almost solely due to the ravages of the boll weevil. The annual loss to the American cotton farmer, caused by this pest for the year 1922, has been estimated to be $1,000,000,000, and unless it is effectively controlled the huge losses suffered by the cotton farmer will continue, and will be brought to staggering proportions by the added losses to allied industries.

Raw cotton constitutes the Nation's chief export product, and has in one way or another more people dependent upon its continued production than any other industry in the United States, and this Congress should stand united in the support of any measure having for its purpose the preservation of this, the country's chief agricultural asset.

Up to this time the most effective means of controlling the boll weevil developed is the application of powdered calcium arsenate. The experiments resulting in this discovery were made by and under the direction of the Delta Laboratory, at Tallulah, La., which is under the Bureau of Entomology of the Department of Agriculture. The machinery for applying the calcium arsenate was also developed by the Delta Laboratory. For the small farmer a hand-gun duster, capable of poisoning about 8 or 10 acres per day is used, while a power duster, capable of poisoning about 70 acres per day, is available for the farmer with a larger acreage. Bulletins giving detailed information regarding the use and application of calcium arsenate, based upon the tests made by the Delta Laboratory, have been published by the Department of Agriculture.

I have secured reports direct from a few cotton farmers relative to the results obtained by the use of calcium arsenate. These confirm the official statements and set forth in a general way the results obtained. I wish to quote briefly from two of these reports. Mr. P. M. Atkins, of Monroe, La., states:

I got remarkable results from the use of the poison, although I received my machine late and the poisoning was done under great difficulties on account of the continuous rain during the poisoning season. I had approximately 650 acres in cotton, and made 218 bales on that acreage. I poisoned approximately 200 acres, and the poisoned cotton averaged a little better than half a bale of seed cotton per acre, in spite of the fact that we had an extremely poor season for growing cotton due to continuous rain, which prevented proper cultivation.

The cotton in the same field under the same conditions that was not poisoned made an average of approximately a bale of seed cotton to every 4 acres.

I think so well of the poisoning that I am going to buy additional machines and poison my entire crop this year. I expect to plant about 800 acres of cotton, and if it were not for the protection that I can get against the boll weevil by poisoning, I would not plant an acre.

Mr. J. T. Austin, of Monroe, La., states:

My results last year were very satisfactory. Where I used from four to six applications of calcium arsenate I made from one-half to three-fourths of a bale per acre, and where I did no poisoning on cotton raised under exactly the same conditions I made only one bale to five acres on an average.

During the 1922 season the Delta Laboratory made some very interesting experiments in applying calcium arsenate by airplane. While the experiments were not complete enough to be conclusive, they were very encouraging and showed the following results: Under average conditions a plane could poison from two to five hundred acres per hour, and under the best conditions as high as 1,000 acres per hour, with a consumption of about one-half as much poison per acre as the ground machines, at a total cost of operation per acre of less than the labor cost of operating the ground machines.

The airplane might also be used in the control of insects destructive of crops other than cotton. For instance, large orchards require protection against insects, the alfalfa and potato fields require similar protection, and these crops present even more favorable conditions for the use of the airplane than does cotton.

The means should be supplied and every opportunity given for cooperative effort by the Department of Agriculture and the air service for a thorough demonstration of all the uses that may be made of the airplane as a means of insect control.

In addition to this, immediate steps should be taken to guarantee a sufficient supply of calcium arsenate. The shortage is not due, as has been alleged, to any organization having established a monopoly or cornered the available supply for profiteering purposes. The investigation ordered by Congress developed the fact that calcium arsenate did not exist in sufficient amount to supply the needs of the farmers in the Cotton Belt or other sections where this insecticide is necessary.

A resolution is now pending before Congress to make available the sum of $10,000,000 for the purchase of nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate to be sold to the farmer at cost. This, or some similar measure should be passed without delay.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14041) to amend certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, on which the previous question was ordered on Saturday last. A separate vote was demanded on one amendment. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendment covering the Porto Rican loan.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? The Clerk will report the first amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 9, line 23, strike out all of section 5.

The SPEAKER. A separate vote has been demanded on two amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KETCHAM. Would it be in order to have read from the Clerk's desk the record and the proceedings on the Anderson amendment, which was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole by a vote of 75 to 48?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first vote comes upon the Anderson amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 9, line 23, strike out all of section 5.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 203, nays 117, answered "present" 2, not voting 105, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the enacting clause, and I make that motion for the purpose of saying that the crying need of the farmer to-day is not more facilities for getting in debt but——

On page 9, after section 4, insert a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That section 15 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 15. Federal land banks shall not make any loans through any agency other than the local national farm loan associations: Provided, That if any local national farm loan association shall refuse any farmer or farmers in its jurisdiction who are entitled to the benefits of the farm loan system eligible loans, or if no national farm loan association has been formed, or if the local national farm loan association fails, neglects, or refuses to serve properly the needs of its territory in any locality, the Federal Farm Loan Board may, after 30 days' notice to said association or associations, authorize and direct Federal land banks to make such loans direct: Provided further, That whenever any national farm loan association located in territory where direct loans are being made shall by resolution declare its willingness to serve the prospective borrowers in said territory and transmits a copy of such resolution to the Federal Farm Loan Board, the board shall at once instruct the Federal land bank of that district to discontinue making such direct loans and shall thereafter only make loans through said associations in said territory as long as it continues to serve its territory properly: Provided further, That no secretary-treasurer of a national farm loan association or any one acting for a Federal land bank shall engage in making land-mortgage loans, eligible at a Federal land bank, by, through, or for any other land-mortgage company, association, or agency.

"'Such direct loans shall be subject to the same conditions and restrictions as if the same were made through national farm loan associations, and each borrower shall contribute 5 per cent of the amount of his loan to the capital of the Federal land bank and shall become the owner of as much capital stock of the land bank as such contribution shall warrant.

"'The Federal Farm Loan Board shall, by proper regulations, require each Federal land bank to maintain out of earnings apportionable to stock acquired on direct loans sufficient reserves to cover and pay delinquent payments on such class of loans.

"'Shareholders in a Federal land bank under this provision shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such bank to the extent of the amount of stock owned by them at par value thereof, in addition to the amount paid in and represented by their shares.

"'Any borrower who acquires stock in the Federal land bank under the provisions of this section shall have one vote in all meetings of shareholders of the bank for each share of stock owned by such borrower not exceeding 20 votes and a like number of votes in the election of directors of such bank, such votes to be cast and canvassed in such manner as the Federal Farm Loan Board shall provide.

"'Any 10 borrowers under this section whose loans aggregate not less than $20,000 may at any time organize themselves into a national farm loan association by filing with the proper Federal land bank their articles of association as originally provided in section 7, and thereupon the stock held by such borrower in the Federal land bank shall be transferred to the association thus organized, and each borrower shall receive a corresponding amount of stock in such association. The stock of the bank and the stock of the association shall each be held subject to the same terms and conditions and the members thereof shall be entitled to the same rights and benefits as if the association had been originally organized under section 7 of this act.'"

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

Mr. WINGO. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion to recommit because it is a violation of the rules of the House in that it seeks to reopen a matter which the House has just determined by vote on the Anderson amendment. It embraces part of section 5, which the House a few moments ago struck from the bill, it being the Anderson amendment. It is in violation of the rules of the House in this respect, Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of section 5 there was permitted to individuals outside of farm-loan organizations to make loans from farm-loan banks. That was the main provision of section 5. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] sought to remove that provision from the bill and did remove it. The House by an overwhelming vote decided that it should not be done. Now, the motion to recommit seeks to reopen the question, and therefore is in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. WINGO and Mr. BEGG rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard?

Mr. BEGG. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BEGG. I desire to be heard right along the same line as the gentleman from Texas. In the first place, the first part of the motion to recommit restates what is already left in the bill, only in different language, namely, that the maximum loan is $25,000. That is all the amount of money that can be loaned under the bill. Hence that part is a restatement of what is already in the bill. Now, the major portion of the motion to recommit is, judging from the reading of it, half of it was the identical language that was just now cast out. The other half was a restatement, more particularly, namely, that the Federal Farm Loan Board can make loans to individuals without the cooperative feature, and the House has just gone on record as desiring to strike out that part of it which enables the Farm Loan Board to loan direct to individuals. This motion to recommit is just a restatement of that same principle. If you will look into the first half of the motion following the maximum amount of the loan you will see that is so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it very clear that while this does repeat some of the provisions already stricken out, yet it is coupled with new provisions in such a way as to make it quite different.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, both of the gentlemen are in error about the facts. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] is in error. I cut out $16,000 and make the maximum $25,000 direct. Then I leave out all direct provisions for agents and provide for loans direct to farmers who are refused loans arbitrarily on account of religious belief or other reasons by a local association. The rest of my motion covers stock liability of direct borrowers; that is the same that the Clerk read from the printed copy. A man who gets a direct loan under this provision has the same stock liability as association borrowers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this comes within the precedents that while, of course, you can not insert the same matter that was stricken out, yet it must be very nearly identical in order to have the point of order apply.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, if in any form or to any extent what we do now would be contrary to what we did a few moments ago, then the objection must be sustained, no matter what other matters are coupled with it, because on the motion to recommit we can not, when the House has already passed upon a matter, make that nugatory by again acting on it or inducing to vote for it because of some other matter. That is all.

Mr. BEGG. Does not the gentleman think that the motion to recommit is just a restatement of the principle voted out?

Mr. TOWNER. It certainly does contain some of the matter voted out, although I voted against it. My proposition is this, Mr. Speaker: If, as a matter of fact, this motion should be sustained, it would negative just what we did before; and it seems to me it must be clear that even if stated in different language, the objection must be sustained to the motion to recommit.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, he is in error about what my motion does. He would not say that because the House has rejected one scheme by which the farmer can get a direct loan, that would preclude the House from considering another plan by which the farmer would get the direct loan.

Mr. TOWNER. No; that does not reach the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it very clear that this, while in some measure it repeats what the House has already acted upon, changes it so much that the Chair thinks the House is entitled to say that it prefers the change or prefers to leave it as it was. Of course, it is a matter for the House to decide. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. WINGO. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, do the rules permit a division of the question?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-one gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 153.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground of no quorum. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There are many more than a quorum present. The point of order is overruled. The "noes" have it, and the motion to recommit is rejected. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 150, noes 61.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I challenge the vote on the ground that there was not a quorum voting and present.

The SPEAKER. There is clearly a quorum present.

Mr. WINGO. There was not a quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to have a quorum voting. A quorum is present.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five gentleman have arisen—not a sufficient number have arisen. The yeas and nays are refused, and the bill is passed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WINGO. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas objects.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

[For conference report and statement of House conferees see House proceedings of Monday, February 10, 1923.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the total amount of money carried by this bill as it passed the House was $333,654,000. The Senate increased the amount carried in the bill in the sum of $6,789,000. As the bill now comes back to the House from conference it carries net additions made in conference of $2,693,000, a reduction of approximately $4,000,000 from the figures placed on the bill by the Senate, so that the total of the bill as it now stands before you is $336,347,000. Of this amount the total for military purposes—that is, for the support of the Army—is $251,250,231; for nonmilitary activities of the War Department the sum is $85,096,000, making the sum total $336,347,000.

The situation which your conferees bring back to the House is that of an almost complete agreement on all the items of the bill with one exception. We feel that the result of the conference has been that liberal sums have been provided for all of the various activities. The House conferees have agreed to increases in some of the items for the training activities. We have endeavored to make ample provision for each one of them. For the information of the House I should like to state that increases have been made in some of the items for the support of the National Guard which will permit an increase in the number of horses in certain of the mounted organizations. It will also provide for an increase in the number of caretakers allowed to the different organizations.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman care to be interrupted at this time for a question, or shall I wait until later?

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman now or at any time.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the gentleman about the number of horses for the mounted units of the National Guard, which is dealt with by amendment No. 89. As I understand it, the House bill appropriated $1,250,000. I offered an amendment providing for $1,465,000, and I understand the conferees have agreed to $1,400,000, which is almost the amount asked for by the War Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. Almost the amount they have asked for.

Mr. HILL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRAGO. In the amount provided for the training of the reserve and the organization of the reserve, is that amount agreed upon sufficient to maintain their headquarters as they have been maintained for the different divisions and brigades?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that for the organized reserve the figures have been agreed upon. We find that there is an unexpended balance from the current year of $382,000. It is the plan of the War Department, so we have been informed, to expend this before the expiration of the fiscal year, so that approximately 3,800 officers may receive training in June under this unexpended balance. Under the terms of the bill the appropriation of $900,000 will train 9,000 men during the months of July and August. Under the amount which is carried for the detail of officers in the reserve to active duty it is figured that approximately 1,000 can be given details to active duty, which will be in the civilian training camps for instruction purposes, or to the service schools for the General Staff of the War Department for longer periods than 15 days.

Now in regard to the item for rent of buildings in the various cities and towns, and for clerical forces, we have appropriated $350,000 for expenses in preparation for these camps of instruction. Under the House language they are permitted to rent the necessary buildings and grounds in the work of preparing the camps. They are permitted to use all the clerical help they need for preparing for the training period under that appropriation for preparing for camps. But we found also that during the last year, without any authority in the appropriation bill or any authority of law that we could find anywhere, the department has expended a considerable sum for rent of buildings in the different cities and for hire of clerical forces where there are reserve officers in any number, and they asked us to appropriate approximately $181,000 for that purpose for the next fiscal year. Your conferees felt that as we do not appropriate any money to the National Guard for rent for the meetings of their officers between their training periods, as we appropriate no money to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for such purposes, as we appropriate no money to the civilian training camps for meeting purposes during the winter, it would be unwise and a waste of money and a useless expenditure to allow $181,000 for the rent of offices in the big cities or the larger towns and for clerical forces for the reserve officers between the periods of their training activities.

Mr. CRAGO. The only question comes up as to how they are to maintain these organizations. They are paper organizations in a way.

Mr. ANTHONY. In my judgment there will be no trouble about maintaining their organizations. All they want to rent these buildings for is for a place to meet in between times, or perhaps for the headquarters for the Regular Army officer who is detailed on duty with the reserve. In every large city in the country, or nearly every large city, there are many National Guard armories or facilities. There are military posts, there are Government headquarters in the big cities, and offices where there is ample room to accommodate any meetings of reserve officers for consultation with the Regular Army officers who are detailed there, and in my opinion it would be absurd for us to provide money to rent separate buildings in each city for a little group of officers to meet in two or three times during the winter.

Mr. CRAGO. That is all true. I am speaking of some office where they can maintain a clerk, or some one to be in charge of the correspondence of this organization. If that can be done under the agreement that you have made I shall be satisfied.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see why not. For instance, take the case of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], who spoke to me a few minutes ago. He certainly has around St. Paul a number of National Guard armories, and there is Fort Snelling, where there is abundant room for the Regular Army officers detailed to the reserves to maintain an office and abundant room for these officers to meet during the winter. They should meet and they should be instructed, but there are abundant Government facilities now available, I am sure.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I hope the gentleman will correct his statement so as to refer to Minneapolis instead of St. Paul.

Mr. ANTHONY. St. Paul and Minneapolis, the Twin Cities.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that if they have headquarters they will use them and they will not pay any rent?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. HULL. This is only to take care of places where the present Government facilities are not sufficient to furnish headquarters for the company.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sorry to say that there are no details furnished by the War Department as to the number of buildings they now rent or they propose to rent or the clerical force that they propose to hire for that purpose, and your committee considered that the orderly procedure would be for the War Department to ask the gentleman's committee for legislation authorizing it.

Mr. HULL. That is the reason they have put the authority in this bill. The amount of money is not in dispute. It does not increase the amount, does it?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be an increase of $180,000 if we gave the complete Budget estimate.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this true?—take the Fort Snelling case. There are quarters at Fort Snelling and facilities there, but it might occur to the War Department that it would be a little more convenient to have quarters in the Twin Cities, one or both of them, perhaps at one of the best hotels. The danger in this proposition is that if you are not a little careful you will provide for a lot of things—comfortable clubs, meeting places—all of which it would be well to have if we could provide for them properly, with due consideration to economy and other demands on the Public Treasury. The moment this authority is granted Congress has no control over it. It may be that the Military Committee in its wisdom may some time determine that this should be done. If it is so important, why has it not determined that it should be done? Why at the closing hours of a session on an appropriation bill should we be asked to legislate in regard to a matter that, to say the least of it, has many sides and presents many problems?

Mr. CRAGO. The answer to that is that they have been doing it without legislation. I think the gentleman from Minnesota is right—that wherever they have quarters provided by the Government they should be forced to use them.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a serious reflection on the War Department if the War Department without authority has been supplying these quarters. If that is true, and the department knew that it had no authority, it should have been here long ago insisting on the legislation, and not coming here at the end of the session and demanding on an appropriation bill what has not been asked for of the legislative committee.

Mr. HILL. I will say in connection with that that wherever it has been possible the War Department has availed itself of public property, but in a great many places it has been impossible. For instance, in Baltimore they have rented one small room on the outskirts of the business district for divisional headquarters for two divisions and five or more reserve regiments. These headquarters are not "luxurious clubs"; they are bare business offices, and there is kept only one clerk and one officer to take care of the records and the current work. Of course, Fort Howard might be used, but it is hard enough to get individuals to go into the Reserve Corps, and they would not go 15 miles from any city to a place like Fort Howard.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has not the National Guard armories in Baltimore?

Mr. HILL. They are all full and all used; that matter was gone over very thoroughly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not true that at the meetings of these reserve officers you would not have over 40 or 50 assembled at one time?

Mr. HILL. They are not used for meeting of reserve officers. They meet at the armories.

Mr. ANTHONY. They use the headquarters for the Regular Army officer detailed with the reserve?

Mr. HILL. They use the headquarters for the reserve units, and the five or more regiments have one office. I know of one reserve regiment where the commanding officer has had no office and he has had the work of his regiment done in his own office, but there is too much of it and it is difficult to do.

Mr. ANTHONY. The reserve regiment has no enlisted men; it is all on paper.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman knows that there shall be no enlistment, except for noncommissioned officers, in the reserve regiments except in case of war.

Mr. ANTHONY. The plan of the War Department was to raise the enlisted reserve at the same time it raised the commission reserve, but the enlisted reserve was an utter failure, for it has been impossible to get the men into the regiments.

Mr. HILL. Last year I offered an amendment to appropriate $250,000 to train the enlisted men in the Reserve Corps and the House passed an amendment appropriating $100. You could not get men into the Reserve Corps unless they are to go to camp and be trained.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Neither the War Department nor the Budget estimate asked for a dollar for training the enlisted reserve, because we had no reserve. Yet the House put in $5,000 to train enlisted reserve thinking you might have a few.

Mr. HILL. That only applies to the noncommissioned personnel.

As I understand it, the matter of the reserve pay for the 15-day camps of instruction has been settled by the conferees on this basis: The House appropriated $900,000 and the Senate raised it to $1,100,000. I offered an amendment to make it $1,546,709. I understand, and the gentleman from Wisconsin stated in committee——

Mr. STAFFORD. What committee?

Mr. HILL. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union which had this under discussion, that there is $381,000 available for training this year, and therefore it has been agreed—of course there is no chance of now voting on it—that this year for training the reserve officers there is available $1,281,000. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is for the 15-day period. There is also $250,000 available for the reserve officers on duty for a period of more than 15 days.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Just what did the Bureau of the Budget recommend for this specific purpose which the committee originally recommended to the House in the sum of $900,000?

Mr. HILL. One million seven hundred and forty-six thousand seven hundred and nine dollars for that training, but the committee gave $200,000 on another item. The War Department asked for only $1,746,709. I think that is correct.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Did the Bureau of the Budget have in mind the $381,000 that was not expended?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think they knew anything about it. At least no mention was made of it until developed in our hearings. We always make the inquiry as to the unexpended balance, and to our surprise found that there was that amount of money.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that there will be for the present season $1,381,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. There will be $1,755,000 directly appropriated in the bill, in addition to which there will be $382,000 unexpended balance, making a total of over $2,000,000 available.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How many Reserve Corps officers in the summer camps will the amount available train?

Mr. ANTHONY. The unexpended balance will permit the training of 3,800 in the month of June, before the end of the fiscal year. The $900,000 will permit the training of 9,000 for 15 days during July or August, and the $250,000 which we appropriated for longer than 15 days will permit the detailing to active duty of approximately 1,000 men, depending upon the length of the duty to which they are assigned.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I call the attention of the gentleman to Senate amendment No. 29, on page 17 of the bill, and I would like to know just what that means.

Mr. ANTHONY. The House conferees have accepted the Senate language in regard to taking care of, I think it was, 271 demoted captains who were originally commissioned largely from among the emergency officers under the act of June, 1920.

Mr. MILLER. Under the act of June 30, 1920?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. These men are largely of the ages of 30 years up to a high as 47 years. Under the provisions of the Army reorganization act which created a single list for promotion, much to the surprise of those who framed that legislation, these 271 officers who were commissioned to be captains were placed for promotion purposes among the first lieutenants.

Mr. MILLER. They were placed according to length or period of service.

Mr. ANTHONY. According to length of service, but undoubtedly the sound military rule in such a case is to rank a man in his grade according to his age and length of service. Otherwise, if you take a captain over 40 years of age and place him down for promotion among the young lieutenants, it means that his promotion is practically barred as far as his reaching a high rank is concerned, so that under the Senate provision before any promotions to the grade of captain are made, this will demand the promotion of these 271 older men who were originally commissioned as captains.

Mr. MILLER. The 271 men to be promoted were not to be promoted in the order in which they were demoted?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. This corrects their position on the promotion list, and in the judgment of the conferees puts them in the position where they rightfully belong.

Mr. MILLER. Does it put them in the position exactly in the inverse order in which they were demoted?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not sure about it.

Mr. MILLER. That is the important part of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. They were all squeezed down together, and my opinion is that these men would go back to the foot of the list of captains in the order of their present standing.

Mr. MILLER. The first lieutenants were set back. Are they going to promote these 271 in the inverse order of their demotion?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I want an answer to this question. I want to know what this is doing.

Mr. ANTHONY. In my opinion they would take their positions at the foot of the list of captains after they received their promotions.

Mr. MILLER. Are they to be promoted according to age or are they to be promoted according to the period of time in the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I stated to the gentleman, originally they were placed down among the lieutenants in the promotion list. They were men who had been appointed captains, men of mature years, largely emergency officers, and the War Department placed them on the promotion list among the first lieutenants, submerged them, and the action of this committee will correct the injustice done them at that time.

Mr. MILLER. Here is a case: A young captain in the Army—that is, under 30 years of age—will not be promoted until all of the captains over 30 years of age are promoted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Until these 271 are promoted. The rate of promotions from first lieutenant to captain in the Army is about 227 each year, so that it would take this young captain who is at the top of the list now a year before getting his promotion.

Mr. MILLER. Suppose he is at the bottom of the list, then he will have to wait at least 8 or 10 years.

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the terms of this bill the 271 men who were formerly captains are undoubtedly preferred in their advancement.

Mr. MILLER. The old rule gave them that, and there is nothing new about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, it did.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; they are absolutely submerged among the first lieutenants. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], who is the father of that amendment in the House.

Mr. HULL. It is unquestionably true the War Department when it came to pick a new captain would be forced under the amendment of the Senate to pick a captain from those who had been captains.

Mr. MILLER. Do they anyway?

Mr. HULL. And they will pick the one who is highest on the single list among those captains and promote them.

Mr. MILLER. On the basis of age rather than the period of time in the service?

Mr. HULL. No; as they are fixed on the single list. That would be the rule. There is no question about that. What we are trying to do by this amendment—and the amendment goes a little farther than the amendment or limitation that I placed on the bill when it was in the House—is to correct an injustice and at the same time to save money to the Government.

Mr. MILLER. Well.

Mr. HULL. Wait a minute. We have some 270 captains in the Army who were captains and by the appropriation bill were demoted.

Mr. MILLER. Two hundred and seventy-three.

Mr. HULL. Now, those men to-day are drawing the pay, subsistence, and allowance of captains. They are serving as first lieutenants. Now, what we are trying to do, and what we do do by this amendment, is to tell the War Department when they select a new captain not to select one who has not been a captain, but to pick the one who is at the top of the list and has been a captain. They will, unless you pass that amendment, be paying a lot of men for subsistence and allowance and duplicating that along for the next six or seven years.

Mr. MILLER. I understand exactly what the gentleman says and I understand exactly what he is aiming at and endeavoring to cure, but does the amendment of the Senate cure that?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. Let us see.

Mr. TILSON. How are they fixed on the single list? What determines their position on that list?

Mr. HULL. The length of service determines their position on the single list, and when they picked these captains they picked a lot because they had had experience and had shown great ability in the National Guard or in other ways, and they placed them in as captains. Now, on the single list they have them down below some who are first lieutenants. To be fair with the War Department, they did not expect they would be compelled to demote any, but they were compelled to demote a lot of these men, and when they were demoted from captains to first lieutenants they went down below about 400 first lieutenants on the single list, and unless you pass something like this they will remain there and be drawing the pay and subsistence of a captain and serve while a lot of first lieutenants will be promoted to be captains before they are, and thereby you will work an injustice and duplicate pay, subsistence, and allowance.

Mr. MILLER. And this will compel them to choose many of the 273 demoted captains when they reach the highest on the single list?

Mr. HULL. Certainly. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. MILLER. Take the case of a young officer who was overseas and appointed a captain prior to July 1, 1920, or on July 1, and he has subsequently been demoted. Now, will his status be changed?

Mr. HULL. No; his status will not change, because it is fixed by the Army reorganization act of 1920.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas for information of the effect of the agreement on Senate amendment 69, page 55, which struck out five lines of the provision provided by the House in reference to exhibitions by the aviation section.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why, the amendment which was agreed to by the House would compel the giving of a bond to the Government as a protection against damages wherever Government fliers give exhibitions on privately owned flying fields. It does not, however, interfere with the giving of exhibition flights on Government fields.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Where Army races are held by flying from one point to another, would it prevent their going into those races?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would not prevent such races if they race from a Government flying field, as, for instance, if they should start from Bolling Field and fly to another Government flying field, it would not interfere with such race. It is only on privately owned ground that it is necessary for the managers of that affair to indemnify the Government against possible damage.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I notice that the river and harbor item of $56,589,910 was retained by the Senate. That is not in conference?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I noticed in the Washington papers a statement purporting to come from the White House that if this provision stayed in the bill, notwithstanding the act of Congress, that the President would see to it that this amount was not expended, and I was wondering if the gentleman had any information whether that article appearing in the paper was true or false.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am unable to supply the gentleman with any information except that it is my belief that if the House will agree to the solution that the conferees will offer this afternoon this bill will be a law in a few days.

Mr. KINCHELOE. There will not be any effort to cut out of this bill the river and harbor act?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The paper stated that notwithstanding it should become a law with the signature of the President, he, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, was going to see to it that this amount was not expended, and that no amount exceeding that recommended by the Budget would be expended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think there was any authentic statement to that effect.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It was in the paper that is recognized as the exponent of the administration. I was wondering whether or not the gentleman had any accurate information on the subject.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to Senate amendment No. 16, which was agreed upon, in reference to the Officers' Training Corps, providing for 15 days' pay, where $900,000 is carried for that purpose. The chairman stated that there was $381,000 available for training this year, making a total of $1,281,000. How many reserve officers would that pay for 15 days?

Mr. ANTHONY. The approximate cost of training a reserve officer for 15 days is about $100; so that the gentleman will notice that the amount he names, $900,000, appropriated for the 15-day period, will train 9,000 men. The money in this bill, with the unexpended balance of this year, would certainly take care of 13,000 reserve officers during this year. Considering the fact that only 4,500 were trained in the camps last year, this is a very substantial increase.

Mr. HILL. It is a question of whether $106 will be necessary. That would take care of 11,000 officers for a 15-day period, would it not?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first Senate amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 18: Page 10, line 8, after the word "mileage," strike out "$250,000" and insert "$275,000: Provided, That the mileage allowance to members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when called into active service for training for 15 days or less shall not exceed 4 cents per mile: Provided further, That the laws providing for land-grant deductions shall not apply to travel at 4 cents per mile heretofore performed by members of the Officers' Reserve Corps under the War Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, approved June 30, 1922."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$250,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 21: Page 10, line 19, after the word "For," insert "divisional and regimental headquarters and the."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House further insist.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, No. 19 is a total. I suppose that has been corrected?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; that is a total, and has already been included in the conference report.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion as to amendment No. 21, that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a preferential motion that the House recede and concur.

Mr. McKENZIE. And on that I would like to be heard for a moment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks for a division of the question. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ANTHONY. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. McKENZIE. Five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes, and more later if he desires.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I feel that after making this motion I ought to say a few words in explanation of the motion. I want to say to you gentlemen, and you are perhaps familiar with what I shall have to say, that in 1920, when the Committee on Military Affairs of the House undertook the reorganization of the Military Establishment, we provided that the Military Establishment of the United States should be composed of three elements, namely, the Regular Army, the National Guard federalized, and the Organized Reserves. The National Guard, as you understand, is a State force. The State furnishes the armory; the State takes care of them, so far as the State service is concerned. However, under the law passed in 1920 we make the National Guard a part of the first line of defense in our Military Establishment by having it made possible to draft them into the service in time of emergency, and we furthermore pay to the officers of the National Guard and to the enlisted men for drill a small amount out of the Federal Treasury. The third element, the Organized Reserves, which now contains about 70,000 officers, a great many of them World War veterans. And, after all, the great element upon which we must depend always when we get into war is the reserves, who receive no compensation from the Government except their pay when called out for drill and training purposes.

Now, the law further provided that the President should have the power and the right to organize the reserves into tactical units and provide officers for them in the various areas, so that in case war should come the Regular Army, small as it is, backed up with the National Guard of the various States, and then united with the Organized Reserves, would complete the Army of the United States. Under that law these 70,000 men took out their commissions to serve the Government of the United States. All over the country they are trying to build up units, such as companies, regiments, and divisions, and getting men into these various divisions, regiments, and companies, so that in case war comes they can be called out in organizations and immediately begin to function.

In my judgment, it is a wise law. And let me say a word to my friends here in Congress who fought so strenuously on the question of the size of the Regular Army. I am one of those who have not favored a large standing Army, but I want a fairly decent-sized Regular Army. The House has seen fit to cut it down to the minimum. With that I am now in full accord. But the gentlemen who cut it down said, "We have the National Guard and we have the reserve." Now, for God's sake, gentlemen, do not undertake to cripple the National Guard or the Organized Reserves. When we passed this law to which I have referred we had the alternative of compulsory universal military training in this country, carrying with it thousands and thousands of officers, or the plan which we have adopted. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] served with me on that committee on which we worked months in writing this law as an alternative against compulsory universal military training in this country. I think the wisdom of our course at that time has been borne out.

Now, what is the proposition here? These men who voluntarily give their services, who take time away from their business, who take pride in this organization for the defense of our country—what are they asking in this bill? They are asking that the people of the United States give them a little money so that they may have headquarters in the cities or towns in which their regiments or divisions are organized. Are these men entitled to that much consideration? Shall we now be so parsimonious, after cutting down the Regular Army, after holding the National Guard in check, as to say that these 70,000 men who are engaged in building up an organization for the defense of our country shall not be entitled to have a little rent money to have a headquarters where they can write to their fellow officers and call them in to hear a lecture occasionally? I hope, gentlemen, for the sake of expediting this bill in the interest of national defense, in justice to those men who are willing to give their services to our country, this House will concur in this Senate amendment and write into the law the language which shall be so plain that they shall have the right to expend whatever amount is appropriated for this purpose, and not be compelled, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] said they did last year, to take a little money from the appropriation for barracks and quarters. They took a little money from the appropriation for general supplies and paid some rentals here and there at the different headquarters in the country. Remember this, my good friend from Kansas, that the reserves are a part of the Federal force of this country and not the National Guard, and that they are entitled to be supported out of appropriations made for the Regular Establishment.

In my judgment it was no violation of good faith for the officers in the Regular Army to say as they did, "We are not the whole thing." You men who have called the Regular Army the domineering force in this country have rebuked them for undertaking, as you said, to assume certain authority. Now, when they undertake to help the reserves of the country, do not get up here and criticize them and say they have committed a crime.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. As a matter of fact, at corps headquarters and a good many other Army headquarters there would be no additional expense at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. There would be no additional appropriation whatever.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. And this is simply to enable these men who are giving their time and services to have a little place where they can convey information back and forth to each other.

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. How many of these headquarters would there be in the United States?

Mr. McKENZIE. That would be pretty hard to tell.

Mr. STAFFORD. Three hundred and fifty.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the gentleman mean to say that there are 350 regimental headquarters?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the conference it was stated that at present there are 350 Regular Army officers distributed about the country for these social and functional headquarters.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It would be absolutely impossible to have that number of headquarters, would it not?

Mr. McKENZIE. I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the testimony, that there are 350 Army officers assigned to these divisional and regimental headquarters.

Mr. McKENZIE. That does not mean that many headquarters. Now, gentlemen, we control the purse strings, and we can limit the amount of the appropriation. The only question is how this money shall be expended. The amount is not involved, but simply the question how it shall be expended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the last remark made by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is one that we may well consider, and that is that Congress is called upon in this amendment to control the appropriation. That is what we want Congress to be in a position always to do. So far as the amount of money carried in this item is concerned, the Senate conferees and those who want this language would not only take half, would not only take a third, but they would take a quarter. In fact, they will take any amount that we will name if we give them this language.

Mr. TILSON. What does that indicate? Does it not indicate that they think it is of very vital importance?

Mr. SISSON. In other words, every man who believes in Prussianizing this country wants an item like this, in my judgment. I stated to the conferees, and I do not mind stating to you, that if I knew this plan would not succeed I would not care about the amount of money; but the trouble is I am afraid it may succeed. They propose as a beginning to establish 491 of these regimental and divisional headquarters, 42 of which shall be divisional headquarters and the remainder shall be regimental headquarters, and that in each of these headquarters there shall be at least one Army officer. The most significant thing is that there is no limit on the number of these regiments that may be organized. Now, when you shall legalize the establishment of these offices and place in each of them an Army officer in every district, there will be more than one to every congressional district. It is to be his duty and his business to secure all the membership and to increase the membership of this particular branch of the service as much as he possibly can.

If you invite the boys to these 15-day training camps and have a real good officer in charge, you will not simply have one to every congressional district, but it is possible to have 2,000 of these regimental headquarters, one to each regiment. If you wish to do that you may have 3,000,000 boys in these 15-day training camps. Where are you going to? They estimate now that the expense per man is $100 plus the mileage to these places. If you put an officer in each congressional district advocating this particular plan, get the boys together to frolic 15 days in the year, it will cost you not less than $350,000,000—$300,000,000 for the 15 days training and $50,000,000 to pay for the mileage. But the whole purpose is more than the merely training of the men. If you can get the regimental headquarters established in almost every neighborhood, with the preachment that they want 15 days of training of your boys and mine, you will have built up a sentiment encouraging militarism which, in my judgment, has not been equaled in Prussia. It is true that Prussia's was compulsory, but this is more. It is getting the nose under the tent, and your conferees were not quarreling about the payment of the money; they were quarreling about the principle.

I am not going to criticize how this money is to be expended, because all you gentlemen who vote at this eleventh hour to amend the law—and this is an amendment on an appropriation bill. I urged upon the Senators this law, that conferees always agree to, that the House or body that violates the rule and puts legislation on an appropriation bill, where the conferees in conference vigorously insist, it has always been the rule that the offending House shall recede. They admitted that that was the rule, but insisted that this matter should come back to the House. In other words, they put this down as one of the most important items in the bill. Why? For the reason that they see the picture that I have outlined. That being true, I can not give my consent to this radical departure in America for this un-American system.

Let me say that I have frequently lauded the honesty and integrity of the Army and Navy officers. I do now. But they are ambitious; they are controlled, like other human beings, by their ambition to the extent that other men are in other walks in life. These gentlemen employed by the Government are anxious to extend their influence and control, and they have hit upon a method which means that you gentlemen in two or three years will be absolutely helpless to control the situation, because they will control every congressional district in the United States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] says, Have not we the right to control the purse strings? We have. But if this system succeeds you will be unable when the Army and the Navy shall agree on the amount of money that shall be expended. I am not willing, directly or indirectly, to give my support to a proposition of this kind. The conferees could agree on all other items except this one item, but your conferees feel that this is not the way to do this. If the gentleman from Illinois and his committee think so much of this proposition, why do not they take it up in a legislative bill and have it properly considered and with proper limitations put upon it? By all the rules of conference, by all the rules of legislation, in a matter of so great importance, it ought not to be put on a bill in the closing hours of a session. By the rules of both Houses it can not be properly put on this appropriation bill. Let the matter go over until December; let the Military Affairs Committee take it up, give it proper consideration, before you take this radical departure and license by law this vast expenditure of money. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] never is more eloquent than when he talks upon his favorite topic, the dangers of militarism and the Prussianizing of our country. For myself I have altogether too high an opinion of the American people to believe that they are in danger of being Prussianized through either a Regular Army, an Organized Reserve, or any other military force.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] seeks to strike out from the Army appropriation bill the provision for the maintenance of regimental and divisional headquarters. What is our attitude four years after the ending of the Great War regarding this question of military preparedness against war? The gentleman's proposition goes to the very heart of the whole business. Is history to repeat itself? Are we, following this war, to lapse back into a policy of military unpreparedness as we have done before? We have only to read history to see that after achieving our independence we immediately forgot that that independence was achieved by our ability to fight for it. We forgot that that independence could only be maintained unless we were willing to spend sufficient moneys to prepare ourselves against any nation's attempt to take it away from us. We practically disbanded our Army and scuttled our Navy.

Then came the War of 1812. We were so unprepared for it upon land that the armed forces of our enemy landed upon our coasts, burned our cities, and even burned our own Capitol. Finally, with the help of a Navy that had been trained in the naval war with France and with the Barbary pirates, we managed to muddle through.

The Mexican War was but little tax upon our resources, either military or otherwise.

Then came the War of the Rebellion. There is no question but what this great civil conflict between the North and the South could have been averted if the statesmen of that day had looked far enough ahead and prepared for it by an adequate military policy. They did not do so. As a result, we are still owing for debts contracted during that war of 60 years ago.

Immediately following the close of that war we disbanded our armies, forgot all about the question of national defense, retaining only a sufficient force to now and then fight the Indians. Military preparedness against war was given practically no consideration from the close of the Civil War until just before the beginning of our next war, the war with Spain in 1898. As a result, that war found us with an army of some 25,000 well-drilled men but practically no trained citizen army of either officers or men.

That taught us a lesson in reference to the necessities of an effective and efficient navy, but very little in reference to the necessity of the maintenance of an adequate policy in reference to our Army.

Then came the Great War. We had advance notice of it so far as our own entry was concerned of two and a half years. Yet we did not anywhere near adequately prepare for it. It was practically a year or more following our entry before our troops were really engaged with the enemy.

During all of this time there have been men who have stood up and told the country of the dangers of not having a military policy. These men have been called militarists, but if the country had followed the counsels given by some of these men we would not have the debt to pay that we have to-day.

With all of this in mind, in 1920, following the Great War, Congress passed the Army reorganization act which materially amended the national-defense act. By this bit of legislation Congress laid down for the first time a real policy of preparedness against war. It was my privilege, as it was the privilege of many in this House, to have participated in the consideration of that great measure; and I for one am not going to stand here to-day and undo or permit others to undo without a protest the work that was there accomplished.

Among other things, it provided for an Army composed of Regulars, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves. Bear in mind that each and every one of these units were made part and parcel of the Army itself. The country was divided into corps areas. In each area will be found one or more of these reserve divisions. The divisions in turn are divided up into regimental and other units. These different units from the division down are being built up with a full war-strength complement of reserve officers and a small number of noncommissioned officers. In a division will be found a skeleton organization of officers from the divisional commander down to the company officers. As I understand it, in the event of war it will be the mission of these reserve divisions to rapidly absorb and train the men who will be assigned to them either by draft or otherwise.

For instruction purposes and for the maintenance of a headquarters one or more Regular officers are assigned to these divisional and regimental units. In a way it is a paper organization. An Army division is not a real divison for all purposes, of course, until it has its complement of enlisted men. But in another sense it is not a paper organization at all. These skeleton organizations with a full complement of officers are supposed to function immediately following the outbreak of a war. They can not do so if headquarters are not maintained and if they have not some means of getting together and keep in touch with one another. It is obvious, then, that these regimental and divisional headquarters should be maintained. Sometimes these headquarters cost the Government nothing, for they can be located in public buildings or on Government reservations. That can not be done, however, with all of the units. For example, the Eighty-eighth Reserve Division is spread over the States of Iowa, Minnesota, and North Dakota. The headquarters are in Minneapolis. There is no available space in Minneapolis where these headquarters can be located. The Government has had to rent space itself. Let me say that the public spirit of these reserve officers of the Eighty-eighth Division was such that from September, 1921, until May of 1922 they paid the office rent themselves. Yet we hear talks of Prussianizing the country by reason of commissioning and encouraging men of that sort! They desire to do all in their power to so keep prepared that this country will never get into another war. We ought to help them.

If the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] prevails, we strike out this provision. It ought to stay in. You can not have an organized reserve without an organization. This takes offices and a headquarters. What do they do? Some of the gentlemen who have spoken apparently have very little idea of what these headquarters are for and what is accomplished by maintaining them. Let me take the Eighty-eighth Division, for example. The office quarters are extremely modest; the monthly rental is small; the staff of regulars is comprised of some five or six Regular officers. Their first task was to compile a correct list of addresses of the three to four thousand reserve officers residing in the States of Iowa, Minnesota, and North Dakota. In addition I find that by getting together and working together they have induced some 200 veteran officers of the late war to accept commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps. In further addition to this there is conducted from divisional headquarters a correspondence course which is being taken by some 600 officers in the divisions located throughout the whole divisional area.

These men in the Reserve Corps are young men. Many of them change their homes and places of business. If headquarters were not maintained it would be no time before the present lists would become obsolete and of no account. Furthermore, these headquarters are in themselves sources of information on all matters pertaining to military affairs. They bring the regular into intimate touch and contact with the reserve officer and with the civilian population. This is good for the regular, and it likewise should be the means of acquainting the people generally more intimately with the affairs of the Regular Army.

But why take up the time to outline or attempt to detail the uses to which these headquarters are put? You simply can not have an organization, skeleton or otherwise, without a headquarters and a headquarters staff. You were asked to eliminate them. If we are not careful we will soon be in a position where we might as well strike out the Officers' Reserve Corps from the national defense act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman give any value to the eleven and twelve thousand reserve officers training in small communities to keep the organization intact and being instructed by the Army officers in Army maneuvers?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; I give full value to that, but you only propose to get them there for 15 days——

Mr. STAFFORD. The hearings state that they only propose to have one-third of the entire number every three years, and we are giving them more than that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But you only get them to go every third year?

Mr. STAFFORD. We are doing more than that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The suggestion has been made that the Eighty-eighth Divisional Headquarters should be at Fort Snelling. Fort Snelling is 8 miles away from the center of the city. You can not get busy men to travel out of the city for any such purpose. You ought not ask it. Our opponents say: Go to the armories. The armories of every State are maintained by the State organizations for National Guard purposes, and the Government has no control over them. In my own city the Government exercises no control over them.

Mr. STAFFORD. The National Government has a representative of the National Army there.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; but the National Government can not say that we can have this room or that room, and the gentleman from Wisconsin knows that they have no control over the armories there. Then, there is no room. Now, under the pretext of saving $350,000 the conferees come here and ask us to strike out the maintenance of the regimental or divisional headquarters, and to go back, if you will, to the days before the war, when we had nothing like a reserve force at all. Gentlemen, this is the first step toward eliminating the Organized Reserve in our Army system. I for one shall be no willing party to letting this country again lapse into the condition in which it has been before regarding national defense.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-five Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which is pending before the House, and which the House conferees oppose, proposed to appropriate $494,000 to maintain headquarters throughout the United States.

Mr. SWING rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield.

Mr. HILL. It is $350,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield. It was $494,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what the War Department wants.

Mr. MADDEN. I shall come to the explanation of it. I am making this speech. Four hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars was asked to maintain headquarters for the Reserve Officers' Corps throughout the United States, to pay rent, to pay men, to keep up 491 headquarters, divisional and regimental—42 of which are divisional. They will have headquarters in larger number if this amendment of the Senate is voted into the bill than the Regular Army and the National Guard combined. They have no men to command. The only thing there is for them to do is to take training when they are called out; and it is proposed by the Senate amendment to establish headquarters to assemble the men for annual drill and to maintain these headquarters for that purpose. One hundred and eighty-one thousand dollars of the $494,000 asked, which has been cut to $350,000, was expended by the War Department this year without any authority of law, in violation of law, without rime, reason, or justice, without legal authority; and if the $350,000 that I alluded to should be appropriated, the $181,000 would be paid from that.

What do we propose? We propose that there shall be no such headquarters. We propose to drill these men, and we have provided for the training of about 11,000 of them in the coming year. We are training 110,000 men to make them into reserve officers through the colleges of the United States. We are providing for a National Guard of 250,000 men. We are providing for an Army of 137,000 men, including the officers, but we are opposed to the imposition of this additional burden on the taxpayers of the country for which there will be no return received. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars is not the measure of the amount that we will be called upon to pay if this be once established. These headquarters will become permanent fixtures, and they will be filled to overflowing with men on the Government pay roll, and no man can venture to predict what the aggregate annual cost will be.

Now I am as much for an efficient Army as any man in America. I yield to no man in my patriotic desire to see American interests protected, not even to the most enthusiastic reserve officer who ever wore the uniform. I am for America, and in doing for America I believe we ought to serve the interests of those who pay the taxes [applause] while we are doing the other things. I wonder if the taxpayers have no rights here. Has the time come when we are willing to say they have none? Are we willing to continue imposing untold burdens upon the people of America in order that we may be able to yield to the fancy of men who believe it is necessary to add more employees to the Government pay roll? That is what it means. The responsibility is on you. You are going to decide this question. You will determine the outcome and when you determine it do not forget that there is somebody somewhere in the coal mines, on the farms, on the railroads, in the sewers creating better sanitary conditions for us all, who must pay the burdens. Now, men, think occasionally of those who have no Government pay roll to draw from and consider that the Government expenses are already too high and overburdensome. [Applause.] And if you do, you will stand by the Committee on Appropriations and further disagree to the Senate amendment which proposes this abnormal and unnecessary expense on the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to yield to two more talks on this question. Does the gentleman from Maryland desire time? If so, I will yield him five minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the national defense act provides as follows:

> That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, and the Organized Reserves, including the Officers' Reserve Corps and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

Section 3 provides:

> The organized peace establishment, including the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves, shall include all of those divisions and other military organizations necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency declared by Congress. The Army shall at all times be organized, so far as practicable, into brigades, divisions, and army corps, and whenever the President may deem it expedient, into armies.

By that act, which the Congress of the United States very wisely passed and which at the present time is on its test, you provided that the reserves should be the third and main line of defense, and necessarily provided that in time of peace they should be organized into definite tactical units.

Under the authority you have given for the creation in time of peace of tactical units, which took you months to create in the recent emergency, there have been created in this country by the War Department and are now being perfected and created 27 Infantry divisions, 6 Cavalry divisions, 108 Infantry regiments, 54 Artillery regiments, 24 Cavalry regiments, 9 nondivisional headquarters, and other units, amounting to 449 in all. You have provided that they shall have only skeleton organizations of officers, and it is provided by the War Department that there shall be noncommissioned officers when a certain number of commissioned officers are enrolled.

It is absolutely certain that where public headquarters are not available, as they are not in many places, there must be a room where the Regular officer and his clerk, who has charge of the records, training, and organization of these units, can perform his duties. I will say that I know of one room in which 10 of these 449 units are administered by one Army officer, who is executive officer and instructor for all of them, and has one clerk. Wherever it is possible armories are used, but it is not possible in many cases to use such existing facilities. These rooms are not intended to be "social headquarters," as one gentleman called them. Gentlemen, the difficulty of getting officers to come into the Reserve Corps is extraordinarily great.

I can expect the opposition of Members of this House who are opposed to the national defense act, who are opposed to the reserve system, and take the point of view which was just presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. I am not discussing that point of view, but apparently he is against the theory of a reserve organization, because he stated it tended to militarism.

I do not take that view. If you take that view, you will vote with Mr. SISSON to cripple the reserve system by taking away these headquarters. They carry on the correspondence courses and other instruction there, and it is a marvel to me, gentlemen of the House, that you are able to get any men who will go into the Reserve Corps. It is a very difficult thing to recruit. There is no attraction for a reserve officer to go to a sand dump like Camp Meade and spend 15 days in the middle of the summer in the hot sun when he would like to go off on a pleasant vacation elsewhere.

But in regard to this particular item, we are not asking the Government for one more penny for the national defense. The amount of this paragraph is $350,000, and you are not asked by this motion to increase the amount, only a part of which is for headquarters, and I say this House can take care of itself in the future in regard to any amount asked.

What you are asked for at the present time is to permit the War Department, which stands for your safety in the case of any emergency, to organize now efficient units which may be called on and into which your enlisted men may be poured in time of war, with efficient officers to lead and care for them. I hope that you will vote for this motion and give this authority to the War Department, if it does not possess it now. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I find by talking with Members that gentlemen who have discussed this proposition so far have failed to make clear the point in controversy to some Members who have not studied it in detail. The provision as it passed the House reads as follows:

> For establishment and maintenance of camps for training Organized Reserves, including transportation, operation of motor cars, water and disposal of sewage, preparation of camp sites, and incidental expenses, $350,000.

Now, that is the provision as it passed the House and as it will stand if the Senate amendment is not agreed to, thereby providing $350,000 for training. The Senate added the words "divisional and regimental headquarters." So that the provision would read:

> For divisional and regimental headquarters and the establishment and maintenance of camps for training of the Organized Reserve, including transportation, operation of motor cars, water and disposal of sewage, preparation of camp sites, and incidental expenses, $494,400.

So the controversy here is over the words "divisional and regimental headquarters," and the question is whether we want to provide for these permanent divisional and regimental headquarters. The training is provided for, whether the Senate amendment is agreed to or not; so that the question that is before the House now is not the question of the training, or whether or not the training of the reserves is to be effective, but is solely the question of whether we are to provide for the maintenance of permanent headquarters throughout the country.

I do not believe that it is necessary. I do not believe that the House should agree to it. If it is necessary, it should be approached in an orderly way, brought in by the committee having jurisdiction, and every phase of it considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware, and the House is aware, that this proposal means very shortly the establishment of 491 offices throughout the country, to which a Regular Army officer is to be assigned, 491.

Mr. FIELDS. Four hundred and ninety-one permanent headquarters throughout the country. I do not believe that the military exigencies are such as to warrant the establishment of a system of that kind. I do not believe that it is necessary. I do not believe that the condition of the Treasury warrants it, and I think the Senate amendment should be disagreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am sure that my colleague from Kentucky does not mean to concede the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that there would be a Regular Army officer detailed to every one of these four hundred and some odd headquarters? You do not mean to concede that, do you?

Mr. FIELDS. I do not know that I caught that part of his statement, but I do say that it would result in the establishment of 491 permanent headquarters to be maintained at Federal expense, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. At the present time there are 350 Regular Army officers assigned to these divisional headquarters.

Mr. SNYDER. Without pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are Regular Army officers. That is the testimony produced before the conference committee.

Mr. FIELDS. Of course, they all get pay, and if we need more regular officers to maintain those headquarters they would be assigned.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman from Kansas give me some more time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman undoubtedly understands that the law as written in the House provided for the establishment of camps, and it is not necessary, as I am informed, to expend over $50,000 for that purpose. Therefore, the other money would be returned to the Treasury, and, as a matter of fact, if you are going to cut this Senate amendment out, this appropriation could be reduced to about $50,000.

Mr. FIELDS. My friend, the acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, knows that when Congress provides a certain amount for the maintenance of permanent regimental headquarters throughout the country that amount will be expended for the maintenance of such permanent regimental headquarters.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. As I understand the gentleman, whether this amendment is adopted or not, it does not affect the amount of the appropriation in the bill?

Mr. FIELDS. It does not affect the amount for training. It does affect the amount of $144,400 for the maintenance of permanent divisional and regimental headquarters. That is the question at issue here.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It increases it by $104,000.

Mr. FIELDS. If the amendment prevails, it will increase the amount appropriated $144,400.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman is talking about amendment 22.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And the Government expended, legally or otherwise, $106,000 for that purpose in the last year.

Mr. FIELDS. The maintenance of these divisional and regimental headquarters is not necessary, and amendment 21 makes amendment 22 necessary.

Mr. VAILE. The maintenance of these divisional and regimental headquarters does not increase the appropriation one penny, does it?

Mr. FIELDS. I have never seen anything maintained in connection with the Military Establishment that did not cost the taxpayers of this country money. [Applause.]

Mr. VAILE. It is not in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, before asking for a vote on the pending amendment, I think the House ought to understand that the attitude of the conferees is entirely friendly to the idea of affording the reserve officers every reasonable dollar they need for an adequate amount of training.

It is an entirely new undertaking. For the first time last year we gave the officers of the reserve any field training at all. In this bill we are providing that three times as many reserve officers shall be trained this calendar year as were trained in the last calendar year. The only point of difference now between the House and the Senate and pending before you is a thing which of itself is really insignificant and not of such magnitude that it deserves the time that has been given to it in the discussion here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to confirm the statement I made as to whether or not it was planned to have an Army officer at each one of these regimental and division headquarters?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is planned to have 350 Regular Army officers detailed to these different reserve headquarters and probably more during the next fiscal year, all of whom will be under the full pay of their rank and grade.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to read from the hearings? My statement was challenged by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER]. I said my statement was confirmed by the record of the hearings. I now wish to read the testimony of Colonel Dickinson, who is sitting in the gallery, who testified as to this matter—

> Now, it is planned by the War Department ultimately to detail one officer of the Regular Army with each organized reserve regiment and a certain number at each reserve division headquarters.

Mr. SNYDER. What I had in mind was what exists to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Three hundred and fifty of them exist to-day, according to the statement given us in the hearing.

Mr. SNYDER. Not at each headquarters by any means.

Mr. ANTHONY. Several gentlemen have grown eloquent on the proposition now before us; but, my friends, there is a practical proposition involved. If we permit this amendment to be made and this new language to be placed on the statute books, giving authority for the rental of reserve offices in all the cities of the country, if we give them wide-open authority to hire all the clerks they want for these headquarters, it is liable to grow into an item of expense that will stagger this House. There is practically no limit to the number of organizations that may be proposed in this paper reserve that is being created. If you organize all the man power in this country into paper regiments and appoint reserve officers as colonels of those regiments, and rent headquarters in every town and city for every one of those regiments that exist only on paper, and give them clerical forces, it will not be only $181,000 that the War Department will be asking you for, but it will be two or three million dollars in a few years.

Now, with regard to the Organized Reserves, we have 70,000 officers in the reserve. They are men who, most of them, were trained in the World War; men having the ability and the training and the military knowledge to take and exercise high command if again this country is confronted with the emergency of war. We propose to afford them adequate field training from year to year, and to increase the amount as the Regular Army is able to take care of the training. But if we permit this paper organization of an enlisted reserve corps, if we permit the creation of regiments which exist in name only, with not an enlisted man in any of them but just the officers assigned to duty, and to these imaginary regiments grant headquarters and the rent of buildings in cities, giving them clerical forces and officers, it will be one of the most ridiculous grants of authority to any department of the Government that I have ever known of during my 15 years of service here.

The able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], if his committee should be asked by the War Department to grant that authority would certainly properly restrict it. He would never dream of giving wide-open authority to the War Department to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars for clerks, to go the limit, as he proposes to do here to-day. I ask the gentleman to surround any amendment which he proposes here with the same business precautions that he himself would use in his own committee instead of coming here and asking us to throw the door wide open to useless waste and extravagance. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kansas that it was my understanding, and I think it was the understanding of the gentleman from Kansas, that the national defense act as amended in 1920 gave this authority to the War Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. It did not give the authority to the War Department, and I challenge the gentleman to point out a single word of law which authorized the War Department to spend a dollar for that purpose last year. Yet the War Department went ahead and expended that money.

Mr. McKENZIE. From the fact that it is a Federal force and a part of the Regular Military Establishment, it is natural to assume that they had the right to spend money to keep this thing up.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call attention to the fact that under the item of barracks and quarters we authorized an expenditure for the enlisted reserve, which, unfortunately, does not exist, but nowhere is there authority for expenditure for the commissioned personnel.

Mr. McKENZIE. Let me say to the gentleman, if he will permit me——

Mr. ANTHONY. I permit the gentleman——

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the gentleman will concede that I have always stood for economy since I have been in this House. I stood for a good Military Establishment, and I want to say to the gentleman that if he is afraid of any part that I may play in the Committee on Military Affairs in the years to come, I will see that this matter is safeguarded; but for the present it is safeguarded by the Appropriations Committee, which has limited the appropriations to $350,000. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to remind the gentleman that that appropriation is for a necessary purpose, to provide the money for the organization of these training camps where we want to train 11,000 or 12,000 of these men; and if the $350,000 is dissipated for other purposes, for the hire of clerks and the rent of offices in cities, it will interfere with the training of these reserve officers in the summer camps.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Does it not occur to the gentleman that it is rather illogical for the legislative committee having jurisdiction of these matters now in the closing days of the Congress to ask the Committee on Appropriations, of whose acts they have been quite jealous in the past, to do something which they themselves have not attempted to do, something that will involve great expenditure, and that involves an entirely new policy?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that I am not only surprised but astonished at their attitude. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Wyoming that the Committee on Military Affairs now has 30 matters on the calendar, and it has been impossible to get consideration.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. We are now discussing amendment 21, which authorizes the expenditure of money for divisional headquarters. Is it true that when the Senate inserted that amendment it also provided for an increase up to $490,000? Did they not provide that in amendment 22 and then recede from that amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. And left it at $350,000.

Mr. TEMPLE. So this amendment will not increase the amount?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say that the only danger is that it will be increased by the War Department without any authority; that they will make expenditures from other items in the bill.

Mr. TEMPLE. But agreeing to this amendment will not increase the appropriation?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will increase the amount expended for the purpose if the War Department continues to violate the law.

Mr. TEMPLE. But this will not increase the appropriation?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. Gentlemen of the House, there are ample facilities in every large city. Armories belonging to the National Guard, existing military posts, existing headquarters in all of the nine corps areas where ample office room can be given the Regular Army officers on duty with the reserve corps. There are a number of places where they can have ample room and light and heat in buildings owned by the Government or by the State, where they can have their meetings in the winter between training periods, and I hope the House will not put its approval on this absolutely unnecessary waste of $181,000. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. I understand the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRAMTON). There are two motions—one by the gentleman from Kansas to further insist and one by the gentleman from Illinois to recede and concur, and that question has been divided. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the House votes down the motion to recede, is that tantamount to further insisting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is without further action of the House. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House recede.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McKENZIE) there were 82 ayes and 85 nays.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 121, not voting 142, as follows:

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRAMTON). Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. COCKRAN. I could not say that I was listening, but I was here. I was listening as far as I could. I certainly was in the Hall.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman states that he was present and listening he is entitled to vote; otherwise not.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am sure I was here part of the time, and I think I was listening most of the time. I would not undertake to say that I was here all of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is whether the gentleman was present and listening.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to concur.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk the following motion to concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas offers a motion to concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to concur with an amendment as follows: After the word "headquarters" in said amendment insert "Provided, That not exceeding $60,000 of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the maintenance of divisional and regimental headquarters of the Organized Reserves, nor shall any of such funds be used for the establishment or maintenance of any additional divisional and regimental headquarters of the Organized Reserves unless specifically authorized by law."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion that I made to recede and concur is a preferential motion and the vote should come now upon the motion to concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. The motion to recede and concur is preferential; but having been divided, a motion to concur with an amendment takes precedence over a motion to concur.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question having been ordered after the motion had been made, no amendment is now in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Kansas as to that point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I think that the Speaker has stated the parliamentary situation correctly. The motion having been divided, and the motion to recede having been adopted, therefore I think a motion to concur with an amendment is now in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order made by the gentleman from New Jersey is that the previous question having been ordered the gentleman from Kansas can not now offer a motion to concur with an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the previous question was ordered upon the motion to recede.

Mr. DOWELL. But the gentleman did not present his amendment at all, and now it is too late.

Mr. ANTHONY. We had to dispose of the motion to recede first.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. On the point I made I desire to submit that the previous question was ordered upon the motion to recede and concur, and then it was divided.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one point of order pending now.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to be heard upon the point of order. I think the reporter's notes will show that the motion the gentleman from Kansas made was made first to recede and concur with an amendment, and thereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] made a preferential motion to recede and concur. Then the question was divided, and the previous question was ordered. I submit that that is the situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that the motion made by the gentleman from Kansas was to further insist.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, that is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that thereafter the motion to recede and concur was made by the gentleman from Illinois. It is the impression of the Chair that if the motion made by the gentleman from Kansas for the previous question was made upon the whole question, to recede and concur, the gentleman's motion to concur with an amendment is not now in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that the question was divided, whereupon I moved the previous question on the motion to recede.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is rather a peculiar situation. A motion to recede and concur with an amendment could not be entertained until the House has receded; a motion to recede and concur taking precedence while the amendment is in disagreement. To give the motion to recede and concur with an amendment a status at all, it is first necessary to have a division of the question. The House having agreed to recede it puts the question back into the position it occupied originally, where a motion to recede and concur with an amendment is preferential.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the motion to recede had failed, then the motion of the gentleman from Kansas would have been agreed to. In other words, it would have been equivalent to further insist upon the disagreement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The motion to recede being voted down is tantamount to a further insistence on disagreement.

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely. The gentleman contends that having been defeated in that, he has an opportunity now to amend.

Mr. STAFFORD. Until the House voted up recession there was no opportunity for any Member to offer a preferential motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. But the previous question having been ordered the opportunity for amendment is lost, and no amendment is in order after the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Kansas the nature of his motion for the previous question?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I recollect I moved the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede. The motion to recede and concur was divided, and if the Chair will permit me, I desire to read now from Cannon's Procedure in the House of Representatives:

However, the motion to recede and concur is divisible and the House having receded, a motion to amend takes precedence over the motion to concur.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the motion was to recede and concur, and debate having taken place while people were still seeking the floor, the gentleman from Kansas moved the previous question and it was carried with some noes, and thereupon a division was made of the question, and——

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. HUSTED. Pending the arrival of the stenographer's minutes and the actual determination of the facts, I desire to submit the proposition that, even if it be found that the previous question was ordered on the motion to recede and concur, the previous question does no operate upon the motion to recede or upon the motion to concur. These two motions, when united, are, of course, identical with the original motion, but neither motion considered separately is the same thing as the original motion, and it is utterly illogical to rule that the previous question operates upon something which is entirely different from the motion to which it was actually offered and to which it was solely intended to apply. If the motions to recede and to concur taken separately are the same thing as the motion to recede and concur there would be no sense in permitting the division of a question. Division is allowed for the very reason that different situations are thus presented and the demand for division always comes from an enemy of the original question who seeks advantage from its division. After the motion to recede and concur has been divided the original question is superseded by its separate divisions and the previous question, which was ordered upon the original motion, is eliminated from parliamentary consideration with the original motion to which it was inseparably attached.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will yield, after the motion to recede and concur is divided, as was done on this question, what is the motion before the House?

Mr. HUSTED. It practically eliminates the previous question, because the previous question was not ordered on either the motion to recede or to concur. It was ordered on the gentleman's motion to recede and concur.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not after the motion was divided.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will allow a question, I can not understand the suggestion of the gentleman. Does the gentleman say where there has been a motion for the previous question on a certain motion and that motion is divided that that gets rid of the order for the previous question?

Mr. HUSTED. I think so exactly, because it is not on that motion at all. It was ordered on the motion to recede and concur, and where the motion is divided it is just exactly as if no motion was made.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, of course we do not know exactly until we receive the notes of the reporter, but my recollection is that the motion of the previous question was made after the question was divided. It could only apply then to the question squarely before the House.

Mr. HUSTED. Of course.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair of the situation is this: The gentleman from Kansas moved to further insist; the gentleman from Illinois moved to recede and concur, on which a division was demanded, and a division was ordered. The motion pending was the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede, upon which, after debate, the gentleman from Kansas moved the previous question, as was stated by the gentleman from Kansas. The Chair has been endeavoring to get the stenographic notes to confirm his recollection as to the form of that motion, but there has been a delay in securing them. The Journal clerk has it that the motion was merely for the previous question, which the Chair would hold had reference only to the question pending immediately at the time, a motion to recede, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Kansas has offered a motion to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk has reported, and which is now pending.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, may we have that again reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Kansas will permit, the Chair has now the stenographic notes and will read them for the information of the House, confirming the recollection of the Chair:

Mr. ANTHONY. I move the previous question. I understand the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are two motions, one by the gentleman from Kansas to further insist and one by the gentleman from Illinois to recede and concur. That question has been divided, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, it must be apparent to the House there is some necessity of limiting the amount of money which should be expended for rental of offices from this item of $350,000, which is intended to pay the expenses of organization of the camps for the field training; $60,000 was the amount discussed by the conferees as being about the proper amount which should be expended out of this item for such purpose. Furthermore, due to the fact that Congress has never previously given its sanction for such an expenditure as this and the necessity of action by Congress at the next session of giving some specific authority for this expenditure, the limitation provides that that should be done.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It says not exceeding $60,000 of the funds appropriated shall be used for the maintenance of the headquarters, and so forth. Then there is a further limitation, nor shall any of such funds be used for the establishment or maintenance of headquarters.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why, the committee thought we should wait until we received authority of Congress before further increasing the number of these headquarters.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Then, after July 1, when this new appropriation act takes effect, it means from July 1 on until the next Congress takes action they are going to close down every one of these headquarters unless they happen to be in a military post.

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Why, certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some of you gentlemen are a little too enthusiastic. The language of the amendment I offered provides that $60,000 shall be used for that purpose. That is, of funds appropriated for the next fiscal year, beginning on July 1, and for maintaining existing headquarters during the next fiscal year.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But it does not read that way. That second limitation applies to the whole $350,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. The word "additional" means that no additional headquarters shall be established until Congress next winter gives specific legislative authority for it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have no objection to it if that is just what it means. But I did not read it that way.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman ought to construe it that way.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I want to construe it as the gentleman would have me construe it. I would like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] on that.

Mr. HULL. If that is the construction, you cut that appropriation down to $60,000. You stated awhile ago otherwise.

Mr. ANTHONY. I said that the whole item was $350,000. We did not want to dissipate all of that for officers' headquarters and the hire of clerks. It should be used to organize these camps. That is the essential part.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman says it will require $60,000 only to run these headquarters through the period?

Mr. ANTHONY. Sixty thousand dollars would be a reasonable amount.

Mr. TILSON. Would the gentleman then be willing to cut out the second proviso if we accept the first one, that not exceeding $60,000 shall be used for this purpose? Will he be willing to cut out the first one, beginning with the words "for running establishment"?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would be willing to have the same number until Congress changed it.

Mr. TILSON. If we accept that, that practically fixes that. Why tie it up?

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman wants to open it wide that would be a different thing.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman willing to accept the amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I recall that a moment ago, when gentlemen were supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. McKENZIE) they urged that this would result in no charge against the Treasury; but it seems that they have suddenly changed their minds, that they have suddenly reached the conclusion that it will require a good deal of money to carry this on.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think this is a reasonable limitation.

Mr. FIELDS. I know; but they said that a while ago, when they were discussing it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if it is not a fact, if this amendment is adopted without striking out the last proviso, that it absolutely cripples the reserve?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it does not.

Mr. McKENZIE. I sympathize with the purpose of the gentleman from Kansas and what he is trying to get at, but if this amendment is adopted as it is now proposed it will absolutely cripple the reserve. And that is not the worst of it, in my judgment. I call it to the attention of the gentleman from Kansas that it is an absolute reflection on the men in the reserves of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I can not yield. I move the previous question on the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on his motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move the previous question on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment. The question is on that motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question is ordered on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. ANTHONY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 107.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to concur with an amendment as follows: After the word "headquarters," in said amendment, insert "Provided, That not exceeding $60,000 of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the maintenance of divisional and regimental headquarters of the Organized Reserves."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order. The Chair is informed that the gentleman moved the previous question on his motion to concur with an amendment. That was disposed of. This is another amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on his amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to concur with an amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were—ayes 112, noes 79.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 30: On page 18 of the bill, in line 12, after the word "officers," strike out the following words: "Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be utilized for the recruiting or enlistment of boys under the age of 21 years without the written consent of the parents or guardians, if any, of such boys, or unless the applicant furnishes a birth certificate or the affidavit of two disinterested witnesses showing such applicant for enlistment to be 21 years of age."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, this refers to the amendment, which was adopted by the House, which requires the consent of the parent or guardian of any man enlisted in the United States Army under 21 years of age. When considered in conference it was the opinion of the conferees on the part of the House that we should agree to the amendment of the Senate which struck this out of the bill, because of information which was given us by the War Department. However, we have brought it back to the House for consideration, in pursuance of the promise made to do so.

Briefly, the situation is this: Thirty-seven per cent of the recruits taken into the United States Army are under the age of 21. If you prevent the enlistment of boys between the ages of 18 and 21 you strike seriously at the present strength of the Army. You deprive it of the men who compose the most active element of the enlisted force of the establishment. Regardless of the fact that if you deprive the Army of the right to enlist boys under 21 years of age you increase the cost of enlistment at least double, if not more, I think it would be a serious mistake from a military standpoint to deprive the Army of the services of young men between the ages of 18 and 21; because history has shown, ever since we have any record of military establishments, that boys or young men of that age make the best soldiers and the best fighting material.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. How can it double the cost of enlistment when the gentleman says only 37 per cent of the enlistments are boys under 21 years of age?

Mr. ANTHONY. The War Department made the statement to the Senate conferees that it would not only double but in their opinion treble the cost of enlistments.

Mr. FIELDS. It seems to me that statement is without any foundation to support it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Because in the case of every boy enlisted under 21 years of age, in order to get the papers made out for the consent of his parents or guardians, it would require so many trips on the part of the recruiting officer and it would so delay and hamper enlistments that it would increase every one of the costs entering into it.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. Does not the gentleman believe that, in view of the figure to which the Army has been reduced, they can get along without this 37 per cent?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will remind the gentleman that the Army is now much below the maximum which Congress authorizes. There are but 115,000 men in the Army, although we have authorized 125,000. If you should cut out these boys under 21, it would bring the Army down below 100,000 unless redoubled efforts were made to recruit to make up the loss of these younger men, and I do not believe it would be wise to so greatly increase the expense and cost of recruiting the Army at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield me some time?

Mr. ANTHONY. Any reasonable amount of time, and I am ready to yield it now.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Before the gentleman does that will he yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The language of the bill would mean that the Comptroller General would have the right to pass upon the question whether the money was used in accordance with the provision of the law. It would make recruiting practically impossible.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would seriously cripple the War Department in its recruiting service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield to me three minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. After I have yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SISSON. Before the gentleman from Texas begins, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas if I may have a little time?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman may have all the time he desires.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, Senate amendment No. 30, as it appears in the bill, strikes out an amendment which my colleague [Mr. JONES] and myself offered and which the House itself placed on the Army appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole and afterwards adopted in the House. The House conferees evidently, from the language of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], had very little regard for the fact that the House put the amendment on the bill by an affirmative vote, because the gentleman says that when the conferees went into conference the House conferees thought they ought to recede from the disagreement of the House to the amendment and agree with the Senate.

Under the existing law the Army has the privilege to enlist men from 18 to 21 years of age without the consent of their parents. The effect of the amendment is to require that in cases of that kind—of boys from 18 to 21 years of age—the recruiting officer shall not enlist them unless he has the consent of their parents or proof by affidavit that they are 21 years of age.

I am sure that gentlemen in this House have had the same experience that I have had in the matter of enlistments by recruiting officers in the cases of youths without the consent of their parents and absolutely in the face of the desire of their parents that they be not enlisted. Only yesterday I received a letter from a woman saying that a recruiting officer had enlisted her boy; that she had refused to sign a statement of willingness for him to enlist; that they had taken him away against her wishes; that he was then in the Army; that she had a sick husband unable to work and was dependent upon one 15-year-old boy to provide a livelihood for the family.

Now, gentlemen, in the cases of boys between the ages of 18 and 21 who desire to enlist in the Army and who can secure the consent of their parents, it will be an easy matter for the recruiting officers to secure that consent. Secretary of War Weeks writes a letter to the committee in which he says that it would be impracticable and would absolutely hurt the recruiting service, because the recruiting officers would not want to board the applicants until they could confer with their parents and get their consent. Why such a statement? It is not necessary for them to remain at the recruiting station. The officer can simply tell the young man to go back home and procure a written statement from his parents that they are willing to let him enlist and then return, and that when he returns he may enlist in the Army. But, gentlemen of this House, the Army enlists these boys because it is easier to enlist them than it is in the case of men. It appeals to the imagination of these young men with flaming posters advertising "If you will only join the Army you will get to travel in distant parts of the world. You will have educational advantages," and just at the very time of a young man's life when he ought to be either in school or learning a trade or assisting in the support of his family, the recruiting officers, with seductive promises and with allurements and attractive statements as to what the military service affords, appeal to him and transport him to some Army camp.

Within 30 days his dream is over and he wants to go home. They advertise that he gets travel. Yes; he gets travel from the kitchen detail to quarters. He gets travel on the kitchen police and on the fatigue detail, and in about 30 days from the time he enlists, within 30 days from the time his signature is affixed to the enlistment paper, he is writing the old man and his mother, "For God's sake get me out of the Army; they deceived me." I believe the responsibility is on Congress. No other agency of the Government can lay its hand on a boy under 18 years of age and take him away from his parents' control without their consent—no other agency except the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps. I think it is much more important that a boy at that formative time of his life should have an opportunity to get an education, an opportunity to learn a trade, than to be in an Army camp learning habits of idleness, and perhaps learning things that may be a detriment to his character in the future. Life in the Army in time of peace contributes very little of improvement to character or to habits that is of permanent benefit in his after life.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Provided he is satisfied with his enlistment, does the gentleman think that the Government has a moral right to take a boy under 21 without the consent of his parents?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Absolutely not. Now, I want to quote from the letter of the Secretary of War. Here is what the Secretary says:

Present enlistments are divided, approximately, 32½ per cent reenlistments, 30 per cent new enlistments of men over 21 years of age, and 37½ per cent of new enlistments under 21 years of age.

If the Army when it had 225,000 men some years ago was able to enlist 225,000 men, including minors and grown-ups, it looks like it ought to be able at present to enlist an Army of 115,000 men, including grown-ups and such minors as have their parents' consent, without dragging boys away from home without their parents' consent. [Applause.]

But the Secretary says:

It would be difficult to secure evidence, as a great many communities did not keep birth certificates 21 years ago, and the securing of affidavits would be difficult.

Right now the War Department requires a birth certificate when an attempt is made to get a boy out, and yet he says they are not available when they go in.

What does he further say?

Unless these men are cared for while awaiting evidence they will be lost to the service.

Too bad, too bad. Unless boys 18 years of age are enlisted without the parents' consent they will be lost to the service. Too bad. This Army machine must go on, enlistments must come, even if they have to rob the home and the school of the boys in spite of the protest of the mother and father that want to keep the boys at home.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What else does the Secretary of War say?

Many young men between 18 and 21 years of age enlist for patriotic reasons and to travel, and the pay offered is of no special moment, but to men over 21 years of age the pay offered does affect their decision to join the Army materially and the offer of $21 per month does not impress them greatly, and they are much more difficult to secure than the men from 18 to 21 years of age.

That is why they want to enlist minors—because the Secretary says that they are easier to enlist. Recruiting officers can persuade them more easily, they can excite their enthusiasm and imagination more easily.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Is not the gentleman afraid to talk about the Secretary of War in that way, in view of his recent condemnation of the Members of the House?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Well, the Constitution protects me, and I am very brave on the floor of the House—some days. [Laughter.] The Secretary of War states the reason that he wants the law to remain as it is—because it is easier to enlist a boy under 21 years of age without the consent of his parents. Why? He does not know as much as a man over 21; he has not had much experience; he has not as much judgment; he is more susceptible to the blandishments of the recruiting sergeant, and therefore they want the law to remain as it is.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that system is a monster, whether it be a naval or military system, that in time of peace has to subsist off the youth and helpless mothers of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. How much time does the gentleman from Mississippi want?

Mr. SISSON. I do not want any now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, one who has listened to what has been said this afternoon would think that all at once there had been projected into our life something like the method in old England in the days of the early Georges when the press-gang crew rushed out on the unsuspecting youth by the riverside and the wayside, seized and took them away to sea to be gone from home years and years, serving in the British Navy.

Nothing of that kind takes place in this country to-day, nor has it ever been tolerated. As a matter of fact, one would think that suddenly we had had a revelation of a horrible conspiracy on the part of the Regular Army of the United States, with the War Department behind it, against the unprotected youth of the land.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not at present.

It is a strange thing that a boy who is 18 years old is thought to be old enough to learn a trade which he is to follow all the days of his life, because nobody objects to his being an apprentice to learn a trade. But if he says he wants to go into the Army, which is another trade, then we find that he is too young and that somebody is taking advantage of his inexperience.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not yield. I do not want to be discourteous, but I have not the time.

The peace-time service of men in the Army is that of an occupation—a trade. My good friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], with whom I generally agree on these broader principles, seems to have run a little shy on this one. He says that the peace-time life of an enlisted man in the Army does not contribute to the development of his character and standing, and he rather sought by words of irony and inference to indicate that it is a life of shiftlessness and idleness, with a tendency toward the disruption of morale; whereas the contrary, by every proof around about us, is the fact. The testimony can be given abundantly by the best type of men in the military service in their degree—those fine old white-haired Regular Army noncommissioned officers, who make up the backbone of our Military Establishment, some of whom have been enlisted in the service for 30 or 40 years. Those men did not lose any character or any morale. Those men did not lose the fiber of their being. They are splendid types of manhood, of good citizenship, and of organized patriotism.

Mr. MILLER. And thousands of those men were officers in the Army during the war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly. We seem to arrive at this thing this afternoon as though it were a sudden moral discovery. We had exactly this same kind of talk four or five years back, when the proposition was made to raise the terms of the selective service act so as to include men between the ages of 18 and 45 years.

At that time we went all around this same hippodrome in the same kind of chariot of rhetoric, and we got off at the very same place where we got on.

Why is that the case? Because ever since the Declaration of Independence it has been in large measure an unwritten part of the fundamental law that the ages of 18 to 45 are the military ages in this land of ours, and everybody for generations has accepted it as a fact. Not only that, but some of the State constitutions have actually put it into writing. Eighteen to forty-five is the military age in this country. Do you want an age different in peace time from what you have in war time? Peace time is the time when you train people, we hope, to prevent war; but at any rate they are trained for service in war if war comes.

Here we are, worried to death about a triviality. We let a boy 18 years of age go out into the world and of his own volition take up any trade and learn it, and no one suggests that he is showing any callowness or inexperience. But when he turns to this other, this military trade, then we suddenly find that his innocence is being conspired against by the War Department.

It seems to me we ought to get back to common sense.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the House has passed on this proposition; has adopted the amendment by an overwhelming majority, with all the facts before it that it has before it now. When the House adopted the amendment, it knew that the War Department would be opposed to it. Therefore, the letter of the Secretary of War has not given the House any information that it did not have at the time it adopted the amendment. The question is now, Will the House without any additional information repudiate its former action? I do not believe it will. It has no reason to do it, because, as I said, it had all of the information when it adopted this amendment by an overwhelming majority that it has at this time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is but one question involved here. Whether or not boys from 18 to 21 years of age shall go into the Army is not involved at all. The House did not exclude from the Army boys between 18 and 21 years of age. It is the consensus of opinion, based upon the test and the knowledge of life, and it is written in the laws of practically all of the States that until a boy reaches the age of 21 years in the important decisions of life he must have the counsel, advice, and direction of his parents before a binding contract be entered into. A boy can not make a binding contract in any State that I know of who is under 21 years of age, and why? Because the boy is immature in his judgment. His parents are his guardian. Why? Because it is known that such guardianship is the best for him and the best for society. It is a monstrous thing that the Army and the Navy shall put out these placards which appeal to the boy who wants to run away from home—and most boys do at some time—and induce the 18-year-old boy who is inclined to roam to run away. That is the sort of boy who needs parental control. He needs the influence of the home. But that is not all. The Army and the Navy make this binding contract with the boy about 18 years old, and his parents can not regain his custody. It amounts to a levy of the Government upon the infant personnel of the family. The boy's contract is no contract at all. It is a farce to hide the wrong of the Government, to hide its invasion of the home in time of peace. If the boy wants to go and it is the judgment of his parents that he go, I have nothing to say. But it is monstrous to say that in peace times this Nation may go into the homes of the country in defiance of the spirit of law and the judgment of mothers and fathers and take 18-year-old boys and put them into military service away from parental control and influence. To say that the boy consents is begging the question. Nowhere else does his consent bind. He is recognized everywhere as not possessing the capacity to contract. To take him, to oust his parents of control prior to his arrival at the age of discretion, at that period of life when the experience of mankind has taught us that the boy is not fit to use his own judgment, is conscription levied upon the personnel of the family. No government has that right in time of peace, and the House should not yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for the Government of the United States in peace times to take immature boys for its standing Army from their homes, consciously and purposely, without the consent of their parents, in disregard of the parents' will and in disregard of the welfare of the boy, is an improper, not to say a dishonorable, thing. I think it would be preferable to conscript mature men for the Army rather than induce boys to go away from their homes and schools against the will of their parents. I hope the Government will not do anything so thoroughly discreditable.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, here is the situation: In every State in this Union in peace time the parents of a boy under 21 years of age are entitled to his services and his earnings during minority. That is undenied and undeniable. These parents in every State in this Union probably have appealed to some Member of Congress to protect them in their rights to the custody of their minor children. Hearing such appeals, this House by a decisive vote adopted an amendment providing that the Army shall not in peace times take a minor boy without the consent of his mother and father. Now, what happens? That was in accordance with the laws of every State in this Union, and what happens? The bill goes to the Senate and Secretary Weeks writes a little letter over there and says that it is easier for him to enlist boys of 18 years of age, and on his letter, in disregard to the House's action, in disregard to the law of every State of this Union, the Senate knocked out that amendment. Now, what are we going to do about it? Just sit quiet and let Secretary Weeks dictate to this Government, dictate to every State in this Union, violate the laws of every State in this Union by taking in peace time their minor boys? I do not believe this House will do it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], who is soon to leave us, and I am sorry; he said that in the recent war we took 18-year-old boys. So we did. It was under a War Department order that we did it then. It was not by my vote. What was the situation then? We had in this country subject to draft at that time 18,000,000 able-bodied men over the age of 21 years.

Instead of exhausting those 18,000,000 grown men first we, under whip and lash of the War Department, under General Crowder's orders, passed an act taking 670,000 18-year-old boys away from their homes; but, thank God, Congress put them in school first. Thank God, Congress said, "We will put these boys in school, in training, and we shall not take them until a certain time." And the war closed and the armistice came before we had to take them out of school. That was the situation, I will state to the gentleman from Vermont. How much longer are we going to listen to the War Department against the rights of the people back home? How much longer are we going to allow the Secretary of War to dictate to the Congress as against the interest of the people in the States back home? For one I am not going to listen to them. They may have an open sesame to the ear of our distinguished friend from Vermont, but they are not going to pass by my vote on that proposition here in this House. I think we ought to insist on this amendment. I think we ought to go back and tell the Senate conferees and House conferees that we care more for the laws of the 48 States and the wishes of the fathers and mothers back home than we do for the wishes of Secretary Weeks and the War Department. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi use some time?

Mr. SISSON. I have eight minutes left, I think.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish the gentleman would yield some time.

Mr. SISSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to address myself to just one point made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE]. He made reference to the historical tradition of this country that men between 18 and 45 years are subject to military service. He mistook service in the militia for Army service, and there is a world of difference between the militia and the Regular Army. A boy who joins the militia associates with his neighbors. He is not torn away from his home or separated from his community or community influence. The life of the Regular Army is a peculiar life of its own, and there are few parents who are willing to part with their boys at the age of 18 and to remove them from the atmosphere of the home to the barracks of the Regular Army. You would not send your own boy at the age of 18 to the Army; you would not send your own boy in times of peace, why should you permit an Army sergeant to entice the young son of some poor devil? It is a vicious thing to do. No country in the world exacts military service from any young man below the age of 20. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is the only one of the items in conference that I did not agree with the conferees about. I did not agree to this amendment. There is no hardship, in my judgment, no real hardship done the Army in getting recruits, providing the boys who are under 21 and over 18 can get the permission of their parents to enlist in the Army or the Navy. I am unwilling that Congress shall take from any mother or any father their boy without their permission. I am unwilling that any boys might be ruined by entering the Army, although we hope it will not be. That mother or that father who are compelled to give up their boys to the Army can not have the same regard for their country and the same regard for the Army that they would have if the boy had the permission of the mother and the father to enter the service.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit an inquiry?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think that the parents are compelled to give up their boy, as he puts it, if the boy of his own free will and accord, 18, 19, or 20 years of age, sees fit to go into the Army, may not have been home for years, may not have been under the control of his parents for years—does he give up anything because that boy saw fit to go into the Army?

Mr. SISSON. I have only a short time, of course, but I would be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Is this so harmful a service under the flag that the boys are ruined by it?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, the gentleman can not take an isolated case and make a whole drove of crows out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. That is what the other gentlemen are doing.

Mr. SISSON. I am not doing it. You can not take up one case and make it apply to all the boys. You can not make a snow man and knock him down, and then say that because he enlisted it makes the whole system good. On the contrary, the mother and father, when the boy insists, make up their minds to consent to his going; but it is to be regretted that a boy should enlist when he has had a little discipline applied to him or when something is said to him that he does not like, knowing there is one place where the home does not control, but where the arm of the Government is thrown over him to control him, doing away with the home influence.

I have no objection, if the boy's mother and father want him to have military training, to his going into the military service at 14 years or 15 years, if the Army is willing to accept him. I think the responsibility for the boy is on the mother and father until the boy reaches legal age, and I am somewhat surprised that Members of Congress should be willing to change that responsibility, as it were, and let the boy be taken from the parental roof by the Army or Navy. No; let them have the consent of the mother and father. Do not teach the boy, through the great instrumentality of the Government of the United States, to fail to respect parental authority. There is but one of the Ten Commandments with a promise attached to it, and that is the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." I do not want the great Government of the United States, representing over 100,000,000 people, to come here and violate that commandment, and say to the boys, "You need not respect the wishes of your father and your mother; come on, and the United States Government will take you in, the protest of your mother and father to the contrary notwithstanding."

I can not do that. Let us observe the commandment. Let us honor mother and father. Let us honor our mothers and our fathers by honoring these mothers and fathers of the boys of America. Let us do the right thing; and if we do the right thing, though the heavens fall, this Government will prevail just as long as we are doing the right thing. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LAMPERT, indefinitely, on account of deaths in his family.

To Mr. MONTAGUE, for the 22d day of February, 1923, on account of an engagement to perform an important semipublic duty.

To Mr. CROWTHER (at the request of Mr. SNYDER), for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

To Mr. TUCKER, for the day, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the conference report on the Army bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House now stand in recess until 8 o'clock. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) resumed its session, with Mr. HICKS in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House proceed to the consideration of unobjected-to bills on the Private Calendar, beginning where we left off last night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House proceed to the consideration of unobjected-to bills on the Private Calendar, beginning at the point where we left off last night.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

SCHOONER "T. K. BENTLEY."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we refer back to Calendar No. 365, which is H. R. 12315. This is a bill in which I have a particular interest, and is the only one on this calendar that I had before my own committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that we take up for consideration H. R. 12315. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. May we have it reported so that we may know what it is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the Treasury of the United States, from funds not otherwise appropriated, $4,170.45, under such conditions as the Secretary of the Navy may direct, to J. Newton Pugsley, of Parrsboro, Nova Scotia, managing owner, in full settlement for damages sustained by the schooner T. K. Bentley as a result of collision with the United States steamship North Dakota on January 3, 1922.

Mr. BLANTON. That was a bill that was objected to last night.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection? Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will permit me to refresh his recollection, the gentleman from Texas objected to it and then I called his attention to the fact that if it had been for less than $3,000 the department could have settled it.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I remember.

Mr. STAFFORD. And then, further, another Member from Texas objected, and then later attempted to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I remember. In that connection also there was another bill that I objected to under a misapprehension. I have had more time to investigate it to-day, and I want to withdraw my objection. That was the dredging company bill in which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] was interested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under a misapprehension of the facts, I objected to a bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS]. I withdraw my objection and ask that he be allowed to take it up now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Of course, that can be done by unanimous consent to return to it, but it can not be done otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] ask unanimous consent to return to it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Regular order, Mr. Speaker. We will probably reach the bill before the end of the session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the regular order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CAMP BENNING, GA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2853) for the relief of persons suffering damage by reason of proceedings for the condemnation of land for Camp Benning, Ga.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I remember that bill. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman desires to make a statement I will reserve my objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. We want to make headway with the calendar. If the gentleman is going to object——

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

G. DARE HOPKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill S. 3351 for the relief of G. Dare Hopkins.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman make some explanation of the bill before it gets by the objectionable stage?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, this is another casualty in connection with the accident at the Aberdeen grounds. There were two persons injured. We passed one bill last night for the young lady. We have reduced this amount down to the minimum sum, including damages to the automobile.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have the assurance of the gentleman that if this bill goes through this amount will be insisted on in conference?

Mr. EDMONDS. You surely may.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated by law, to G. Dare Hopkins the sum of $5,000 for injuries received when his automobile collided with an Army truck near North East, Md., April 17, 1921.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 6, after the word "of," strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500 in full settlement against the Government."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

DAVID B. LANDIS, DECEASED, ET AL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1599) for the relief of the estate of David B. Landis, deceased, and the estate of Jacob F. Sheaffer, deceased.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the estate of David B. Landis, deceased, late of Lancaster, Pa., the sum of $11,112.22, and to the estate of Jacob F. Sheaffer, deceased, late of Lancaster, Pa., the sum of $34,055, being the amounts found due said estates by the Court of Claims under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, commonly called the Tucker Act, for taxes and penalties collected on distilled spirits that had been destroyed by fire.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "pay," insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ISAIAH STEPHENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 937) to reimburse Isaiah Stephens, postmaster of McMechen, Marshall County, W. Va., for money and postage stamps stolen.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to ask if the requirements that are made mandatory by the Postmaster General in regard to locks and safes were complied with?

Mr. EDMONDS. The man had a fireproof safe, but not a burglar-proof safe. It was a small safe in the post office.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did the Postmaster General turn the claim down?

Mr. EDMONDS. Because under the law he could not pay it. We have paid quite a number of such claims. Here is the proposition: No matter whether the man had a safe that met the requirements of the Post Office Department or not, these people would have gotten through anyhow. We pay such claims. If a man on account of inefficiency or lack of knowledge has not a safe that is anyway right, and left it so that anybody could go in and open it we do not pay the damages. But in this case, as a matter of fact, he had a safe, and these people would have got it anyhow.

Mr. BLANTON. The Postmaster General has prescribed reasonable regulations that there shall be a combination lock and safe, and that whenever the party leaves the office with valuables the combination shall be turned on. In cases where the safe has been blown, if there is no question about it, the Government ought to be held liable. But where the party has been negligent in failing to comply with the reasonable regulations I think we ought to quit paying the claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. Let me read from the report. This may enlighten the gentleman:

The evidence in the case shows that about 1.30 or 2 a. m. on November 12, 1910, burglars effected an entrance to the post office at McMechen, W. Va., by boring holes in the rear door of sufficient size to admit a man's arm reaching through the hole and unlocking the door. They then broke open the safe, which was fireproof but not burglar proof, by drilling holes in the door around the combination lock and damaging the tumblers with a punch and hammer, the safe door being opened without the use of explosives.

No matter what kind of a safe he had had, these men would have got it.

Mr. BLANTON. What was the amount stolen?

Mr. EDMONDS. Two thousand dollars. We have paid similar bills to this.

Mr. BLANTON. There was no question about the integrity of the loss—it could not have been a frame-up?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no; I think this man is entitled to consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Isaiah Stephens, postmaster at McMechen, Marshall County, W. Va., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,070.58, the same to be in payment of certain money and postage stamps taken from the post office at McMechen, Marshall County, W. Va., November 12, 1910, by unknown persons.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS L. FLANDERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 163) for the relief of Francis L. Flanders.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLER. Let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Francis L. Flanders, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000, being the amount paid by Francis L. Flanders in satisfaction of the bond in cause No. 226 in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, entitled "United States v. John Blaney and Francis L. Flanders," for the reason that said sum of $2,000 was paid by said Francis L. Flanders under order of the district court of the United States above mentioned for the nonappearance of said defendant, who was afterwards apprehended by the officers of the United States through the efforts of Francis L. Flanders and subsequently convicted and sentenced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MILLER. No. I will not withhold my objection to a bill of that character.

ALICE LOEBER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12584) for the relief of Alice Loeber.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Alice Loeber, of St. Helena, Calif., on account of the death of her daughter, Grova Loeber, who was killed June 29, 1922, in Stanislaus National Forest, Calif., by a falling tree stump or snag, which had been dislodged by blast set off by employees of the Forest Service who were reconstructing the road upon which she was traveling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, has there been any amendment to reduce the amount?

Mr. CURRY. To $2,500.

Mr. EDMONDS. It will be reduced by amendment to $2,500.

Mr. BLANTON. But the amendment may not be agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. EDMONDS. We will stand by the amendment made by the House or the bill will not pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

In line 5, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A. L. GRAMLING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3256) for the relief of A. L. Gramling.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to A. L. Gramling, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $218.13 as compensation for expenses incurred by him while employed by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, district of Florida, during the months of July and August, 1921.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HILLSBORO DREDGING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3171) for the relief of the trustee of the estate of Hillsboro Dredging Co., a corporation, bankrupt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,593.74, for the relief of the trustee of the estate of Hillsboro Dredging Co., a corporation, bankrupt, for extra dredging and blasting in the improvement of the channel from Clearwater Harbor through Boca Ceiga Bay to Tampa Bay, Fla., the same having accrued to the benefit of and having been made necessary by acts of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the bill. Why has the committee violated clause 5 of Rule XXI in this bill by making a direct appropriation?

Mr. EDMONDS. Because our committee has the right to do that. It was decided last year, and it has been so decided right along, that our committee has the right to make an appropriation. Every one of these bills is an appropriation. The gentleman will remember the point of order raised in the House, which was decided by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] then occupying chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there is left one committee, to wit, the Committee on Claims, and that is the only committee of the House that has not had its power taken away from it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no; the War Claims Committee and the Public Lands Committee also, I think, have the same right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP "ESPERANZA."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 419) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Esperanza.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, let the bill be reported.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Co., owner of the American steamship Esperanza, v. The United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said vessel and the United States destroyer Connor on the 15th day of February, 1918, off Barnegat Light, New Jersey, may be sued for by the owner of the said American steamship Esperanza in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of the said American steamship Esperanza, or against the owner of the said American steamship Esperanza in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LONG ISLAND RAILROAD CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 420) for the relief of the Long Island Railroad Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee why this claim can not be passed upon under the general authority of the Navy Department to adjust claims up to the amount of $3,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I can explain to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The injury is the result of the action of a naval vessel.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Long Island Railroad Co. made a claim against the department in the sum of $1,825, reported Mr. Coontz, Acting Secretary, but in view of the fact that the amount of its claim was far in excess of the estimate made by the naval authority, responsibility was denied to the extent claimed. He further adds that it is believed, however, that the claimant is entitled to have his claim passed upon by a court of law, and it is therefore respectfully recommended that the bill receive favorable consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the policy of the committee that whenever the Navy Department refuses to pay a claim to the extent the claimant thinks is owing that we will have to pass special legislation to have the claims passed on by the court?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think this is the first case that we have had of the kind. We believe that a man is entitled to go to court and have his dispute settled. If there is a dispute between two parties, there must be some place where they can go to have it decided.

Mr. STAFFORD. In some of these cases the Navy Department is firmly of the opinion that their vessel is not at fault, but that the other colliding vessel is at fault. Under the rules of admiralty the Government would be obliged to pay the loss, even though the Navy Department was not at fault, provided that loss was greater, as was sustained by the claimant, than the loss sustained by the Navy Department. Why should we do those things?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not quite catch what the gentleman is trying to say, but as I understand the matter he is trying to say this——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will either have the reporter read what I said or say it again myself to see whether I am at fault or not. It is pretty early in the evening, and I do not think that I am at fault so early in the evening.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman said that he thought the Navy Department had a right in dispute to say whether the other claimant had a right to go to court. Is that it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. As I understand the rule of damages in admiralty cases where both are at fault, the one who suffers the greatest damage is entitled to a claim against the other party.

Mr. EDMONDS. I never heard that rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to say that one of the most eminent lawyers in Philadelphia, and, of course, the gentleman will yield to the opinion of a Philadelphia lawyer, and an admiralty lawyer at that, stated that to me only within a week.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The situation is that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] got their general bill through here conferring power and jurisdiction upon the department to settle these claims under $3,000, it was the position of the gentleman that he wanted to get rid of these claims, that he did not want to be bothered with them any more, and yet the very first one that the Secretary of the Navy turns down, they come back to the gentleman's committee and they get action.

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman brings in a favorable report on a bill which the Navy could settle at a smaller amount.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman's statement is not correct. The Navy Department did not turn him down.

Mr. BLANTON. They turned him down in so far as the amount of his claim is concerned; they wanted to pay him a less amount.

Mr. EDMONDS. And now they state they think he has a right to go into court.

Mr. BLANTON. And they determine what they themselves should pay.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman agree that the Navy Department is infallible and never makes a mistake?

Mr. BLANTON. I think in this one instance probably the Navy Department was correct, because they reached the conclusion that the whole claim was not just.

Mr. EDMONDS. Do you think they were correct in the Moses case?

Mr. BLANTON. I think it should go back to the Navy Department, and I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

RELIEF OF PERSONS SUFFERING DAMAGE BY CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR CAMP BENNING, GA.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 377.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2853) for the relief of persons suffering damage by reason of proceedings for the condemnation of land for Camp Benning, Ga.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MILLER. Let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2853) for the relief of persons suffering damage by reason of proceedings for the condemnation of land for Camp Benning, Ga.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to have some explanation.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman wants the bill reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to have the bill reported?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $49,901, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay out the same to such persons as the Secretary of War may designate, who were damaged by circumstances arising out of proceeding for the condemnation of certain lands near Camp Benning, Ga., and in such amounts as the Secretary of War may determine, including claims of John T. Davis and the W. C. Bradley Co. for losses suffered by reason of inability of these parties to remove their improvements from lands transferred by deed to the United States, although expressly granted such right of removal by the prior contracts of sale.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of this bill, because there are a myriad of these land cases throughout the country. If this is passed, there are a myriad to come.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, during the war it was found very desirable to establish an Infantry training school, principally in the use of small arms. A territory was selected near Columbus, Ga., in the early fall of 1918, and an emergency officer with others located the site. The original site of the school was just out of the city of Columbus, Ga. Under the blanket condemnation proceedings which were used during the war a proceeding was filed to condemn 115,000 acres of land for this school. Later it was determined that the school could get along with about 98,000 acres of this land, and consequently 17,000 acres were cut out. This was 10 or 12 months after condemnation proceedings had been entered and served. These 17,000 acres subsequently cut out was land on which the original site of the school was fixed. During the time the school functioned there on that 17,000 acres rifle ranges were established over it, and some houses were shot into, and the emergency officer there notified the people in that area to get off their lands; and as a result many moved and left their crops and others were in suspense the following spring, and did not know whether to plant a crop or not, and they suffered a loss. This whole matter was referred to a board of officers at Camp Benning, Ga. They made a finding and report to the War Department, and it was reviewed by the Appraisal Board, Claims Division, of the War Department, and these amounts are the result of the final finding. Of course, the War Department held it had no funds available to pay these claims, although they recognized——

Mr. MILLER. Whose property was destroyed?

Mr. WRIGHT. Quite a number of people.

Mr. MILLER. What kind and character of people?

Mr. WRIGHT. They had crops on the little farms there and they were ordered off, and they went off and left their crops, and in many instances trees were damaged by shot and houses damaged, and it simply put those people in a state of utter consternation. They did not know what to do. I think if my friend will investigate these he will see they are different claims from what he has in mind.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a number of claims in mind similar to these. During the war unfortunately officers went out and proceeded to commandeer great tracts of land and proceeded to condemn them. In many instances the officers were unreasonable, in my judgment, in evicting people. In other instances claims are put in for absolutely unreasonable amounts, absolutely unreasonable. Now, whether these claims are of that class or not, I do not know.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will tell the gentleman these are good clean claims.

Mr. MILLER. I am against claims of this character. I am perfectly willing if any proceeding can be outlined by the gentleman where the claimants can have recourse in any way through the Court of Claims, if possible, or in any other way where there can be a report——

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not think that would be possible, and while I do not know the exact number of these claimants, they are principally small farmers, and perhaps there are 50 involved in this finding, and for each one to be relegated to the Court of Claims, of course, would be an unjust matter——

Mr. MILLER. If they are filed for grain or anything else destroyed, of course it is at the maximum value whether there is anything of value or not.

Mr. WRIGHT. These officers, and the appraisal board trimmed it down very closely.

Mr. MILLER. I will not object to these claims, but I want to serve notice that I am going to object to any claims of this character coming after it.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP "LEXINGTON."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 421) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Lexington.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Let it be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Colonial Navigation Co., owner of the American steamship Lexington, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said vessel and the United States submarine O-7 on the 6th day of October, 1919, in the East River, New York, near Horns Hook, may be sued for by the owner of the said American steamship Lexington in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States, in favor of the owner of the said American steamship Lexington, or against the owner of the said American steamship Lexington in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I notice in the report of the Acting Secretary of the Navy, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, that the claim of the owners of this steamship is $75,000, which includes $42,000 for 28 days' demurrage at $1,500 per day. The Navy Department recognizes that the submarine was at fault by reason of defective steering tiller, but it recognizes that they are obligated to pay only $11,191.68. Now, why should we submit this case to the United States district court sitting as a court of admiralty, where there is piled up a claim of $75,000, when the department excludes demurrage charges, and is willing to pay $11,191?

Mr. EDMONDS. Probably because the claimant will not accept the $11,191. A great number of these admiralty cases that have arisen out of the war activities should be treated by the House in some kind of a general bill, in which a limitation is put on demurrages, or else demurrages are allowed. I am not an attorney, and I may make mistakes, but I know that in ordinary admiralty practice it is the custom to pay demurrage. If you send these cases to the district courts acting as admiralty courts, you are going to pay demurrage. Demurrage is possibly a proper claim, but there should be some limit to the amount of demurrage. In the courts in the past demurrage has been figured as the going value of the steamer. It is manifestly unfair to take advantage of a situation to collect the going value of the steamer. If we would treat these cases under a general bill, describing what should be the demurrage allowed, all of these bills would not come to the Committee on Claims. But we have no other place to pay them to-day. We have no other way to act upon them.

If we bring them into the House we have got to take them up and bring them in for a certain sum, or we have got to send them to a district court. Wherever the sum is not disputed we have brought in a bill with that sum in it. Where the amount is disputed we send it to the admiralty court. When it is sent to the admiralty court demurrage is paid beyond question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Surely.

Mr. STAFFORD. In all the cases reported from the gentleman's committee where the amount of the allowance is fixed, is there any instance where the committee has recommended an allowance for demurrage?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will not say that as to the past, but in the past few years we have cut demurrage out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Speaking of modern times, not ancient?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it ever the policy of Congress to allow the claimant interest on the amount of damages incurred by reason of the deprivation of their property?

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee does not allow for that.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have adopted a fixed policy, so far as Congress is concerned, of not allowing demurrage in case of collisions. If this firm wants to receive relief, let them accept the amount fixed by the committee for the guidance of the Navy Department. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHARLES R. O'LEARY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10280) for the relief of Pay Inspector Charles R. O'Leary, United States Navy.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MILLER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN H. LANG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10774) for the relief of John H. Lang.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Texas will withhold his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas withhold?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold.

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Speaker, this is the case of a boy who enlisted in the Navy, and served two and one-half years, and was discharged for personal disability. The Navy Department refused to give him a certificate to the effect that he was disabled. We have presented to the Naval Committee a clear case from the doctors who knew the boy before he went into the Navy, and also affidavits as to his condition after he came out. I personally met this man last summer and I am fully satisfied that he is entitled to a pension. It has been done in a number of similar cases, so that he can get a pension. The man can not earn a dollar, on account of the injury received in the service of this country. I have affidavits here from Janeway & Carpenter, the leading wall-paper manufacturers of New Brunswick, as well as a great many reliable people in my district.

All that we ask is that this naval boy be allowed to receive a pension. We went before the Naval Committee and presented this case, and they reported favorably upon it, and it seems to me the bill should not be objected to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as warrant for the objection I raised a moment ago, I wish to call attention to the report of the Navy Department, which shows that the disability of this claimant was either by reason of his own misconduct in the service or that he had this trouble prior to his enlistment. I have read all the affidavits that the gentleman refers to, and they do not controvert the fact that he had neurasthenia prior to his entering into the service or that his disability was due to his own misconduct. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next one.

CHARLES L. M'CULLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1263) for the relief of Charles L. McCulley.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Charles L. McCulley, also known as Charles L. McCullough, late of the United States Navy, on the muster rolls of the Navy Department and grant him an honorable discharge, thereby giving him the right of membership in a soldiers' home.

With the following amendment:

Insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That no back pay, allowances, or other emoluments shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] what is the necessity for this action?

Mr. CURRY. The necessity for this action is the refusal——

Mr. BLANTON. Is this the gentleman's bill?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, we all considered that this was an act of mercy, and the bill is all right, to permit a poor old man to go to the soldiers' home.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this a case of desertion?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. KRAUS. I think it is a case of a lost record.

Mr. BLANTON. Why was an honorable discharge refused this man?

Mr. CURRY. He received an honorable discharge from the Navy. He was a young man, and he lost his discharge. He was in the Navy under the name of McCullough, and the Navy Department refused to give him a certificate in lieu of the lost discharge. The only way that he can enter a soldiers' home is by the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The point that struck me as being peculiar was that he served under another name.

Mr. CURRY. This is the same man who served in the Navy. I introduced this bill. I did not know the man when I introduced the bill.

At that time he was living in Napa County, in my district, and Colonel Holderman, who was a congressional medal of honor man in the late war, was the commandant at the home. He looked into this matter, and he said the man was entitled to an honorable discharge and asked me to introduce the bill. I received a letter from Gen. Samuel W. Backus, the president of the board of managers of the home and who served brilliantly during the Civil War, and he asked me to introduce the bill. I also received a letter from Capt. Hugh Burke, who was and is a member of the board of managers of the home. He told me that he knew this man when he was in the Navy and that he was entitled to an honorable discharge.

Mr. BLANTON. This was service during the Civil War?

Mr. CURRY. During the Civil War. The man is 83 years old, and he wants to have the right to go to a soldiers' home.

Mr. BLANTON. What explanation does he offer for having served under an alias?

Mr. CURRY. The reason he served under a different name was because he ran away from home and did not want his people to know that he entered the service.

Mr. BLANTON. He was known for a while as McCulley and later as McCullough?

Mr. BUTLER. That was what bothered us, and that was the point on which we required proof, and they finally satisfied us that he was the same man. He is a poor, miserable old sailor, 83 years old, who will be entitled to go to the home if we pass this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The great trouble with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is that he has such a warm, kind heart for any man 83 or 84 years old who may have served 50 years ago——

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to my friend that when I am 83 I will come to him and he will have the same feeling for me.

Mr. CURRY. I have served in this House 10 years. I have a soldiers' home in my district, in which there are 3,500 members. There are three or four thousand old soldiers in my district besides that. I have refused to introduce at least 50 bills of this kind.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object.

Mr. CURRY. I have introduced only five such bills, and each one of those I knew to be all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

W. B. MOSES & SONS ET AL.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 320.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that we return to Calendar No. 320. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the Moses bill?

Mr. DEAL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. DEAL. I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection until I can make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. There are four or five of us who will not let this bill pass, but I will reserve my objection if the gentleman wishes to make a statement.

Mr. DEAL. I should like to make a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold the objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold my reservation, so that the gentleman may speak for five minutes.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, in 1920 the supply officer of the Navy Department asked for bids for certain furniture that was needed or supposed to be needed by the Navy Department. Bids were submitted and the awards were made to the lowest bidder. The supply officer failed, however, to comply literally with the law. I believe he submitted a written order, but neglected to have the merchants sign the order. They, however, supplied the goods. The Government got the goods. The Government has been using these goods for more than three years. The Navy Department, discovering the technicality, refused to pay the bill, but the Assistant Secretary of the Navy has requested the chairman of the Claims Committee to report a bill for the payment of these claims.

The chairman has reported such a bill from the committee with the recommendation that it pass. Now objection has been made to the passage of this bill on the ground that the Navy Department had indulged in an unusual extravagance; that the parties selling the goods had asked too much money for them and had not complied literally with the law in respect to these matters. I submit that this bill ought to be paid. How can we expect merchants to sell to the Federal Government goods at prices such as they sell to you and me if they are to be kept out of their money indefinitely and perhaps absolutely? The gentleman from Texas says that he shall always object to the bill; that they ought to lose the goods because they did not comply with the law by signing the contract——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; that was not my reason. I have a better reason than that.

Mr. DEAL. The Government got the goods and they have not paid for them.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me state my reason. When there is an authorization to a representativ of this Government to buy goods of merchants, it has done so under a law. The merchant, if he has any sense, will look at the law, and he will find out what the purpose of the purchase is. Here is a case where the naval officer went down and bought 10 fine mahogany chiffoniers at $200 apiece; he bought 10 fine chiffonettes at $200 apiece; he bought fine chairs——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

JOHN L. LIVINGSTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 9376, for the relief of John L. Livingston.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether a naval reservist who is seeking a place on the retired list by reason of injury received in the service is not entitled to a pension?

Mr. VAILE. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that he is not entitled to a pension. I do not know myself how it is. He was injured 11 days after the passage of the resolution declaring the state of war between the United States and Germany at an end. This man had been wounded in action. He had recovered well enough to fight after that. If the injury from which he is now suffering had been received 11 days earlier, he would be retired under the general provisions of the law at three-quarters pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask some member of the Naval Affairs Committee whether a member of the Naval Reserve injured in actual service is not entitled to a pension?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say that I misled my friend, and did not intend to do it. I thought it was another case; I thought it was another cadet at Annapolis. It turns out that this is a member of the Reserve Corps injured 11 days after the declaration of peace.

Mr. FIELDS. Has he received compensation from the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. VAILE. He has not.

Mr. FIELDS. Why has he not?

Mr. VAILE. Because he was not entitled to it, because he was not injured during the period of the war; he was in the service, but the war was over.

Mr. MILLER. He was not injured by his own negligence?

Mr. VAILE. Certainly not. There must be something the matter here.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is not there a law, passed some time ago, under which members of the Naval Reserve are retired?

Mr. KRAUS. Let me state that Lieutenant Livingston would undoubtedly be entitled to compensation, not to a pension, but under the law he would prefer a larger sum which he would receive as a retired officer. As a matter of fact, if he had been in the regular Navy on the 14th of March he would be entitled to retirement, but on account of the peculiar limitations in the law it does not apply to men in the Naval Reserve, although he was on active duty doing precisely the same thing that an officer of the Navy was doing.

Mr. MILLER. And they want to get this man on the retired list of the Navy?

Mr. KRAUS. That would be the effect of this bill.

Mr. MILLER. We are trying to get something done with reference to the Army as an emergency law but Congress will not grant it to them. Here is a man not injured in battle.

Mr. VAILE. This man had been injured in battle.

Mr. MILLER. How badly?

Mr. VAILE. He is in the hospital and is now suffering from a broken back. I think the gentleman will see that in justice he can hardly refuse to put this man on the retired list. This man was twice decorated for gallantry in action by the Serbian Government, and he was decorated by France because he applied the Liberty motor to the seaplane. He served throughout the hottest part of all of our action in the air abroad. Eleven days after the declaration of peace, after the passage of our resolution, at Guantanamo, Cuba, while he was repairing the propeller of an airplane the motor was started by some one else and his back was broken. He is absolutely crippled for life. If that had happened 11 days before he would be in the same position as his friends who rendered no greater service, and not nearly as great in many cases, who are now getting three-quarters pay, but because he went into the Navy only for the purpose of fighting for his country and not for the purpose of making it a profession for life he is condemned to go through life hopeless and helpless with a broken back, and is remitted to such compensation as he can get through the War Risk Bureau.

Mr. MILLER. It is undoubtedly an appealing case, but the principle involved here——

Mr. VAILE. Does principle require keeping that man a cripple through life on a miserable pittance?

Mr. MILLER. He is not a cripple through life because of any principle that we are applying. We are trying to apply his crippled condition to some principle. There are many men who have been decorated for service, just as much as this man has, and who have been injured probably just as badly. They are at Walter Reed Hospital, a lot of them. They are getting compensation simply. They would like to be put on the retired list, the same as this man would, but Congress will do nothing for them in that respect. We have men out there with both arms off, with both eyes out, and we can not get Congress to do anything for them, and why should we permit one by one others to come in here and get such relief?

Mr. VAILE. Is that a reason for denying justice?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; it is. I say we should treat them all alike.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I would vote to give this man a pension, but I would not vote to put him on the retired list. I object.

JOSEPHINE H. BARIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 514), authorizing the payment of an amount equal to six months' pay to Josephine H. Barin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether or not at any time we have ever granted six months' pay to beneficiaries of persons who have died while a member of the Naval Reserve Force?

Mr. McARTHUR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] can answer that better than I can.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; while on active duty. Under the general law while on active duty they are entitled to it. There were extraordinary circumstances here which induced the committee to report this bill. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR] is interested in it and introduced the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us have some further information about that. We do not want to establish a precedent here that is going to plague us in the future. We would not hestitate a moment to grant this mother six months' pay if circumstances warranted it.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to my friend from Wisconsin that I am not as familiar with all of the facts in the private bills as I should be.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I was not directing that remark to the chairman of the committee; I was directing it to the author of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore I hesitate to state positively anything that I am not sure about; but I know the general act was broad enough when men were on active duty, although reserve officers, and were destroyed while in active service, to entitle their widows or next of kin to this gratuity. How it is here I am unable to say.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, this man was a reserve officer; and understanding that the naval appropriation bill which passed on June 4, 1920, only eight days before his death, provided six months' pay for the widow of deceased officers, he permitted his insurance to lapse. It is hardly possible that the details of an act of Congress could be known to an officer as far away as Santiago within eight days. This man permitted his insurance to lapse. He did not know the contents of the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose there would be some in this House who would even ask us to grant these people the insurance that a man permitted to lapse through inadvertence or design on his part. We have never passed such a bill as that. I want to direct the attention of gentlemen to the law and have some explanation made as to the interpretation of it. The law is to be found on page 2 of the report, and I read it:

That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his own or her own misconduct, of any officer, enlisted man, or nurse on the active list of the regular Navy or regular Marine Corps, or on the retired list when on active duty, the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow, to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child, to any other dependent relative of said officer, enlisted man, or nurse previously designated by him or her an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer, enlisted man, or nurse at the date of his or her death. The Secretary of the Navy shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man or nurse having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his or her death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the "Pay of the Navy" and "Pay of the Marine Corps," respectively.

I wish to submit this question to the authority on naval matters, the distinguished chairman of the committee, whether a member of the Naval Reserve Force is on the retired list on active duty?

Mr. KRAUS. He is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think that we have ever recognized the principle of granting pay to naval reservists.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KRAUS. Let me make a brief statement on this subject generally. Prior to October 6, 1917, the law provided that a six months' gratuity pay be paid to the widow or to other dependent relatives of an enlisted man in the Navy. The authorities of the Navy Department, and, I believe, Congress itself did not intend to repeal that law, but the comptroller held that the war risk insurance act, which became effective October 6, 1917, repealed that law by implication. Then, subsequent to that and before March 3, 1921, the date when the resolution was passed declaring war at an end and therefore during the period while legally war was still continued, the Congress reenacted the gratuity law with some modifications, demonstrating thereby that it was not the intention of Congress to repeal the six months' gratuity law, and it is on that theory that the Committee on Naval Affairs in cases in which these facts have been presented to it have recommended favorably the allowance of this gratuity to the widow or next of kin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me put this question. Prior to the enactment of the compensation law which the comptroller held negatived the effect of the six months' gratuity, were dependent relatives of members of the Naval Reserve officers entitled to six months' gratuity?

Mr. KRAUS. I think not, but let me state to my friend that I believe he will be unable to find anybody in the Naval Reserve Force prior to that time who had seen active duty. I think Congress unintentionally made the limitation too restrictive in this law, looking upon the situation as if we were not at war, disregarding the fact that hundreds of men, while in the Naval Reserve Force, were in fact on active duty and they should have been protected.

Mr. STAFFORD. When a national guardsman goes to camp for summer training of 15 days and an accident occurs, to carry the logic of the bill out, the dependent parents would be entitled to six months' gratuity?

Mr. KRAUS. No. The Navy has precisely the same situation. My friend from Wisconsin misunderstands the fact that he was on active duty continuously. He was performing active duty in the Navy in training at the temporary training school. The situation is not the same. As a matter of fact this man, although he was not enlisted in the regular Navy, because the authorized enlisted strength was limited to 137,000 and we needed over three times that number, and therefore they enlisted in what is called the Naval Reserve and——

Mr. STAFFORD. How long was he on active duty prior to the accident?

Mr. KRAUS. Three years——

Mr. STAFFORD. Under that statement I guess I will withdraw the reservation of objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the war risk insurance act was passed, it stopped the pay of the six months' gratuity to the wife of an officer.

Mr. KRAUS. Let me say to my friend——

Mr. BLANTON. Just one minute. I want to recite what the facts are. Before the war risk insurance act went into effect this Government paid six months' gratuity to a widow.

Mr. KRAUS. Of an officer or an enlisted man, either one.

Mr. BLANTON. When the war risk insurance act was passed that stopped the pay. Then, June 4, 1920, Congress passed another act reestablishing this pay, and it again put this proviso excepting the Naval Reserve Force; and here is the provision, page 2 of the report:

That nothing in this section or in other existing legislation shall be construed as making the provisions of this section applicable to officers, enlisted men, or nurses of any forces of the Navy of the United States other than of the regular Navy and Marine Corps.

Now, if we are going to change the will of Congress with respect to one reserve officer, why has not the gentleman's committee brought in an act to take out this exception from the act of June 4, 1920, and make it applicable to the wives of all Naval Reserve officers?

Mr. KRAUS. I will say to my friend, for the reason that the number of cases is very small when you compare them with the great number of men in the service.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the third one we have had in the last two years.

Mr. KRAUS. I think there is one more on the calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the third one.

Mr. KRAUS. As a matter of fact, the department has urged this committee to report general legislation. I know it is a good deal of bother for members of the committee, but we feel we had better bring each one of these cases by itself.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think that this exception in the act of June 4, 1920, is an unwise one?

Mr. KRAUS. I think it is a bit narrow.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did not the gentleman's committee change it when we had the law up two years after the armistice and passed it?

Mr. KRAUS. I think it was referred to a good committee, but in my judgment the restriction is a bit narrow and it should have been limited to Naval Reserves when not on active duty, because when on active duty a number of these men served through the Great War.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman expects to apply this to all of them, I have no objection in this case; but if he is going to make fish of some and fowl of others, I shall object.

Mr. KRAUS. I will say to my friend from Texas each case of this kind that has come before the committee, and before the special committee of which I happen to be chairman, has been investigated individually, and in each case where we find a valid claim that he would have received a gratuity if the law had continued through this period from October 6, 1917, to June 4, 1920, we recommended an allowance in that case.

Mr. BUTLER. And where we are satisfied as to the disability. That is something.

Mr. BLANTON. If that is going to be the policy of the committee, I shall not object.

Mr. KRAUS. I will only speak for the past two years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to Josephine H. Barin, mother of Lieut. Louis T. Barin, late of the United States Naval Reserve Force, who was killed in an airplane accident at San Diego, Calif., while on active duty on the 12th day of June, 1920, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by that officer at the day of his death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GARNET A. SYLVESTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7776) to correct the naval record of Garnet A. Sylvester.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. KRAUS. Will the gentleman withhold a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will for a couple of minutes. But we are not making rapid headway.

Mr. KRAUS. I am particularly interested in making this statement in the absence of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], who reported this bill. I ask the membership of the House present here to view this case sympathetically.

Briefly, this man was a sailor during the World War. He was on the steamship Terry at Queenstown. He had a leave of absence to go and get his laundry, as the evidence shows, and when he returned to the place where the ship had been tied it was no longer in the same place. He tried to find the ship and made inquiries as to where it was located. He eventually found it, and within 15 hours returned himself. As the result of that accident the young man was tried and was summarily court-martialed. No penalty, by way of imprisonment, was imposed on him, but all his accumulated pay, $170, was taken from him, and a dishonorable discharge was given him.

Cases of that kind appeal to Members of the House, not for military justice, but for human justice.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not five years removed from the armistice. This is the first case, to my knowledge, where you are attempting to remove the charge of desertion standing against one of the World War soldiers or sailors. Thirty-five years after the Civil War President Roosevelt said there would never be an instance where the charge of desertion would be removed from Civil War veterans. It is too recent for us to remove the charge of desertion from anyone who served in the World War. I might pick out 15 or 20 in my own district, meritorious cases. I do not think it is right to act on this case at this time.

Mr. KRAUS. Now is the time when the evidence is fresh at hand.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his objection for one minute?

Mr. STAFFORD. One minute.

Mr. BLANTON. This was a young boy from the woods in Michigan?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; 35 miles removed from a railroad.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; 35 miles from the railroad. For that kind of a boy I have more sympathy than for a boy who comes from the city. He was ignorant. It is just as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] stated. His ship moved, and he could not find it, and, like many other country boys, he was scared to death.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are other cases where there are mitigating circumstances.

Mr. BLANTON. This case ought to appeal to the big heart of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

RESIGNATION OF A SPECIAL EMPLOYEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair submits the following letter, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1923.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby resign as special employee of the House of Representatives, to take effect as of this date.

Respectfully,

CLARENCE CANNON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JAMES H. GORDON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4437) for the relief of James H. Gordon.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that it be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws James H. Gordon, alias James H. Gillan, late of the United States Navy, and Company C, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, shall be held to have been honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Add, after line 7, the following: Provided, That no back pension, bounty, or allowance shall be held to have accrued, become due or payable; nor shall any checkages or deductions be made against any pension, bounty, or allowance which he may hereafter receive by virtue of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me, I would like to ask him if he knows of any distinction between this case and the preceding one?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. This is a man very old in years, who served in the Civil War.

Mr. BLANTON. And the other man was young in years?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; the other man was young in years, and we do not wish to set a precedent at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BLATTMANN & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13150) for the relief of Blattmann & Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I withhold for a moment.

Mr. UPSHAW. Is that the Blattmann case?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Does it amount to more than $500?

Mr. UPSHAW. It pertains to the honor of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. It amounts to $145,500. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EDWARD F. DUNNE, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9631) for the relief of Edward F. Dunne, jr.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $1,028.97, or so much thereof as is necessary, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of Labor to reimburse Edward F. Dunne, jr., the principal and costs actually paid by him on the bond which he furnished in 1911 in the case of the Chinaman Toy Dip, after deducting from that sum the additional expense incurred by the United States incident to handling deportation proceedings the second time against said Chinaman and the additional expense of deporting him from Philadelphia instead of Chicago.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Line 3, strike out "$1,028.97" and insert in lieu thereof "$880.09."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DENISON. I make the point of order that that comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No objection was made. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I did not object at the time the bill was called up because I thought the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] was present.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from Washington is present.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice that the gentleman overlooked a bet on this bill, because it is identical——

Mr. MILLER. I was not aware that I had any bet up on this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Washington is not a betting man.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a case where one of these bondsmen made a bond for a Chinaman, and the case was pending, as I understand——

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is wrong about this case. The other case was a criminal case. This is simply a deportation case, and the Chinaman has been sent back to China.

Mr. BLANTON. The matter was pending before Judge Landis.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] is satisfied to let this case go through, because one Chinaman has been gotten out of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. I was not sure the gentleman from Washington was present. If he is satisfied, I will let it go through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

E. J. REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4920) for the relief of E. J. Reynolds.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 4345, the corresponding Senate bill, and to consider it in lieu of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the amount the same in the Senate bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. The amount is the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the substitution of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to E. J. Reynolds the sum of $471.60 for reimbursement for money collected as duty on a carload of print paper received at the port of Ashtabula, Ohio, May 26, 1920.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 4920, the corresponding House bill, be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

THOMAS E. OWEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1502) for the relief of Thomas E. Owen.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLER. Let the bill be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $286.67 to Thomas E. Owen, receiver of the land office at Clayton, N. Mex., to reimburse him for moneys paid out by him for clerk hire in the said land office.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

JOHN T. EATON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 288) for the relief of John T. Eaton.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ELIZABETH M'KELLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11879) for the relief of Elizabeth McKeller.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. EDMONDS. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill is for the relief of a person injured in going through a park connected with a national monument.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; through an Indian reservation.

Mr. EDMONDS. An Indian reservation; the gentleman is correct. There was a very deep ravine that crossed the road. On all the automobile route books the map showed a bridge at this point. These people were driving at dusk. They came up a hill. Their lights were thrown upward. They did not see the gully. There was no attempt at all to protect the car.

On taking the matter up with the department they said that some time before they had placed a fence there, and there was a side road where they could have gone around. Of course, they did not notice that. The question in my mind is whether it is right for us to consider the payment of damages to people using national parks or Indian reservations or not. This case has been rather a puzzle to me, because I did not know what to do with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I had this further difficulty: I went over the seven pages of fine print in this report containing various affidavits, and there is no affidavit by the claimant or by the claimant's wife, who claims to be injured, as to her condition at the time of the accident or her present condition.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; look at the statement of Doctor Church.

Mr. STAFFORD. I say that there is no affidavit by the claimant or by the claimant's wife, who claims to be injured, as to her condition at the time of the accident or her present condition.

Mr. EDMONDS. If they were traveling at the time of the accident, I presume they were in good health.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not question that.

Mr. EDMONDS. Doctor Church on March 9, 1922, states:

Affiant further says that on the 9th day of March, 1922, the date of this affidavit, the said Mrs. R. L. McKellar is still unable to lift anything with the left arm owing to the said injuries, and that it will be a long time before the injury to the left arm is so cured or healed so that Mrs. McKellar will be able to lift anything or perform any act or labor with the left arm.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the report to show how this accident really occurred, not one word, not a line from the claimant to say whether they were at fault or not at fault. It is just merely that there was an accident. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANKLIN A. SWENSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2262) for the relief of Franklin A. Swenson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

THEODORE F. HOWE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12158) for the relief of Theodore F. Howe.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Theodore F. Howe, chief pay clerk, United States Navy, with the sum of $12,879.98 disallowed in his accounts while performing duty on board the U. S. S. Rochester, said sum having been lost without fault or negligence on his part.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman withhold it until I have made an explanation?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. This is the result of a pure technicality. This man served the Government for 24 years in the Paymaster's Department. The law passed July, 1919, gave the Secretary of the Treasury authority to relieve any disbursing officer of any deficiency in the account if it appeared that the officer was in line of his duty at that time and that the loss occurred without fault or negligence on his part. In pursuance of that authority given him by law the Secretary of the Treasury declared that this paymaster should be relieved. They found that there was no negligence on his part and that the officer was in the line of duty when the loss occurred. It appeared, however, that when the loss originally occurred in April, 1920, the paymaster was subjected to a court-martial which rendered the decision that he was technically guilty but at the same time said that he was not morally guilty. This was their decision:

In consideration of the long service of the accused, his spotless record, his excellent reputation for honesty and integrity, the absence of any testimony indicating that he converted these funds to his own use or profited by them in any way, or that he was careless or negligent in handling Government funds, and the probability, as shown by the evidence, that these funds were taken by parties other than the accused, we unanimously recommend Lieut (T.) Theodore F. Howe, United States Navy, to the clemency of the reviewing authority.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of the objection, I want to call attention to a part of the decision of the court-martial. He was found guilty. He was charged with the embezzlement of this $12,000. His sentence was a loss of $50 a month of his pay for a period of 12 months and a loss of 50 numbers in his temporary grade of lieutenant and 50 numbers in his permanent grade of chief pay clerk. It is true that they signed a recommendation for leniency. My distinguished colleague has not read the report of the investigating committee that investigated the escape of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll. It has been pigeonholed for months, and has never yet been called up in this Congress, where Army officers were responsible for his escape and condemned by the committee, and yet under these courts-martial they turn them loose, and not a single punishment has been had in that case. They are sometimes lenient toward each other, sometimes disposed to forgive one another in the Army and in the Navy.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. I would like to say that this man was continued on the job from that day to this as paymaster, and he has paid out thousands and thousands of dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. His own colleagues found him guilty.

Mr. KRAUS. He was found guilty of embezzlement. He was an officer in charge of a number of men, and under the law all the supplies are chargeable to him, and every dollar of the fund, and commodities of every kind that come to the ship are charged to him.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think that this is a case that should come up under the five-minute debate.

Mr. KRAUS. This is the only way that a man can ever get relief.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, Congress will probably be in session the 1st of May. [Laughter.]

Mr. KRAUS. I mean in this way. There will be opportunities if the man lives long enough.

Mr. BLANTON. I expect to be here the 1st of May.

Mr. KRAUS. I think it fortunate for Congress. I will say that, although this man was found technically guilty, it was not found that he took a dollar of the money.

Mr. BLANTON. The money disappeared?

Mr. KRAUS. It did.

Mr. BLANTON. Who took it?

Mr. KRAUS. The men under him—men whom he had no voice in the selection of. This man gave a bond. The facts have been investigated in the department; they know that they can not collect a single dollar on the bond. The company is entirely solvent; but no such embezzlement is covered by the bond, because it was not an embezzlement by this man personally.

Mr. BLANTON. We have had that question up before—when bonds are taken that are of no account.

Mr. KRAUS. You could not get any company to bond all the men under this man.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. The same company rebonded him immediately afterwards.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it was safe to do it.

Mr. KRAUS. The only reason in the world why this man is coming to Congress is because having been found guilty, and this case having been approved, as modified by the precedents——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I do not think we ought to take this case up to-night.

Mr. KRAUS. If the gentleman is going to insist upon his objection I shall not take any more time.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think we ought to pass a case like this under the conditions existing to-night.

Mr. KRAUS. It will be only a matter of accounting.

Mr. BLANTON. If there is any merit in the case the gentleman will have plenty of time in the next Congress. I object.

ROBERT G. HILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13373) to permit the correction of the general account of Robert G. Hilton, former assistant treasurer of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under a reservation of objection, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be read in lieu of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to reserve an objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment be read in lieu of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller General of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States the sum of $32,000, now carried in the accounts of the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at Baltimore, Md., and representing a balance due the United States from Robert G. Hilton, former assistant treasurer of the United States, when the subtreasury at Baltimore was discontinued January 14, 1921, in the amount of money belonging to the United States while in the custody of said assisant treasurer, the loss of said money having occurred through no fault or negligence on the part of said assistant treasurer; and for this purpose the sum of $32,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill was prepared by the officials of the Treasury Department, who are reluctant to proceed against the bondsman of the former subtreasurer at Baltimore. At my request, and owing to the fact that this bill was pending, they have three times extended the time within which action should be taken against the bondsmen of Mr. Hilton. It has been shown that there is no negligence upon the part of the subtreasurer.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Hilton was the assistant treasurer of the United States in charge of the subtreasury at Baltimore.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. He had in his possession funds of the United States, for which he was held responsible to this Government.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. While in such custody $32,000 disappeared there.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; that is not it exactly.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, there was a shortage?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Let me explain to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. There was a $32,000 shortage?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; let me explain that. The Congress by an act provided that the subtreasury at Baltimore should be closed on January 21, 1921, and the officials of the Treasury Department from Washington went to Baltimore where there was about $23,000,000 in the vaults, and proceeded to take this money out and count it. They picked up in Baltimore, without regard to civil-service regulations, without regard to the reputation of the men, certain laborers to help in transferring this money, coin and paper money, to the United States Treasury, and after they had finished checking out the $23,000,000, chiefly in used and damaged currency, they found a shortage of $32,000. Under the bond of Mr. Hilton he was responsible for every dollar, yet he never handled any of this money. The officials of the United States Treasury here in Washington went to Baltimore and checked the money out. They picked up men on the streets to do it, and when they had finished there was a shortage of $32.000.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman, as usual, is very correct, 100 per cent so, but in this instance he is not quite correct. They did not check him out in Washington; they checked him out in Baltimore.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; with laborers picked up on the street.

Mr. BLANTON. And the money that he had in his possession was counted in Baltimore, and not in Washington.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. If he had had the money there when it was counted in Baltimore, this extra help that the gentleman intimates might have stolen the money between Baltimore and Washington——

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. BLANTON. That was the intimation.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; I said they helped to take the money out of the vaults in the subtreasury.

Mr. BLANTON. He was checked out there and his money counted, and this shortage was discovered.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There was a shortage after they had taken this $23,000,000 out of the vaults.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows how a custodian of money is checked out.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. If the gentleman were a subtreasurer of the United States in some town in Texas, and the Treasury people picked up people on the streets of the town, not knowing their reputation, and they found a shortage, the gentleman would be resentful, would he not?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Maryland want to intimate that anybody connected with the Treasury Department of the United States would go to Baltimore and pick up laborers on the street to check out $23,000,000?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is what they did.

Mr. BLANTON. If they did that, they ought to be kicked out of the Treasury.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yet that is the fact.

Mr. BLANTON. If they did that kind of business with $23,000,000 in the vaults, then they have no business handling the money of the people of this country, and I object.

NEW JERSEY SHIPBUILDING & DREDGING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3515) for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think that a matter of $152,000 ought to be settled here in two minutes and a half?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

ELDREDGE & MASON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10022) for the relief of Eldredge & Mason, of Malone, N. Y.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FIELDS. Let the bill be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Eldredge & Mason, of Malone, N. Y., the sum of $473.25, erroneously paid into the Treasury of the United States, which was the proceeds of a marshal's sale of an automobile which was seized by the Federal authorities for a violation of the Volstead Act and upon which automobile Eldredge & Mason held a lien.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES W. MUGLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 370) for the relief of Charles W. Mugler.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the bill be reported under the reservation of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Charles W. Mugler, postmaster at Newport News, Va., in the sum of $3,496.85, and to certify the said credit to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, being the amount of shortages in money-order accounts, postal account, war-savings accounts, war-revenue accounts, collect-on-delivery accounts, money orders improperly paid, and registry losses, all arising from the embezzlement by, and negligence of, James W. Cheshire, employee in Hill branch of said office.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire how long this clerk who defaulted in the Newport News office was in charge of this station while this postmaster who seeks reimbursement was in office?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. From October 1, 1917, to February 12, 1919, as I recall. The branch office was opened with two other branch offices at military camps—two other offices—October 1, 1917. There was no trouble until the boys commenced to return from the other side, and then they were getting a number of checks cashed, getting considerable funds, buying postal money orders, and this embezzlement was all in a short time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I realize that during the war, particularly at camps where there were temporary post offices, it was almost impossible for the postmaster in whose district the office was located to give special attention to the branches, and I assume that this bill should pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SCHOONER "ITASCA."

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7871) for the relief of the owner of the schooner Itasca and her master and crew.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understand the owner of this schooner—it is not a Milwaukee schooner; that is a thing of the past—after this collision, instead of beaching the vessel continued on the voyage toward Newport, as I recall, and the greater part of the loss occurred.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. They were going to Gloucester, and put back into the harbor of Newport, which would have seemed to be the wise thing to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the report of the Secretary of the Navy the only damage suffered by the owner, other than the sinking of the vessel, was of a minor character. This matter can be settled under the general authorization of the law that Congress passed recently, and why should they not get relief through the department?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It is not my relief, but the schooner did sink and it is no good.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

HERBERT ELLIOTT STEVENS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13937) for the relief of Paymaster Herbert Elliott Stevens, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

NEAH BAY DOCK CO.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9309) for the relief of the Neah Bay Dock Co., a corporation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Neah Bay Dock Co., a corporation, the sum of $4,507.71 as reimbursement for damages caused to the Neah Bay Wharf, the property of said company, by the U. S. S. Swallow, a mine sweeper of the United States Navy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HAROLD L. M'KINLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8733) for the relief of Harold L. McKinley.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Harold L. McKinley, of St. Ansgar, Mitchell County, Iowa, $634.60, in full compensation for his claim for expenses incurred as a result of sickness while serving in the United States Army.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP "BRYNHILD."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5369) to compensate the owners of the steamship Brynhild for damages and expenses in repairing the said steamship, and to make an appropriation therefor.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this claim can be settled under the general authority vested in the Navy Department, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

RELIEF OF OWNERS OF BRITISH STEAMSHIP "PORT PHILLIP."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8051) for the relief of the Commonwealth & Dominion Line (Ltd.), owner of the British steamship Port Phillip.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. According to my record here it is a different bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a bill which the present occupant of the Chair introduced and I would like to make some inquiry about the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to reserve the right to object. I would like to inquire why they can not adjust this claim under the general authorization of law.

Mr. HICKS. It happens to be my bill, and not knowing it was coming up to-night, I left all my papers in my office.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that at the next meeting when private bills unobjected to shall be considered, that this be taken up first in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] has made such an amiable and efficient presiding officer here to-night that it seems to me his negligence in this matter of not bringing the papers with him on this case ought to be excused by allowing him to pass the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill is entirely different in phraseology from that which the Committee on Claims used for referring these bills to courts of admiralty. This bill is from the Committee on War Claims and it carries an appropriation, and there should be some explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I make that request, that this bill be made in order for consideration first on the Private Calendar when that calendar shall be next considered; at the next meeting when private bills which are unobjected to shall be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCARTHUR). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin that this bill be in order for consideration first on the Private Calendar when that calendar shall be next taken up?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HICKS). The Clerk will report the next bill.

HERBERT E. MEILSTRUP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3118) for the relief of Herbert E. Meilstrup.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, the hour is getting late, and yet some special mention should be made of this bill. The amount is very small, only $53.14. It is a claim for reimbursement for property that was appropriated while the soldier was in the hospital. The War Department has made successive findings that the amount is entirely too large, and has recommended that the amount should be $21.90. There is warrant for the position of the War Department, because this claimant asks for reimbursement for a bathing suit of the value of $10. I have bought bathing suits, and perhaps others here have, who have had dips in the Atlantic Ocean on occasions, but I do not think they have ever paid that amount.

Mr. MILLER. How much of a bathing suit?

Mr. STAFFORD. It depends on the size of the wearer. Perhaps the gentleman from Washington, considering his proportions, would have to pay more.

This claimant is persistent. He has been writing and writing, and I am curious to know what Senator has been acting for this claimant as a messenger boy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman please tell us what this 40 cents is for? [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. It would be cheaper to pass the bill and get rid of it once for all; so I will withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Herbert E. Meilstrup, formerly an enlisted man in the Forty-first Company of Engineers, unassigned, the sum of $53.40, the same being the value of personal property lost in a manner unknown when the said company was discharged from service in the Army, and while the said Herbert E. Meilstrup was confined in General Hospital No. 25, Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind., suffering from pneumonia, during the month of December, 1918, the said personal property having been reasonable, useful, necessary, and proper for an enlisted man while in quarters, engaged in the public service, in the line of duty, and having been lost without fault or negligence on the part of the owner, and claim for replacement of such property or recoupment of damages having been disallowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, which decision was sustained on review.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division on this important bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF THE WIDOW OF RUDOLPH H. VON EZDORF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 528) for the relief of the widow of Rudolph H. von Ezdorf, deceased.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I suppose the gentleman has examined into this matter carefully?

Mr. BLANTON. For years I have examined it carefully. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me give the gentleman a brief history of the case.

Mr. ABERNETHY. If the gentleman does not mind, let me tell him——

Mr. BLANTON. Let me tell the gentleman what I know about the case.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I have the floor; and if the gentleman wants to kill the bill, I would like to explain it first and have decent interment, at least.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this was not my bill originally. This bill comes from my district and came up at a time when my distinguished predecessor was very ill and could not give it that consideration that it possibly otherwise would have had. This is a Senate bill, which is backed by a unanimous report from the Senate committee, and it passed the Senate unanimously; and it comes to this House recommended by the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims, and is recommended by the Public Health Service and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon. It provides for a year's salary for the widow of a man who contracted yellow fever in the service of the United States. That gave him heart disease, from which he finally died. He went all through the South and down through Louisiana and North Carolina, and was engaged in the eradication of malaria; and he stands out as a hero.

Right here I want to call the attention of the House—and this is a serious matter, gentlemen—here is a pamphlet which he prepared while living, published by the United States Public Health Service, which is a monument to him, and his widow has gone out since his death as a trained nurse to take care of herself and her only child, and here we find a spectacle in a deliberative body where, by your rules, one man can absolutely deny a hearing on this bill. I can not understand him.

I can not understand it, and although the gentleman from Texas has been fighting this bill for six years, as he says, I can not understand why he should take it upon himself to deny absolutely the right of the House to pass upon this bill. If that is the case in a deliberative body, as far as I am concerned the gentleman from Texas can turn this bill down, but when he does it he is denying one of the widows that he has talked so much about heretofore her absolute right. This man went down as a hero in the Public Health Service of this country. The committee have made a unanimous report, and General Cumming wrote me a special delivery letter to-day showing that this is a deserving case, and I say I ought to have my day in court. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of objection, I want to say that this man did perform some service in yellow-fever investigation. He contracted yellow fever in 1898, 25 years ago. He did not die then, and he did not die for years afterwards. He continued in the service——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman going to object to this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to answer the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman is going to object, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. In that case I think we ought to have a quorum present. I want to answer the strictures of the gentleman from North Carolina, and I have the right to do it. I demand a quorum.

Mr. McARTHUR. I move a call of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will not let me make an explanation in answer to the strictures of the gentleman from North Carolina——

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman feels that he is entitled to answer the gentleman, all right.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want a minute. I withdraw the point. This man took yellow fever in 1898, 25 years ago. He continued in this service, drawing a good big salary. To show you that he was not disabled——

Mr. FIELDS. When did he die?

Mr. BLANTON. In 1916. In 1914, 16 years after he had yellow fever, he was in such fine physical condition that the Public Health Service of this Government sent him down to Vera Cruz to investigate yellow-fever conditions in Mexico. That was 16 years after he had yellow fever.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina. I will be more courteous to the gentleman than he was to me.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am courteous to the gentleman. Suppose the gentleman was to die while a Member of the House, would not his widow get $7,500——

Mr. BLANTON. Not if I have anything to do with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FIELDS. How does the gentleman think he will have anything to do with it?

Mr. BLANTON. If this man had died in 1898, when he had the yellow fever in fighting an epidemic, I would have approved his bill; but that was 25 years ago; and after that he drew a salary from this Government for years and years; and 16 years afterwards he was sent to Vera Cruz to investigate yellow fever there. I do not think this is the kind of a bill that ought to set a precedent here. Talk about a report from the Committee on Claims! I see the distinguished chairman of that committee sitting there now, and he knows that four years ago he and I in that committee led a fight against this bill and succeeded in killing it in the committee. That is what I know about this bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Why is not he fighting it now?

Mr. BLANTON. He is afraid of such strictures as the gentleman gave me awhile ago. I am not afraid of them. I am brave enough to stand up here and do my duty, even when gentlemen cast strictures. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MRS. VINCENZA DIMONICO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 297) for the relief of Mrs. Vincenza Dimonico.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000 to Mrs. Vincenza Dimonico, of East Boston, Mass., for injuries resulting from the accidental discharge of a machine gun, the property of the War Department, being demonstrated, for recruiting purposes, by a detachment of United States troops at East Boston, Mass., on July 23, 1919.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "$30 000" and insert "$5,000."
Page 6, strike out "Dimonico" and insert "Diminico."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to address the Members just for a minute. It is absolutely impossible for us to complete the calendar to-night. There is good reason to believe that there will be another evening arranged for the consideration of private bills before the adjournment, very likely the fore part of next week.

Mr. BLANTON. By unanimous consent we could stay here until 11.30 instead of 10.30.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a limit to human endurance. I intend to move to adjourn.

Mr. BLANTON. This being the last opportunity for the Private Calendar and there being deserving bills on this calendar, I ask unanimous consent that we sit until 11 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that, as I understand it, this is not going to be the last opportunity for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. BLANTON. The Rules Committee have a bunch of rules as long as my arm.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very true, but in conference with the leader of the House, he tells me that he plans to arrange for another night meeting, when we will be able to go through with the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas press his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BLANTON. This being about the last chance to get private bills considered, and there being meritorious bills on the calendar, I ask unanimous consent that we sit until 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the session continue until 11 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

By unanimous consent the title of the bill was amended by striking out the word "Dimonico" and inserting the word "Diminico."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. We can clean up the calendar next time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House sit until 10.30 o'clock; that is a compromise.

Mr. BLANTON. That was the original order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN EX-SERVICE MEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10041) for the relief of certain ex-service men.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FIELDS. Let the bill be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the first opening of lands to settlement, after the date of the approval hereof, within the North Platte Federal irrigation project, Nebraska-Wyoming, the following ex-service men, William D. Nicholas, Howard Evans, Clarence L. Larsen, T. T. Turner, and Jenner H. Mead, who incurred loss through being erroneously advised that they had been successful in the land drawing of September 9, 1921, on said project, shall each have a preference right for not less than 30 days prior to said opening within which to select a farm unit: Provided, That this act shall not be considered as entitling any person named to make another homestead entry who shall have received the benefits of the homestead laws since having been advised that he was unsuccessful in the aforesaid land drawing of September 9, 1921.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FIELDS. Reserving the right to object, I think there should be some explanation of this bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. The bill is for the relief of five ex-service men who were notified that they had been successful in drawing upon this project. Perhaps the majority of the House are acquainted with the first name in the bill, William D. Nicholas, who in the late administration was employed in the Sergeant at Arms' office. He was notified when in Washington, and at an expense of $250 he went to Wyoming, and after being there two or three days he was informed by the officer in charge of the drawing that they had made a mistake, and that he was not successful, and that he had no piece of land.

Mr. FIELDS. And the other four were in the same class?

Mr. SINNOTT. The other four were in a similar class.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LAND TO THE ROBERT E. KELLEY POST, SOUTH DAKOTA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6577) authorizing the conveyance of certain land in the State of South Dakota to the Robert E. Kelley Post No. 79, American Legion, South Dakota.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, have we heretofore adopted the policy of deeding land gratuitously to private individuals?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I can not say as to that, but the facts in this case are these: Many years ago the Government had a warehouse at Flandreau, S. Dak., and they had acquired the property near the river between the city of Flandreau and the school. They had no use for it and the warehouse has since been removed. Some years ago the Government gave the city one-half of the lot for park purposes. The Government has no use for this, and the Robert Kelley Post of service men organized under the American Legion regulations desire the lot for the erection of a building. The Interior Department recommends the grant and the committee has amended the bill so as to safeguard it by reservations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, take this instance—it might occur. The Government owns a public building and outgrows its size—a very valuable lot in the city. The policy of the Government has been heretofore to sell the lots to the highest bidders. Shall we now turn around and give it to a private association?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I think where they have a lot of that kind that is of little value, where it has lain idle for many years, no better use could be made of it than to give it to a soldiers' organization that will put a building on it and use it in the community. I can not see that the Government can make a better use of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It never has been done in all the history of the Government.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Why would not this be a good time to start it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because of the plague that would come upon Congress from people asking us to give away Government property.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I would not consider that any danger, because Congress can deal with each specific case. Here is a case where they have already given half of it to the city for park purposes, and why not give the other part to this post?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Secretary of War has made a suggestion that so far as public land under his control is concerned he will give a lease so that at any time the Government needs it it can take control of it. I do not think that even the Loyal Legion or the American Legion or the Grand Army post should ask the Government to give away property, and therefore I object.

Mr. McARTHUR. How large is this city?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. About 1,500 population.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

RICHARD ANDREWS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8871) for the relief of Richard Andrews.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let there be some explanation of the bill.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, this is a case where a drunken chauffeur in the employ of the United States, driving a mail truck at over 29 miles an hour, ran into a man who was getting off a street car The chauffeur was arrested, held for the grand jury, pleaded guilty. The thumb and forefinger of Mr. Andrews's left hand has been amputated, and the remaining fingers on the hand are stiff. He has lost the use of his left hand. The man is unable to do any work of any kind. The entire hand is useless. He used to earn $25 a week. At the present time he is compelled to live with his wife and children in three rooms.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this will relieve at least one poor unfortunate case in the gentleman's district, or, at least, in the city of New York, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. It has never been the policy of the Government until lately, and that is when we are relieving injuries that occurred during the war caused by members of the Army and Navy, to make the Government liable for the torts of its employees.

Mr. SIEGEL. I want to say to the gentleman that had this accident occurred when the mail truck drivers were in private employment, a judgment of at least ten to twenty thousand dollars would have been rendered.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is a lawyer. He knows that the Government is not responsible for torts committed by its employees, and never has been.

Mr. SIEGEL. This case is recommended, as the gentleman will find on page 2 of the report, by the Postmaster General personally, and it was recommended by everyone who has investigated the case.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman knows that we have hundreds of just such cases that run back over the last 25 years.

Mr. SIEGEL. Not in cases where we put a drunken driver in charge of a big juggernaut, and where it appears the man had never driven a machine until 30 days previous.

Mr. BLANTON. Does Doctor Work recommend that this be paid?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The committee has reduced it to $2,500.

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Richard Andrews, the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for injuries sustained by the said Richard Andrews due to a large auto truck owned and operated by the Post Office Department running him down while boarding a street car at Third Avenue, New York City, passing over his hand, causing the amputation of the thumb and forefinger, fracture of the wrist, and laceration of back of hand, injuring the arm, rendering the arm and hand useless and preventing him from earning his livelihood as a cement worker at which he earned $8 per day, and causing him to expend from the 15th of March, 1920, to the 5th of June, 1920, in the hospital and as an outside patient for five weeks, for doctors, nurse bills, medicine, etc., and rendering his injury permanent.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, strike out all after the word "of" in line 5 and insert the following: "$2,500, in full settlement against the Government, in compensation for injuries sustained March 15, 1920, in the city of New York, when struck by a United States mail truck."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN FLANDREAU, S. DAK.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill H. R. 6577, No. 420 on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is that the case that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objected to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has suggested an amendment to have this lot transferred at the appraised value.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, as far as the Government has ever gone yet, and I think they should go that far, is to permit various Legions to construct chapter houses on Government property. They have never transferred the fee of the Government property.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this amendment provides that it shall be transferred at its appraised value.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to returning to the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to the Robert F. Kelley Post, No. 79, American Legion, South Dakota, for the following described land: North half of lot 14 of the southest quarter of section 21, township 107, range 47 west, Moody County, S. Dak., which tract of land is to be used as a site for a memorial building.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer by deed, to be duly executed by him, to the Robert E. Kelley Post, No. 79, American Legion, South Dakota, the following-described land: The north half of lot 14 of the southeast quarter of section 21, township 107 north, range 48 west of the fifth principal meridian, in Moody County, S. Dak., more particularly described as beginning at a point 181½ feet north of a point 896 feet east of the southwest corner of said section, thence north 181½ feet, thence east 120 feet, thence south 181½ feet, thence west 120 feet to the place of beginning, which said tract of land is to be used as a site for a memorial building. Said deed shall contain a clause reserving to the United States all oil, gas, coal, or other minerals in the land, and shall also provide that if said tract shall cease to be used at any time for the purposes for which it is granted it shall revert to the United States."

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON: Page 2, line 15, after the word "beginning" strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "On payment of the appraised value of said lot."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRANK G. EMMES.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1227) for the relief of Frank G. Emmes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank G. Emmes the sum of $887, in full settlement for damages suffered by reason of being shot by a machine gun accidentally discharged on one of the naval boats of the Government, at that time used as a patrol boat in the harbor of Waukegan, Ill.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Strike out, page 1, line 6, "$5,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$887."

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, in what capacity was this man employed?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, under the gentleman's reservation, I want to say to the House that it is fair it should be stated now, before the stage for objection is passed, that I am going to offer an amendment increasing this amount. The matter got through the Committee on Claims, I think, rather inadvertently, there being no allowance whatever for the permanent injury which this man sustained. The $887 covers only his actual monetary loss and expenses. I propose to offer an amendment. We passed a bill a moment ago in which we gave a lady $5,000 for a permanent injury; another one in which a man got $2,500. I talked the matter over with the chairman of the committee and with our good and diligent friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who has done such very valuable service in the consideration of these bills, and I think we all agree that this amount ought to be increased.

Mr. MILLER. What is the character of the injury?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He was shot in the abdomen by a machine gun on a patrol boat lying in the harbor of Waukegan, Ill., during the war. The shot was not only accidentally fired, as stated in some place in the report, but the board of investigation of the Army admitted that the soldier who was responsible for this accident was unskilled in the use of the machine gun and he did not know that he was maneuvering it in such way that it would fire the shot.

Mr. MILLER. Where was this man at the time?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. On the dock, working in a private capacity. He was an engineer on a gasoline boat and had gone to the wharf for the purpose of securing oil to bring over to the boat which he was running. He was a citizen, an innocent bystander, who, of course, could in no way be held accountable for the accident or even as having contributed to the accident.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

Mr. BOX. Reserving the right to object, and it is not my purpose to object, I think the claim is meritorious; but I want to understand the nature of the injuries, if it can be stated, that the man sustained.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This man was shot through the abdomen and was in the hospital for many months.

Mr. BOX. What is his present condition?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. From an affidavit, which is in the report, out of 41 months he was able to work off and on approximately 15 months' time.

Mr. BOX. What is he doing now?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He is up in Wisconsin doing what little service he can.

Mr. BOX. I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. UPSHAW. How much does the gentleman contemplate increasing the amount?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I was going to propose an addition of $2,500 for the permanent injury.

Mr. UPSHAW. By all means; I wish it might be more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Instead of "$887" insert "$3,387."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the figures in the committee amendment "$887" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,387."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say for the committee that I believe the committee would accept this amendment, because we did not notice in the consideration of this bill that this man was permanently injured. There is no question about it. He was shot in the abdomen, leaving him a weak side, and he can only walk a short distance and can not perform ordinary work.

Mr. MILLER. What was his occupation?

Mr. EDMONDS. He was an engineer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen, the speaker has frequently asked me to preside over the deliberations of this House and has often appointed me Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Both honors I have valued highly.

As my term of service with you is drawing to a close I would feel remiss were I not to acknowledge the debt of gratitude I owe and express the appreciation I feel for the many acts of kindness and generous consideration shown me while occupying the chair.

It has been a high privilege to have been a Member of this body, and the associations formed here, consecrated by fidelity to the Nation and cemented by ties of comradeship and good will, will ever remain happy memories beyond the reach of the fading years. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, it is a very unpleasant task that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is performing, but it is one that is very valuable to this country. I realize that. Perhaps it makes some of us sore, but we get over it. I realize that he has worked hard and faithfully. I happen to know personally of the industry and the energy he puts forth on these bills. It is exceedingly doubtful whether we shall have another chance to consider these bills. Therefore I would suggest that perhaps it might be well for us to meet in the mornings one hour earlier rather than have night sessions. Certainly each Member who has a bill on the Private Calendar should be given an opportunity to have same considered.

But, aside from that, I want simply to say, in connection with reference to the Acting Speaker [Mr. HICKS] and what he has said, that my first task in Congress was sitting on a contested-election case in which the gentleman from New York was involved. I went into that case very thoroughly, and I never had any cause to regret my action on that occasion. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn I ask unanimous consent to say this word concerning the committee: When I entered the House to-night I heard some music very unusual to my ears, in a plea coming from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], that something be reconsidered that he had objected to in haste, and I said, "Glory be." Then I thought to myself, "We appreciate the unwearied vigilance of the gentleman, but I wonder how he would feel if he had a worthy case pending; I wonder how the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would feel if he had a case of real pathos pending." And all at once I heard the unheard-of thing, the gentleman from Wisconsin who watchfully objects to so many claims actually asked somebody to withhold his objection.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, what is this, anyhow? Is it a revival? [Laughter.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Just another word "for the good of the order" before we go. I thought it would be a fine thing for us to sleep on to-night if we would remember to be grateful perhaps to these "objecting" gentlemen for their vigilance. But I ask them to remember—the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Texas—that we have only a few fleeting hours left; the golden sands are running out; and for the honor and comfort of the Committee on Claims, whose chairman has sat up until midnight many a time, trying to do his duty to every claim, let us not have so many objections. It is not quite fair to this able and faithful chairman and his busy comrades on the Claims Committee to turn down so many claims without a hearing. Many of these claims are sacred and worthy.

I think the chairman of this committee and all his comrades have been legislative heroes, trying to pass on these difficult bills. I would be willing to stay here until midnight every night until Congress adjourns in order to clear the calendar of these private claims when so many of them not only involve domestic relief and human happiness on the part of those who have suffered, but actually stand guard at the door of the Nation's honor. Let us give the Claims Committee a square deal.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us stay a little later. There will never be another chance to pass any of these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 21, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1923.

(Legislative day of Monday, February 19, 1923.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE MERCHANT MARINE—FILLED MILK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. LADD that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8086) to prohibit the shipment of filled milk in interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Fletcher	McCormick	Reed, Mo.
Bayard	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Reed, Pa.
Borah	George	McKinley	Robinson
Brandegee	Gerry	McNary	Sheppard
Brookhart	Glass	Moses	Smoot
Broussard	Gooding	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Hale	New	Sterling
Colt	Harrison	Norbeck	Sutherland
Couzens	Heflin	Norris	Swanson
Culberson	Hitchcock	Oddie	Townsend
Cummins	Johnson	Overman	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kellogg	Phipps	Warren
Dillingham	Keyes	Pittman	Watson
Edge	Ladd	Poindexter	Weller
Ernst	La Follette	Pomerene	Williams
Fernald	Lodge	Ransdell	Willis

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I was warned on yesterday by the Senator in charge of the bill that I could not yield without losing the floor. I am willing to make any kind of a reasonable concession.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I am going to make any reasonable concession. I shall not object to the Senator yielding where it will not take any particular time in discussion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we are not disposed to yield to anything.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am simply standing on my rights under the rule and I am trying to treat everyone fairly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is exactly what we are going to do.

Mr. MOSES. Do I understand that the Senator from Missouri declines to yield to me?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I want to extend every courtesy to my brother Senators, but, of course, I do not want to have advantage taken of that to take me off the floor. I had promised the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to yield to him, if I could do so, to make some report.

Mr. SMOOT. Not to submit a report, I will say to the Senator, but——

Mr. McKELLAR. I object to that being done.

Mr. SMOOT. It was simply with reference to a bill which had been wrongly referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will relieve the Senator from Missouri by insisting on the objection.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It is not relieving me because I am quite willing to yield.

Mr. MOSES. Has the question been determined that the Senator from Missouri is not to be permitted to yield to anybody?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is well known a Senator can not yield against an objection.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am very sorry. Even in a somewhat heated contest there are certain amenities and courtesies that go with it. For instance, I do not think anybody ought to raise the question that a Senator has spoken more than twice merely because he has yielded to a brother Senator to make some interjection as a part of the regular debate. On the other hand, I do not think we ought to refuse to allow a Senator who has some matter to present to come here and present it in order to save time. When I was a boy we had a rule of honor that it was never fair to gouge eyes in a fight, and we might observe some kind of a code even in the United States Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think we might well do so.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the Senator will not raise the question when another Senator rises in good faith to interject something—to make a remark—not for the purpose of giving the Senator occupying the floor time to get a rest——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I certainly will not do that.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then I think we had better allow these matters to be presented.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no disposition to prevent them.

Mr. McKELLAR. For the present I object.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then I am powerless to save the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

PROPOSED CESSION OF CERTAIN WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, when we recessed last evening I was discussing the benefits which would accrue to the people of the West Indies if those islands were to be brought under the American flag. I had cited the instance of Porto Rico, and I quoted from the London Times and other authorities. I had pointed out that the prosperity of Porto Rico and her trade advantages were such that the British authorities were sharply calling attention to the fact that those islands were likely to become Americanized by virtue of the example unless their condition was ameliorated by the British Government. That is not exactly the language; but as I have placed the exact language in the RECORD, my interpretation may go along with it.

Mr. President, in addition to what has already been demonstrated, and to which I have called attention, I invite your attention to the fact that the American citizen, perhaps more than any other citizen, dislikes to remove to any country or even to embark in business in any country which is not under our flag. I have not the slightest doubt, sir, that if the island of Cuba were part of America the population of that beautiful island would be almost doubled by people from Missouri and the other States of the Union who would go there to establish homes. That island would become a place of wonderful beauty and magnificence. I think if the West Indian islands were brought under the American flag that American capital would immediately invest there; that they would be rapidly developed, and that their trade with this country would soon become of vast importance. Given the same trade privileges that we have extended to all of our outlying island possessions or protectorates, there is no reason why this great chain of islands should not become a wonderful source of wealth and all of the population receive the blessings naturally flowing from economic prosperity.

I wish to illustrate this by a concrete example. During the Spanish-American War we took possession of the Isle of Pines. It was understood that it would come under the American flag. Accordingly, Americans immediately flocked to that island. It seems now that our Government, with characteristic indifference to the interests of the people—I do not speak particularly of the present administration—is about to turn over this island to the blessings of Cuban government. Yet, as we all know, the Cuban Government probably would not stand for 48 hours if it were not that it gains shelter in the shadow of Uncle Sam.

I have a letter from a citizen of my own town which is highly instructive regarding the Isle of Pines, and which shows what takes place in the way of the development of a country when it is understood that the American flag is to float there. I send the letter to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., February 8, 1923.

Senator JAMES A. REED,
Care of Hotel Muehlebach, Kansas City, Mo.

DEAR SENATOR: As per our conversation on February 4, relative to Isle of Pines, we give you the following:

POPULATION.

Conservative estimate; no Cuban census is complete, as it does not cover those Americans owning property on the island or using same for 6 to 10 months' residence each year, coming north after crops are harvested or after winter season is over. Estimate also does not include transients or tourists. February, 1916, total population, 11,000.

Americans	6,000
Spaniards	1,500
Cubans	2,500
Jamaicans and Cayman Islanders (colored and English subjects)	1,000

When the United States of America went into the war practically all young American men on the island volunteered and went into service, and many others left to go into war work. Owing to passport regulations, unsettled times in the United States of America and Cuba, high prices, especially railway and steamship rates, Cuban taxes direct and indirect, strikes, rules, and regulations have cut down the winter and summer population of the island, which at the present time, we understand, is estimated as follows: Estimated population, February, 1923, 7,500:

Americans	4,000
Spaniards	1,000
Cubans	2,000
Jamaicans and Cayman Islanders	500
Americans owning registered property	8,000
Americans owning property not registered	2,000

LOCAL ISLAND REVENUES.

Year of 1921 and 1922, municipal properties, land taxes, industry, sundry taxes, special taxes, taxes on luxuries, fines, surcharges, and indemnities, total, $21,299.25.

EXPENDITURES.

Sanitation, charities, public security, municipal properties, urban and rural police, treasury municipal expenses, administration, total, $29,299.25. This above does not cover Cuban Government taxes, land, customs, 1 per cent profit tax, tax on all business. All bill receipts, bank books, deeds, and legal papers must carry Government tax stamp. All outgoing letters 3 cents postage.

I regret that the last import duty charges, which we understand have been changed, have not been received yet—will forward same to you as soon as received. As stated, freight and duties make an article delivered on the island double the retail price in the United States of America. Example: Gasoline is selling at 20 cents in the United States of America; costs 40 to 60 cents on island. Inclosed herewith please find a short article with views of the island. One small map of island showing Sigunea Bay and a smaller map showing relative location of island to Yucatan Channel, Panama Canal, etc.

Sigunea Bay was surveyed and charted by the United States naval survey expedition in 1921; there are no records of this expedition obtainable here; but believe same can be easily procured from Navy Department in Washington, D. C. However, we learned from good authority, while on the island, that the protected portion of the bay averaged 4 miles in width by 5 miles in length, depth from 12 to 36 feet.

In addition to the above, we give you the following facts: The area of the island, not including swamps, lowlands, in which valuable hardwood timber is abundant, is 800 square miles—equivalent to 512,000 acres. Ninety per cent is owned by Americans, or 460,800 acres. The United States Government built the first roads on the island; the Cuban Government, we do not believe, has even paid for these original roads, although they endeavor to maintain them. Americans on Annual Good Roads Day all turn out and help, not only on the roads and streets with teams, trucks, men, and money, but have built and maintain by private American funds 200 miles of graded roads.

Season of 1922 and 1923 to January 27: Total crates of grapefruit and vegetables shipped, 195,881. This will probably exceed 200,000 crates before the season is finished. Most of the crop coming to the United States of America.

The Florida fruit people are active against the island products, but these crops come in six weeks to two months ahead of Florida's, so that they do not interfere with the Florida market. The volcanic ash—the soil of the island rich in iron—produces the best grapefruit known. Tobacco, the finest Cuban leaf, was grown on the island and shipped to Cuba and the United States of America during the Spanish war as a Cuban product, and it is the same soil. Why not reduce the price of cigars in the United States of America, as some of the tobacco people fear? Sugar cane and sugar was also produced on the island during the war, but it did not seem to please the sugar planters of Cuba.

There are churches in each colony, or community center, of the isle—Episcopal, Catholic, Methodist, Adventist, Latter-day Saints, and Lutheran denominations.

Nine American schools are maintained among the American colonies by public subscription and tuition. All grades are taught to and including, high-school studies—English is taught in all of them. Cuban Government maintains nine schools on the island—Spanish is taught in all of them.

There are 3,633 acres of bearing grapefruit on the island, 515 acres bearing oranges and other fruit trees, and 573 acres in 1922 bearing eggplant and peppers; 21 well-equipped modern packing houses care for the island fruits and vegetables.

There are colony or community houses located in every colony, as well as social and fraternal clubhouses, a Masonic temple in Santa Fe, with a thriving lodge of Masons, and chapter masons in Nueva Gerona. There is an active Red Cross unit affiliated with the American Red Cross, with a hospital association and hospital building in Nueva Gerona, and two American-owned and cared-for cemeteries.

Magnesia springs and other mineral waters abound; many excellent bathing beaches. American bank cares for finances of the island; American newspaper, established in 1904, is published, and has been issued weekly (copy of paper, the Isle of Pines Appeal, is inclosed).

There is an active American chamber of commerce, headquarters, and secretary in Nueva Gerona.

The island (via Habana) is 4 days from New York, 2 days from Florida, but a direct line from Key West or Tampa would cut this time down at least 12 hours. A direct line from Tampa is in operation at this time.

Soon after the Spanish War, after numerous petitions, letters, etc., had been sent to Washington, asking that the island be declared American property, several Americans decided to assume the offices, to which they had been elected, as in the organization of a small town in the United States of America; all offices were filled by Americans, from the mayor or governor of the island down to local police.

These efforts caused no trouble, but brought no result in the status of the island. Many times recognition has been asked by petitions to our Government containing several thousand names of those interested, but we trust that at this time some arrangement, either trade or payment of some of Cuba's old debts to the United States of America, will bring the Americans under our own flag at last.

In brief, the island contains about 800 square miles of good land, about the size of Rhode Island; it is a beautiful, mountainous country, well watered with navigable rivers and well-protected deep-water bays. Soil, volcanic ash; best soil known for citrus fruit, tobacco, and sugar cane. Mineral deposits of iron, etc., and many mineral springs, hot and cold.

Under Spanish rule a penal colony for political prisoners and health resort of Spanish Army. No prisoners escaped unless assisted. Island really not in Spanish war, as old Spanish chief of police and governor of island will tell you, but was captured and occupied as American territory after the war; turned over temporarily to Cuba.

Believing it American property, Americans came and have spent money and hard labor on the island, until investments there now amount to about $15,000,000. Cuba has spent little; has taken far more in revenues from Americans than they have spent.

To-day the Americans asks that that which they have made valuable be held as it should be by the United States of America. This will not be desired by Cuban Government on account of large returns from no investment or expenditures, the chance to cancel some of their debt to the United States of America and by tobacco and sugar interests, realizing that under American laws and protection they are creating competition which is not desirable. This is also true of the Florida fruit growers. Therefore, why not tell Cuba, as they really expect, that we will relieve them from further care of our property and let the more than self-supporting, well-organized American community come into the United States of America, where it belongs.

As stated previously, we are giving you the above data and will forward to date additions to the above as soon as obtained. But we trust that you will treat the name of the writer as confidential, for, as stated in our former letter, while we do not believe the authorities in Cuba or the island could or would object to any statement we have made, however, we do not care to stir up matters unless necessary.

We thank you for the opportunity given the writer to discuss the matter with you while in this city. Mr. ——— regrets that he was unable to see and talk with you at that time; we will both be very grateful for any assistance in this matter, tending toward bringing the island into the United States of America, and we are glad to know that you feel with us that it will be to the mutual advantage of all parties concerned.

Very truly yours, ——— ———.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I omit giving the name of this man because of his request. I know him to be a fine business man, a patriotic American, who went to the Isle of Pines, hoping and believing that it would be made part of the American possessions.

Let us consider the lesson there is in this one example. Let us remember that these are questions that must be considered in the most serious way.

This island is about the size of Delaware. Already the majority of all the people are Americans. Of course, the greater part of the property belongs to these Americans. It is an ideal winter resort. It could be made a literal paradise. Its wealth could be multiplied many times. It is of strategic importance.

I could read the description of the plantations, of the hotels, and of the cities that have already sprung up, but, in order to shorten my remarks, I shall ask permission to place a detailed account of them in the RECORD, because I think Senators will find them very interesting to examine.

Mr. OVERMAN. What island is it?

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Isle of Pines, just south of Cuba.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many Americans are there in it?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Six thousand.

Mr. OVERMAN. And they own real estate?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; they own nearly all the real estate. Our Government built roads there while we had possession. Our citizens flocked there. They erected hotels; they acquired property; they extended the plantations, and we are about to turn the island over to Cuba. Will some one tell me why?

We rescued Cuba from the grip of a foreign tyrant, and then we said to the Cubans, "Here is your liberty as a free gift. We bought it with our blood and with our money." I think we did a perfectly idiotic thing when we did not retain at least sovereignty over the island. I would not object to giving them almost any measure of self-government aside from that. We know Cuba has to be so bolstered up and sustained by us that we have now in Habana a man, General Crowder, whose business it is to keep that Government somehow or other on its feet. Yet we propose to turn over to that Government this Isle of Pines, a majority of whose citizens are Americans. What we need is a commission of lunacy. It would seem the principal business of the modern American statesman is to give away something with one hand while he is taking the taxes from the people with the other. You can get up in 15 minutes a propaganda to give away everything we have, and a majority of the excitable people who follow propagandas will be enthusiastically for it immediately. There are people in this country, I confidently believe, who would welcome a movement to give away the liberties of the American people, to make a sort of world pool in which we would contribute our liberties and our rights, and divide with the rest of the nations.

Yet we have the example of the greatest nation on earth except our own—and its people think it is much greater than ours—which has grown to world mastery by pursuing exactly the opposite policy. Thirty-eight million people in the British islands exercise a control and dominance over nearly one-third of the inhabitants of the earth and over nearly one-third of the inhabitable portions of God's footstool. They did not achieve that position of power and importance by giving things away. They obtained it by constantly pursuing a policy of acquisition.

I do not know that it will add to the dignity of this occasion, but I heard a witticism in the theater the other night. A monologist said that an English captain had just captured a German submarine during the war. The captain of the German submarine was enraged and very defiant. He stood alongside of the English vessel and cursed England with utter contempt. The English captain stood rigid, apparently unmoved while he heard his country cursed. The German captain varied the operation by cursing the English flag, and still the English captain stood unmoved. Then the German, evidently determined in some way to arouse in the breast of the Englishman the feeling that he had been insulted, cursed him, the captain, and spat over the side of the vessel into the water to show his contempt. At that the English captain said, "Well, you bloomin' blighter, you can curse Hengland if you want, and you can curse the Union Jack if you want to, and you can curse me if you want, but I'll tell you one thing you can't do—you can't spit in our hocean."

That illustrates the English policy, and I do not speak of it in any unkind way. I repeat what I have often said: I admire the indomitable spirit of the British people. It is time we took a lesson from the experience of history.

Mr. President, when we come to consider the question of turning the Isle of Pines over to Cuba I hope the remarks I have made here to-day and the information contained in this letter may serve to awaken in Senators at least a spirit to investigate the question for themselves.

I ask at this point to be permitted to put in, as addenda to my remarks, the description of the Isle of Pines which I send to the desk, together with such appropriate maps and illustrations as may be permissible under the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The possession of these islands by any European power is not contrary to the word of the Monroe doctrine, but is contrary to its spirit. Let me call attention to that immortal doctrine, as expounded by James Monroe.

The Monroe doctrine dates from the message of President Monroe of December 2, 1823. Brazil had declared its independence of Portugal a year before. Troubles in the latter country had caused a modification of the constitution. In Spain a revolution had occurred, and the dominion of Peru was lost. The Holy Alliance, formed in 1815 by Russia, Austria, and Prussia, was threatening to help Spain recover its control in South America. Russia and the United States were in controversy over their Pacific coast boundaries. Mr. Monroe in his message took up the Russian matter first, saying:

In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

The President then spoke of Spain and Portugal in this wise:

Of events in that quarter of the globe with which we have no intercourse and from which we derive our origin we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so.

That is downright good doctrine to remember to-day.

I read again this language of James Monroe:

In the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so.

It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole Nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between these new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

Now, Mr. President, of course candor compels the statement that in the message of James Monroe he expressly stated that it was not the purpose of the United States to interfere with possessions which had already been acquired by European powers in this hemisphere. Manifestly that statement sought to avoid the giving of offense and the raising of an issue which would have immediately involved us in war. But what is the spirit of the doctrine of James Monroe? He could have no justification for saying to European powers that they must not extend their domain upon this hemisphere except that the presence of European powers upon this hemisphere was regarded as inimical to the interests of the United States. If that be the case, then we are equally menaced whether that possession occurred before James Monroe wrote his message or took place afterwards.

The spirit of the Monroe doctrine is, first, that we will not interfere in European affairs at all unless our interests are directly and seriously affected, and then merely to defend our interests. Secondly, that the presence of European powers in this hemisphere, interfering with the affairs of this hemisphere, is regarded as contrary to the interests of the United States.

Although we grant that these islands were excepted in the language of James Monroe at the time, we must admit—having regard to the spirit of his message and to the reasons upon which it was founded—that the possession of these islands by Great Brtain, France, and other countries is in violation of the true spirit of the Monroe doctrine. But stronger than that it is violative of the great laws of progress and development. Nothing any man may ever say, nothing any nation may ever declare, has been able to stand against the natural march of events, the sweep of destiny.

When great economic laws of development are in operation, sooner or later they break down the tiny, ineffective, and artificial barriers of man. The natural place for these islands to trade is with the United States. We are their natural protectors. They lie within the immediate sphere of our influence, and sooner or later they will come under the American flag. I have already called attention to the fact that British publicists have sounded the warning that the sugar planter of Jamaica, beholding the increased prosperity of the sugar planter of Porto Rico and the ability of the latter to market his sugar in America without paying a duty, is growing restive under a Government which compels him to pay a heavy duty for the privilege of sending his sugar to the very country that claims to own it. In that it is doing to him exactly what the same country did to the American colonists, taxing him for the privilege of trading under the flag to which they claim he is subject. Run up the American flag over these islands, open the ports of America to their products, open their ports to our trade, and I have not the slightest question that in 10 years' time their wealth will be doubled. Against this the statesmen who come and go, who rise to power and who therefore imagine they have risen to greatness, may protest, but in the end the protest will prove ineffective.

The Monroe doctrine in its spirit covers all of these island possessions. If I am asked why it then does not cover the Dominion of Canada, I answer that in one sense it does, but I believe that question is solving itself or ultimately will solve itself. I believe, sir, the development of that mighty country, the increase and character of its population, to be such that ultimately it will establish itself as a great free country. In any event, this much we know, that there are 9,000,000 people in Canada, highly intelligent, highly efficient, brave, wonderful people, and I have supreme confidence that they will work out their own destiny along very high lines.

A word more with reference to the Monroe doctrine and the necessity for its emphasis. Venezuela lies almost at our door. Farseeing British statesmen only a few years ago sought to seize that country. Upon the one side they already had their possessions in British Guiana. Immediately off the coast they held the Isle of Trinidad, with its fortress, thereby controlling the waters in which their mighty fleets have hitherto ridden in safety, and where they can again find refuge, if refuge they shall ever need, or where they can rendezvous for purposes of attack, if attack be contemplated. To the west she held British Honduras; and these two jaws of her mighty pincers she proposed to press a little closer together and take a part of Venezuela. Venezuela asked for arbitration. This took place only a few years ago—in 1895. The dispute was as to the boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana, but Great Britain refused every form of arbitration which was proposed. We had an American President then, as we have almost always had American Presidents. Old Grover Cleveland had this to say:

The doctrine (Monroe) upon which we stand is strong and sound, because its enforcement is important to our peace and safety as a Nation, and is essential to the integrity of our free institutions and the tranquil maintenance of our distinctive form of Government. It was intended to apply to every stage of our national life, and can not become obsolete while our Republic endures. If the balance of power is justly a cause for jealous anxiety among the governments of the Old World and a subject of our absolute noninterference, none the less is an observance of the Monroe doctrine of vital concern to our people and their Government. If a European power, by an extension of its boundaries, takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring Republics against its will and in derogation of its rights, it is difficult to see why to that extent such European power does not thereby attempt to extend its system of government to that portion of this continent which is thus taken. This is the precise action which President Monroe declared to be "dangerous to our peace and safety," and it can make no difference whether the European system is extended to an advance of frontier or otherwise. The Monroe doctrine finds its recognition in those principles of international law which are based upon the theory that every nation shall have its rights protected and its just claims enforced.

If it was inimical to our interests and dangerous to our peace for Great Britain to take a slice of Venezuela, which lies nearly 2,000 miles from the southern point of Florida, then why is it not equally dangerous to our peace and opposed to our interests for Great Britain to hold islands within 50 miles of the Florida coast which command every great ocean highway through which our vessels must pass as they proceed to and from the Panama Canal?

Mr. President, a generation is but an hour in the life of a nation. No man is worthy the name "statesman" who regards the friendships of the present as a guaranty of the security of the future. Neither is he a statesman who fails to survey, so far as is humanly possible, the whole of the horizon of the future, and to have regard for the expansion of the commerce of his country in peace, and its defense in war. The latter must embrace not only probable enemies but all possible enemies. The greatest of all fools is he who folds his hands and supinely trusts the fate of his country to the quicksands of international good will. The siren songs of international friendship have lured many a stout ship of state upon the rocks of destruction. International friendships depend upon conditions. Change the conditions, and the friendships may vanish in a moment of time.

This is exemplified in every page of history. I cite only a few examples, and I do so without intended offense. I might begin this dissertation at the Garden of Eden and follow it down through private controversy and public war to the present day. I shall not go back that far. I will discuss only a very few of the examples of what we may term modern times.

England assisted Holland to throw off the yoke of Spain. Holland and England fought side by side; but the moment Dutch vessels menaced the commerce of England, Cromwell destroyed the Dutch fleet, swept her merchantmen from the seas, and reduced Holland to the condition of a second or third rate power. There ever since she has remained.

But, Mr. President, our own history is sufficient. France was our best friend in the war for independence. Her praises were on all American tongues. In 1793 our fathers were displaying everywhere the tricolor of France and erecting liberty poles in honor of the Revolution. France was equally fervent in her protestations of regard for the United States. There were statesmen then who thought that the bonds of friendship between the United States and France were indissoluble. But within two short years all was changed. Merely because we ventured to conclude a treaty with England, France took offense and sent her cruisers to prey upon American commerce. The American minister, Pinkney, was received with contumely and denied the right to remain on French soil. Adams declared:

The action of France ought to be repelled with a decision which shall convince her and the world that we are not a degraded people, humiliated under a colonial spirit of fear and a sense of inferiority.

The tricolor banners were destroyed, the liberty poles were cut down. The cry, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute," supplanted the words of adulation and love. The voice of the people was for war. War was actually begun and was fought out. Singularly, it was in the West Indies the Constitution and the Constellation established at the mouth of the cannon the right of America to make a treaty with any nation with which she saw fit.

In 1823 the Holy Alliance was preparing to crush the new States of South America. To this diabolic plot France, our erstwhile friend, was both party and privy. Against that conspiracy of despotism—to which, I repeat, France was a party—James Monroe hurled the defiance of the Monroe doctrine, to which I have already adverted. Only the fear of war with America and England—for England stood with us on that occasion—prevented the conquest by the tyrants of Europe of the free peoples of South America.

In 1831 France tardily agreed to pay $5,000,000 in settlement of our claims for spoliation. She failed to carry out her agreement, until at last, his patience exhausted, Jackson sent a message to Congress recommending reprisals upon French commerce. Diplomatic relations were severed and war seemed inevitable, but France yielded to the iron will of "Old Hickory."

I ventured to say the other day that the United States could collect her debts if it was made necessary, and a gasp of horror went up. A number of newspapers commented upon it as though the utterance was something unspeakable. But there was a day when all America would have responded to that sentiment, and the sentiment is still in the hearts of the American people. Of course I did not say, and do not say, that such a thing is necessary. The chief reason why it will never come is that France and the others are honorable countries and will meet their obligations as soon as they can. I only answered the argument that we were helpless if they refused to do it. I deny that we are helpless. The man who says we are is a poltroon and a coward, who has no right to live under the American flag.

Mr. President, I have reviewed the incident of 1831. Just 30 years later what happened? Thirty years runs by very rapidly. It is nearly 10 years now since the European war began.

In 1861 France, Spain, and England joined in the invasion of Mexico. They knew it was a violation of the Monroe doctrine. They knew it was a breach of friendship. They sought to take advantage of the fact that the United States was then torn by civil war, that we were temporarily weak. To them the opportunity appeared inviting to establish a new foothold on the soil of this continent and to do so in defiance of America's policy and of America's rights. France placed Maximilian on the throne of Mexico. He or his successors, under French protection, might have been there yet had our Civil War not come to an end or had it resulted in the division of this country in two republics. They might have been there yet, notwithstanding we won the war, had not Seward notified France that "friendly relations would be brought into imminent jeopardy unless France immediately retired from Mexico."

This diplomatic protest would doubtless have been inefficient had it not been backed by the dispatch of Sheridan and his army to Texas, ready to invade Mexico and to drive out the French. Coupled with the advance of Sheridan was the furnishing of 30,000 American guns to the Mexican Army. Maximilian and his Government were driven out, driven out by the menace of an American Army and by guns supplied by America. That near we came to war. Had we been weak we would have come to war.

Let us turn to England. Our experiences here are even more instructive. A long series of oppressions compelled our fathers to rebel. Our liberties, let it never be forgotten, were gained at the point of the sword.

Their story is written in blood drawn from the hearts of men who died to achieve those liberties for themselves and their posterity. But we were weak yet. In 1783 England signed with us a treaty of peace and acknowledged our complete sovereignty. Before a dozen years had passed, in 1794, England was raiding our commerce and confiscating our ships. A resolution of interdiction of all intercourse failed by the single vote of the Vice President. War seemed inevitable. It was avoided by the proclamation of John Jay, but in the treaty, made when we were young and weak and when England was strong, we were forced to accept stipulations for the throttling of our commerce; we were restricted in our right to trade with the West Indies; and we were made to agree, among other things, not to export to any part of the world molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa, or cotton, while we were to fully open our ports to Great Britain. Southern Senators will recognize in the embargo on American cotton provided in this treaty an early manifestation of British affection.

The treaty thus extorted was so infamous that John Jay was burned in effigy from Massachusetts to Georgia, and Alexander Hamilton, who undertook to defend the treaty in a speech in New York City, was stoned by an indignant crowd of Americans.

Only a few years elapsed before our rights were again outraged. Our commerce was swept from the seas. Our seamen were impressed and enslaved. The American frigate Chesapeake was attacked in the Potomac River without warning or warrant. She was totally unprepared for battle. We were at peace with Great Britain, but, nevertheless, the Chesapeake was fired upon; a number of her crew were killed; she was searched, and sailors from her decks were taken in custody and placed aboard a British man-of-war. We spoke the same language then, remember, you advocates of the ties of tongue—you who regard that as an insurance policy.

The War of 1812 ensued. We entered it unprepared. England knew we were not prepared; hence English outrages on our commerce and our rights. We had 16 warships; she had 830. We had 6,000 seamen; she had 150,000. We had an untrained Army of 7,000 men; she had vast military resources at her command. Our population was 8,000,000; hers exceeded 20,000,000.

What about the big brother idea then? The big brother idea is all right when you are the big brother but, if you are the little brother, it is wise to take note of history and warning from the past.

In the War of 1812, notwithstanding the vehement and eloquent protests previously uttered by one of her greatest statesmen, one of the greatest men in the world's history, protests against the loosing of savages upon civilized peoples, she called to her aid the redskins of the forest. At Fort Dearborn they were permitted to massacre the American troops, and they slaughtered them to the last man.

At Frenchtown, when it was taken by the Indians, wounded American soldiers were tortured and slaughtered, and this was done by the permission of General Proctor, the commander of the British forces. Here in this city, the Capitol and the White House were burned, and the Congressional Library was destroyed.

Of course American history is being rewritten now. These gentlemen who are rewriting American history and who practically say that George Washington was a traitor against a good and beneficent government are of the same crowd that preach internationalism, an abominable and treasonable doctrine, which has no more place in the soil of American patriotism than a coiled rattlesnake has upon the bosom of a sleeping man.

"Internationalism." You can not be an internationalist and a nationalist. You can not divide your allegiance between America and any other country. You are either altogether a patriot or you are half a traitor.

I do not intend to discuss that phase of the matter to-day, and I resume my discussion of our relations with Great Britain.

In the negotiations for peace, England sought to bar our national westward expansion by demanding the creation of a large buffer State, embracing the principal portions of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. That State was to be set aside for the Indians. They preferred the redskin of the forest, the barbarians who had butchered our troops and slaughtered our women, to the advance of the civilization of America and of the white man.

The treaty of peace which ended the war of 1812 was scarcely signed when British cruisers began seizing American fishing vessels. This lasted until 1818, when the rights of the fishermen were defined by a treaty which has always been regarded as an agreement in which the United States was worsted.

I pass the Oregon dispute. There may be said to be two sides to that question, but certainly there was not manifested by Great Britain any disposition to assist the United States or its people in the establishment of a great empire in America. England took all she could get, and it was only our weakness which prevented us from claiming, taking, and holding a vast stretch of territory which is now under the British flag.

The invasion of Mexico in 1861 and 1864 I have already referred to. England was party to that violation of American rights, although she withdrew because of discontent with France, for France seemed to have wanted the lion's share. Nevertheless, her attitude was as inimical to our welfare and to our doctrines as was that of France. But England, then desiring to divide this country into two small and weak republics, seeing then, as her statemen always can, into the future, that if this country became reunited, that if the American people joined hearts and hands again as they had at the first, we would in a short time become one of the powerful nations of the earth and her chief rival in all that makes for greatness, England sought to dismember this Republic, and so she opened her shipyards in violation of her solemn treaty obligations to us for the fitting out of craft to prey upon American commerce.

Singularly enough, again, those vessels, clearing from the yards of England and Scotland, went to the West Indies, where they were fitted out with guns and equipment for battle. I have no doubt that this mistress of the sea, as she loves to call herself, watched with great elation the destruction of American commerce, the capture and sinking of American ships, well knowing that if those depredations were continued at the end of that war England would be supreme upon the oceans, for America, her then great rival, would find all of her ships at the bottom of the ocean.

Let us turn a moment to the Panama Canal. In 1850 and prior thereto England had been interposing obstacles to the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States. She had seized portions of the mainland upon various pretexts. Her title was that of the highwayman, who takes goods at the point of a pistol. She set up pretended claims in Nicaragua. She asserted her dominance of the Mosquito coast. Having put forward these titles, every one of which was based upon fear and assertions of power, she demanded and extorted from us the onerous conditions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. These conditions formed the basis of the concessions which were wrung from us in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The canal, to be built on American soil, which would benefit the commerce of the world, which was one of the greatest undertakings ever conceived in the brain of man for the benefit of the world, England obstructed. She insisted that she should have, if not a dominant, at least a tremendous interest in the canal, which was 3,000 miles from her own shores. It was because of the conditions written into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we were obliged to make or did make the concessions under which England demanded that we should not charge tolls to any foreign ships unless we exacted similar tolls from American ships—a concession which we made and which I think was rather foolish.

We made that concession by repealing the canal tolls act at the demand of Great Britain. How serious that dispute was I do not know, for all the light we ever got on the question was in the statement of the President, which I think I can quote literally: "I shall not know how to deal with other delicate questions unless you ungrudgingly grant this request or grant me this power." So there must have been some pressure exercised, and as the pressure only could have been applied by Great Britain, we may well understand it was of a serious character.

Mr. President, who here has forgotten the Venezuela incident? There are none here so young, I think, that they do not remember it. I know of no better way to present it than to read the impartial account in Mr. LODGE's History of the United States:

An incident of Mr. Olney's diplomacy which attracted wide attention was that growing out of the Venezuelan affair. A long-standing dispute had existed between Great Britain and Venezuela concerning the western boundary of British Guiana. Venezuela had repeatedly offered to submit the dispute to arbitration, and the United States had again and again tendered its good offices to bring about a fair and peaceful settlement of the controversy, but without avail. The insistence of the British Government upon a westward extension of the Guiana boundary seemed to the Venezuelans a wanton aggression upon their sovereignty and a violation of the Monroe doctrine, which had been uniformly interpreted as denying the right of any European power to acquire by force new territorial possessions on this hemisphere or to extend their dominions. They therefore called upon the Government of the United States to support Venezuela in its attitude, and at the same time uphold one of its own cherished traditions. In the summer of 1895 Mr. Olney inquired of the British Government whether it was willing to submit the controversy to arbitration, saying that Great Britain's action was in effect an aggression upon Venezuelan territory. The premier, Lord Salisbury, in reply, declared that the dispute could not be submitted to arbitration, and asserted that the Monroe doctrine was not a part of the "code of international law"—

And he did that in a very offensive way, let me say, too—

that the Monroe doctrine was not a part of the code of international law, nor did it have any applicability to the present question; was, in fact, inapplicable "to the state of things in which we live at the present day."

When Lord Salisbury's answer was received President Cleveland sent in a message (December 17, 1895) which startled the whole country and brought the two great English-speaking peoples of the world to the verge of war.

The message created consternation in financial circles.

Notice this, you internationalists who follow international bankers and get your cue from those who speculate in international securities. Of course, there are none in the Senate. I am talking to those outside. I continue reading from Mr. LODGE's history:

The message created consternation in financial circles, it being estimated that stocks and other securities in the United States fell from $500,000,000 to $300,000,000. In this message Mr. Cleveland asserted that the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine, as he understood it, was "important to our safety as a Nation," "essential to the integrity of our free institutions, and was intended to apply to every stage of our national life, and could not become obsolete while our Republic endures."

Mr. LODGE's history contains this comment:

This vigorous statement was applauded by the people generally, but the money interests of New York especially were alarmed because they thought that Mr. Cleveland had unsettled values, something in their eyes more important than international policy, no matter how vital.

The leopard has not changed his spots nor the Ethiopian his skin nor the banker his conscience. I am speaking of the international bankers, some of whom would to-day sell their country's honor for profits in international bonds just as they were willing to denounce Cleveland as detailed in Mr. LODGE's history.

Now, if I were to say of the money interests of New York what Mr. LODGE said in his history everybody would say, "That is another Missouri radical," but the words come from the pen of the illustrious statesman from Massachusetts, who is always noted not only for his high intelligence but for his judicial poise of mind.

The historian continues—

Congress, forgetful of party differences, with singular unanimity passed an act embodying the President's recommendations with regard to the creation of a commission. At this remarkable exhibition of American sentiment Lord Salisbury gave way and consented to submit the question to arbitration.

Not until we had taken the steps which indicated we would fight did they conclude to arbitrate.

Ultimately award was made sustaining in part the British claim, under the principle—of prescription that 50 years' actual occupation gives title to the claimant—

Of what?—

It is strange doctrine as applied to an undeveloped country such as Nicaragua and the Mosquito Coast, or the country Great Britain was trying to seize from Venezuela, that 50 years of occupancy by a few men sent into a vast domain as hunters or fishers should take the title away from a country. The author, in discussing this settlement and relating its effect, continues—but securing to Venezuela the mouths of the Orinoco, which was the main point in importance. Thus, although Great Britain had won much so far as the question of territory between her and Venezuela was concerned, the United States had carried its point completely and a new and more potent meaning had been given to the Monroe doctrine.

Henceforth no one could question the dominant position of the United States on this hemisphere. One effect of the Venezuelan affair was to turn the eyes of the people of Great Britain and the United States toward arbitration as a means of settling disputes.

Mr. President, I have called attention to these historic incidents relating to our controversies with France and Great Britain not for the purpose of stirring anew any embers of dislike or ill will. Such a purpose is farthest from my heart. I desire the good will of France and the good will of England as I desire the good will for our country of every great nation and of every great people.

I offer these illustrations merely for the purpose of shattering, if I may, the glass house in which some statesmen live who imagine we are secure because at the present moment friendly relations exist, hugging to their bosoms the delusion that friendships now existing are solid guaranties of friendships in the future. Mr. President, what I have said and what I am about to say illustrate the fact that in international morals the maxim is "Friendship ceases when there is conflict of interest." The whole story of the world bears that out. It is a picture of nations fighting side by side one day as allies and fighting against each other the next day as antagonists; it is a picture of solemn conventions and treaties signed and sealed, and Almighty God called as a witness, whilst at the very moment the instrument is being signed plans are in preparation looking toward a possible modification of the conditions; and the next day or the next year often finds the nations which were locked in the embrace of love struggling in the throes of deadly conflict. I repeat, nations are governed by their interests, and recent illustrations corroborate my statement.

Down at the southern end of the Continent of Africa were two little Republics. Over many weary miles the Boers had trekked in order that they might establish in the wilderness a home where they could be independent and prosperous. They sought neither aid nor interference; they lived the free life of the valleys; they were as free a people as there were in the world; theirs was a plain, homely, wholesome life; they were devout worshipers of our God and of England's God; and yet no candid reader of history can doubt that England deliberately struck down the Boer Republics because she desired to control the commerce of that part of the world and because she desired the lands for their strategic value in time of war. There were gold and diamond fields there, and her objects were gold and land and power.

What did the Boer gain as he stood and protested in the name of the god of liberty? What sympathy did he secure as he stood at the door of his house with his wife and children behind him and defended his right to live under the free skies and to enjoy the beneficence of Almighty God? He received bullets in his body and bayonets in his heart.

What did the United States do? We held public meetings of protest; we passed resolutions of sympathy; but at the same time we sold Great Britain all the mules she needed to drag her deadly artillery across the veldts of South Africa to deal death to the gallant defenders of hearth and home. We were governed by self-interest.

Turn, again, to recent events. England and Germany had long been friends. The German Kaiser and the British King were blood cousins. The families were married and intermarried until the strains of their blood crossed and intercrossed so that they could scarcely longer be traced. They professed a deathless love each for the other. The German Kaiser came to visit the English King. They rushed into each other's loving arms and kissed each other like schoolgirls meeting after a long separation or like lovers reunited. But when the interests of their countries collided, when policies came into conflict, when German traders began to invade the markets of the world and German armies began to be massed in great power, England made a secret treaty with France—scarce a treaty, an entente, an understanding by letter—and all the protestations of the past, all the loving phrases and sacred pledges that had been upon the lips of the monarchs of those two nations disappeared in the first puff of smoke from the cannon's mouth.

Rumania, Bulgaria, the other Balkan States, had been the beneficiaries of the protection of Russia for a century of time. It was largely because of Russia's influence and assistance that the Turk was finally compelled to release his grip upon the throats of the Balkan States, including Rumania and Bulgaria. They were bound, therefore, to Russia's interest in any contest by every consideration of gratitude. Rumania, however, was bound to the Central Powers by an alliance; yet when the war ensued, and Rumania thought it to her advantage, she broke her alliance, she violated her treaty, and she joined with the enemies of her allies to whom she had sworn brotherhood.

Bulgaria, the immediate recipient of Russian help through a century of time, did not hesitate, when she considered it to her interest, to cast her lot against Russia, and to join with the Central Powers in their effort to overwhelm and conquer Russia.

Italy was bound to Germany and Austria and Turkey by a solemn agreement. She was to be their friend and their ally and stand by them in case they were attacked. She took a year to consider the question; and then, with German statesmen and British statesmen each standing like wealthy suitors bidding for the hand of a lady, bidding for her favor and offering, each of them, advantages to Italy, when Italy determined which side of the balance was heavier, which would most advantage her, which would get her the most territory, which would leave her strongest as a State, Italy cast her sword in the balance as against her broken promise and her plighted faith.

I think there is a more tragic illustration than all this. Russia had been the ally of France and of England and of Italy, and she became likewise our ally by our entrance into the war. I know not how many windrows of dead Russians are piled across the battle fields of Europe. However, the number of individuals is estimated at from 6,000,000 to 9,000,000. Half armed and half supported, these mighty hosts swept forward to their death. The soldiers were marched upon the field so equipped that but one man in three was possessed of a rifle. It was the business of the other two to stand until the man with the rifle was killed and, if they had survived, to pick up the rifle and carry on the fight. Such a condition would have broken the spirit, the morale, of an army of Spartans, would have broken the spirit of Thermopylæ, for there the Greeks died with sword and shield, not as naked creatures to be butched. So, her spirit broken, Russia ventured to withdraw, but she did not join her enemies. She withdrew to heal her own wounds. Whatsoever method she sought for that healing was not our business; and yet, sir, the troops that had stood and received the fire of the Germans in long and bloody campaigns through long and bloody years, troops that had drawn that fire and left the English and French relieved to that extent, now found themselves facing those same French and British troops, supplemented, let it be said to our eternal shame, by American troops!

The balance of interest had shifted. It had been concluded, somehow or other, that the interests of our country lay in conquering Russia and imposing our will upon her; and the moment that occurred, without act of Congress to justify it, without act of the British Parliament, so far as I know—but I care nothing about that—it is enough that our troops and those of Great Britain and France moved onto the soil of Russia.

Hence, Mr. President, I repeat, the lesson of all history is that nations are governed by their great and vital interests as they conceive them, and that as those interests change the weather vane of friendship shifts.

But we have a more recent illustration. Who would have said four years ago, when the armies of France and of England were joined under one commander, and that commander a Frenchman, when the troops were intermingled in the trenches, when English and Americans and French were standing side by side, when they were charging over the shell-torn fields, when they were fighting for each other and dying for each other, when their blood was mingling in one common stream, that out of that blood-soaked dust there would not be made a cement that would bind the French and British people forever into one common destiny, inspired by common love? But a dispute arises as to how much money France shall take from Germany. England signed a treaty with France agreeing on the means for the ascertainment of the reparations. The reparations were ascertained in accordance with the treaty, and France stands demanding that which Great Britain said when she signed the treaty she should have. But conditions have changed. Great Britain does not now regard it to her interest that the Germans should be pressed to extremity, and so we find the bonds are severed. How wide the breach will become we can not say, but this much we do know, that he, I repeat, is a fool indeed who trusts the fate of his country to the transient friendships which may exist between nations and peoples.

I do not want to say aught which could be construed into a justification of what France is doing or in criticism of her. I do not know the facts. With the amount of British propaganda that is going forth in this country daily from the press, with the amount of money that is being expended, I am no more certain that we know the truth now than that we knew the truth before we entered the last Great War. I do know there are in this country financial influences to-day which would do to our country to-day what they were willing to do in the Venezuelan controversy, as LODGE's history recites. They were willing then to sacrifice American honor and American principle in order that the stock ticker might tell a pleasant story to their ears, and they are willing now to cancel American debts if thereby the bonds they hold shall go to a hundred cents or to a premium. But I have seen none of these gentlemen who advocate the cancellation of the debts of America, which is another way of canceling the debts due the general American people, I have seen none of them propose to cancel the debts they own and which are represented by the bonds in their private boxes.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss that theme to-day. I return to the proposition that these islands, now held by Great Britain and by France—our friends to-day, let us hope our friends to-morrow—are not essential to their welfare. They are of but slight value except as points from which America might be attacked; and if these countries propose to maintain toward us an eternal friendship, then they will never need the islands for the purpose of attacking us.

If they love us as they so vehemently claim, if they trust us as they ask us to trust them, then these islands, lying in American waters near our coast, commanding the canal which we built and which we must protect, naturally belong under the American flag. If these nations really mean the friendship which their lips proclaim, if their hearts are as warm with sentiments of affection and confidence as the words of their pens picture, then I ask, why should they not cede these islands to the United States of America?

You who have recently voted the contract which gives them 3 and 3½ per cent interest, where they are now bound to pay 5, which makes a difference, if the contract shall run for 62 years, of twenty-seven thousand million dollars; you who have yielded the benefits of this contract because of your confidence in the love of these foreign nations for this country; you who are willing to tax the American farmer and business man and laborer 4½ per cent to pay the interest upon our bonds given to secure this money, while you release Great Britain, by permitting them to pay only 3 per cent, the amount I have indicated; you who protest that kind of love, will you not join with me now in asking a little of a reciprocity of affection, a little of a mutuality of love, a little of the exchange of benefits?

I have talked of this question at great length, sometimes, I am sorry to say, having wandered slightly from the theme, yet in the main following it, because I want the Senate and the American people to give consideration to what I believe to be the most important matter we have had to settle in our lifetime as a nation, some great question of war excepted. I have talked of it, hoping that we might get a vote upon this resolution at this session; but feeling, if that vote can not be taken, that at least the words I have so poorly spoken may, nevertheless, serve to arouse a sentiment in the hearts of our people which will ultimately result in securing the complete dominance of the United States over all of these outlying islands, so that we shall be secure against the attacks of enemies from these islands as bases, so that the benefits of our civilization, our trade, and our broader and more humane policies may fall upon the unfortunate inhabitants of these islands of the western Atlantic.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate.

APPENDIX.

ISLE OF PINES.

The 50 miles' sail to the Isle of Pines from Batabano on the south coast of Cuba is through waters so shallow and clear that the coral sea floor with all its bright-colored marine vegetation, over which gorgeously tinted fish and great sharks dart and glide, is in full view. Between the islands around about Batabano the sea water has a clouded and milklike appearance, so marked that Columbus, in one of his voyages of discovery, bottled some of it to take home and show King Ferdinand. Outside these islets the Caribbean Sea is deeply blue, almost a sapphire shade, blending imperceptibly into the coloring of the sky, the latter, however, being constantly filled with light, fluffy masses of snow-white, drifting clouds that make the patches of blue sky seen between them seem even bluer by contrast.

Heretofore the Isle of Pines has been associated in many people's mind with land sales, citrus fruit growing, and other industries of the soil, and it has signified but little to them. The Isle of Pines had not then come to its own, and it suffered the neglect of obscurity. To-day, however, the little island is quietly taking its place as one of the coming winter resorts. And for this reason a splendid, absolutely modern hotel has just been opened in Nueva Gerona, where all the conveniences of a metropolitan hotel, except the surroundings, are available, and Santa Fé, an idyllic spot, is well to the fore and will shortly count further additions to its hostelries.

Progress has impressed its mark on every foot of ground around the several prosperous colonies in the northern half of the island, so that one sees on every hand extensive groves of oranges, grapefruit, limes, etc., in fine condition, and field after field of the luscious pineapple; but it is its wonderful climate, and the unquestioned salubrity of the island, that is really making a name for it.

The Isle of Pines abounds in a great variety of means for outdoor life and sport, and its waters afford splendid fishing, which includes the famous tarpon (the silver king), red snapper, cherna, blue fish, and numerous other game fish.

Sea bathing is enjoyed safely all the year round at the beaches of Bibijagua and Nueva Gerona, and motor launching and canoeing on the beautiful Casas River is a pastime popular with many residents and visitors, for which launches may be hired at reasonable rates in Nueva Gerona.

It is an ideal place for the automobiles. There are 100 miles of excellent highways, connecting all the important colonies, and there are nearly 100 more of good by-roads, many of which are simply broadened trails worn through the great fragrant pine forests, but which are ideal for automobiles, nevertheless, as the soil packs hard and no ruts are formed. It is estimated that there are over 100 automobiles on the island, and this number is being constantly augmented.

There are 4,850 registered American property owners and over 2,000 actual American residents and settlers in the Isle of Pines, the total population of which is a little short of 5,000, so that it is no wonder it has become overwhelmingly American in all its leading characteristics, and that tourists from the United States feel entirely at home as soon as they arrive there. The island is now dotted with charming bungalows and handsome residences of wealthy Americans who spend their winters in its superb climate.

There are many springs of mineral waters, chiefly magnesia, all over the island, much of which is bottled and enjoys great fame and an enormous sale throughout Cuba. In fact, mineral water to-day constitutes the principal item of the exports of the island.

Many social and other clubs have been formed at the various colonies, and there is a healthy rivalry for preeminence among the districts which produces satisfactory results in the way of general progress. Fairs and expositions at one town or another are not infrequent events, and the annual exhibition held in the town of Santa Fe early in the month of February is an institution of recognized merit and prestige, and is well worth visiting to see its splendid exhibits of fruit and produce grown in the island.

Communication with the Isle of Pines is effected by the American-owned steamer Cristobal Colon, which plies between Batabano and the island. This steamer was especially built for this service and is in every way up to date; the staterooms all have running water and are cool and comfortable. Three trips a week are made, and the passengers may leave Habana on the evening of Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, by taking the train to Batabano, which leaves the new central station at 6.10 p. m., and reach Nueva Gerona early the next morning. There are, perhaps, few other trips in the world so delightful as the one from Batabano to the Isle of Pines, especially on a moonlight night. The calm tropical sea, over which there is always a gentle, cool breeze blowing, and the brilliant constellations overhead glistening brightly in the clear atmosphere of the Tropics, make the night on deck so seductive that, no matter how cool and comfortable the staterooms may be, one feels that the open deck on this occasion provides a rare chapter in life.

[From the New York Evening Mail, Wednesday, April 9, 1913.]

ISLE OF PINES BELONGS TO UNITED STATES—WAS DESIGNATED AS AMERICAN TERRITORY ON THE OFFICIAL MAPS IN M'KINLEY'S TIME.

The status of the Isle of Pines seems to be generally misunderstood, as indeed it is to an extent uncertain. Nine men out of ten believe to-day that the little island belongs to Cuba, but having been settled by Americans it has become Americanized to such a degree as to make annexation desired.

The fact of the matter is that the Isle of Pines is a United States possession. By the treaty of Paris Spain ceded the island to this country, and on all the official maps of the United States it was so designated during the McKinley administration.

When the Cuban Republic was established the Isle of Pines was omitted from its constitutional boundaries. The only claim that Cuba has ever had to the property is one of proximity and possession and the fact that it was first settled by Cubans. Indeed, eight years ago a treaty was negotiated surrendering the island to Cuba, but the United States Senate has refused to ratify, and the treaty is still pending in that body.

The dispatches recently announced a bitter state of feeling among the anti-American element in Cuba on account of a petition which has been circulated among the residents of the Isle of Pines asking the President and the Senate to take such action as may be required to make their island permanently a possession of the United States. This is far from annexation. The country is already ours by every shadow of legal and moral right, and the fact that the Cuban Government assumed jurisdiction in 1901 does not alter the situation in the slightest degree.

The Isle of Pines was enough of an American possession to warrant American citizens investing there. The War Department encouraged them in this respect. The largest single American colony outside of the United States is now located there. It has a population of about 4,000 to only 1,000 Cubans, who work for the American landholders. And yet the Cubans are the only persons allowed to exercise the right of franchise. Strangely enough, the sovereignty is vested in the peon class, while those who have the larger interests have no say in the affairs of the local government.

The present administration, if its policy is voiced in the Baltimore platform, gives little promise of living up to the traditions and history of the Democratic Party in respect to territorial enlargement. Every addition to the United States from 1803 to 1867 came to us under a Democratic administration. The Bryan program, however, is against anything that savors of enlargement, and it is doubtful if the Americans on the Isle of Pines will be able to get much help from Washington. However, this is not a question of imperialism—of annexation—of colony grabbing; but of protecting or abandoning a colony of American citizens who have been turned over to the political control of an alien people who have not shown the slightest capacity for governing themselves. POLICY REGARDING RUSSIA.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume our friends who are anxious to see the pending bill become a law are interested in having some cargoes for the ships after they have been induced to put to sea. I am much more interested in finding something to put on the ships than I am in the subsidy. There are idle ships in every port in the world for want of cargo to carry. The most vital problem which we can have for consideration is the method or the policy by means of which possibly we may open the markets and find goods to carry, or create a demand which will induce the carriage.

I shall discuss at this time a subject which the friends of the measure may not be willing to admit bears directly upon the question, but certainly it bears on it, at least indirectly. It is certainly of much concern to those who are interested in reopening the markets of Europe to the products which are now a surplus upon our hands.

Upon the 17th day of March, 1917, the last of the Romanoffs abdicated. Immediately thereafter was formed what was known as the provisional government of Russia. That continued until about November 7, 1917, when the Kerensky government or the provisional government was supplanted by what has since been known as the Soviet Government of Russia. That Government has now been in existence going on six years—will have been in existence six years in the coming November.

The policy of the Allies and associated powers toward Russia is incomprehensible except upon the theory that it was thought wise to force back upon the Russian people the rule of the old régime or else dismember and break up Russia into small States. If this or either of these was the policy of the Allies, the course which has been pursued for the last three or four years is indeed understandable. Otherwise it is to me incomprehensible.

Upon the 8th day of January, 1918, the President of the United States made this announcement:

> The evacuation of all Russian territories (as one of the conditions in the settlement of the war) and a settlement of all Russian questions such as to insure the best and most untrammeled cooperation of other nations of the world in order to afford Russia a clear and precise opportunity for the independent settlement of her autonomous political development and of her national policy, promising here a cordial welcome in the League of Nations under institutions of her own choice, and, besides a cordial welcome, help and assistance in all that she may need and require. The treatment meted out to Russia by the sister nations in the months to come must be a decisive proof of their good will, of their understanding of her needs as apart from their own interests, and of their intelligent and disinterested sympathy.

So far as that outlined a policy upon the part of this Government toward Russia, it seemed to me at the time to state a sound proposition, and it seems to me to be equally sound at the present time—to permit Russia to work out a system of government of her own choosing, to enable her to adopt such policies and pursue such course, so far as her internal affairs are concerned, as the people of Russia, however expressed, might choose. Why that policy has been changed or why it has undergone such a radical departure from the original announcement I am unable to state. I am very thoroughly satisfied, however, that in so far as we have departed it has been error upon our part. I am equally satisfied that should we have pursued a different course than the course which was there outlined the conditions in Russia and the conditions with reference to Russia and the other nations of Europe and the world would have been very much more satisfactory than they are at the present time.

But a little different course prevailed. Immediately after the signing of the armistice there began a rigid, persistent blockade of Russia. It might have been designed to bring about a change of government in Russia. It might have been intended for this or that purpose. I hesitate to say that it was intended as a matter of punishment. But whatever the design and whatever the purpose, it accomplished nothing within the realm of reason or justice in international affairs. Instead of weakening, it strengthened those who were in control of affairs in Russia. Instead of undermining, it strengthened the Bolshevists. Instead of punishing those whom it might be supposed it was thought proper to punish, it punished those who were perfectly helpless to protect themselves. It visited untold misery and suffering upon the masses of the Russian people. Even hospital ships were denied admission to the ports of Russia, a thing indefensible from the standpoint of policy or humanitarianism. It was a cruel, ruthless, futile policy, without conscience or common sense behind it.

After the policy with reference to the blockade came the organization of invasion of Russia by outside powers. The forces of Kolchak and of Wrangel and of Denikin were munitioned and financed by outside powers, by those who had been associated with Russia or with whom Russia had been associated only a short time before. These men represented, in the estimation of the Russian people, the old régime. The peasantry, the masses of Russia, looked upon Kolchak and Wrangel as representatives of the old Czar rule, and that their admission to power or the placing of them in power would be but another way of calling back the old rule. So they failed in their purpose; but while they failed to obtain control of affairs in Russia the invasion succeeded in adding demoralization to the Russian situation and greater and deeper misery to the Russian people. Wide spaces of territory were laid waste. War was again pushed upon a people who had been in war for years, and it would be difficult to calculate the great evil brought to the Russian people by reason of those invasions or attacks munitioned and supplied by outside powers.

The result of the policies thus pursued is at the present time bearing fruit in a way that no one could wish to have it. If the policies which have been pursued should finally ripen into what is now indicated, an understanding or combination between Germany and Russia, and possibly Islam, it would present a condition of affairs quite as serious, so far as the peace of the world is concerned, as that which was presented in August, 1914. If the discliplining and organizing power of Germany should unite with the man power of Russia, and the two should be aided by the fanaticism of Islam, it would present as serious a situation as ever confronted Europe in its entire history. And yet that is the legitimate fruit of the policies which have obtained with reference to both Russia and Germany, one of them dealt with as an outlaw by all the nations who were dominant upon the side of the Allies, and the other dealt with in a way which naturally, as Lloyd-George said at Genoa, has bound them together in bonds of despair, and there they are at the present time.

I read a paragraph from an editorial in the Brooklyn Eagle of a few days since:

[From the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.]

FROM ESSEN TO RUSSIA.

While the French were completing their plans for the seizure of Essen the Krupp firm closed a contract with the Soviet Government for the peaceful invasion of Russia. In the most important concession yet issued by the Lenin-Trotski administration the Krupps obtained the right to exploit some 250,000 acres of rich agricultural land in southwestern Russia which was an appanage of the Russian Crown.

The Krupps are sending to Russia a staff of technicians provided with the most modern agricultural machinery. The machines are of the tractor type. They are being turned out in factories which supplied German tanks during the war. The Krupps propose to create a model farm, operated on the most scientific principles. After some wrangling the Soviet Government has conceded the right to export from Russia whatever this land can be made to produce.

And while the French are destroying Germany's capacity to pay with their bootless invasion of the Ruhr the Russo-Asiatic Bank is supplying British capital with the consent of the British Government in order that the Krupps may develop this new market for their merchandise.

Russia's huge land areas have never been properly exploited. The Germans have the agricultural experts and the plants to produce machines which could quintuple Russian production in a decade. The British are wise enough to realize that here is an ideal field for German development. It creates the markets for their manufactured products which they must have; it supplies them with a part of the food they must purchase abroad; it provides no cutthroat competition in existing world markets.

The editorial is based upon news dispatches which had preceded it several days, which disclosed the fact that those two great people were coming together, combining the respective powers, the natural resources and the man power of the one, the technical knowledge and the disciplining of the other, a thing which it was known to have been taking place for the last two years, although strenuously and repeatedly denied in this country. Does anyone look upon such a condition of affairs without the deepest apprehension?

I now read a news paragraph from the New York Times of January 15, 1923:

Rantzeau's ideas have a practical importance. He sees Russia and Germany in a position to help each other. Germany needs food, which she can only buy with gold or goods. Having no gold she must give goods, which automatically bars her from American or British—including the British colonies—markets. But next fall, with average weather, Russia will have upward of 8,000,000 tons of grain surplus. And Russia has terrible need of German goods, for which she, too, can not give gold, but only grain.

Already an arrangement has been concluded between Russia and Germany whereby the former will export immediately from Odessa 30,000 tons of rye in return for German goods. After the harvest the Russians are planning exchange on a huge scale which such optimists as Sokolonikoff, minister of finance, claim will enable them to balance the soviet budget.

On paper the scheme looks excellent. Its mechanism is as follows: After the harvest the Russian peasants have a surplus of, say, 8,000,000 tons. Suppose 2,000,000 thereof are earmarked for export to Germany. Of course under the new policy it is not the property of the Russian Government, but of the peasant cooperatives, acting for the individual peasant owners. But the cooperatives will intrust the sale in Germany to the bureau of foreign trade. This is one of the chief reasons why this monopoly has been retained despite general criticism.

This is not, as I intimated a moment ago, a new development by any means. Those who have undertaken to watch the effect of the policy of the Allies toward Russia have known for the last two and one-half years that those two great powers were coming together—driven together. It is not a natural combination; it is not a natural condition of affairs. Some antipathies and some antagonisms of more than ordinary moment had to be overcome. The true policy, the wise policy would have preserved the friendship which had long existed between the Russian people and the people of the United States and would have preserved our friendly relations with that power which is now being driven by reason of this condition of affairs into alliance with other nations.

I call attention to a pargraph or two from an article which appeared in L'Echo de Paris, a clerical daily, published in France on March 8, 1922, which reads as follows:

* * * early as 1919, to make overtures for business relations with the Soviet Government.

And we ought to bear in mind as we go along that one of the reasons assigned for our failure to do business with Russia is because it was unsafe as a business proposition—

She believed that, although the chaos in Russia might prevent her realizing at once her ultimate political projects in that country, she might open a profitable market there for her manufactures, that would be paid for in gold, precious stones, and the raw materials that Russia still had in stock. It was with this object in view that Germany sent an investigating committee to that country.

* * * * * * *

after February, 1921, there was rapid progress. From this month, in fact, dates the resumption of commercial intercourse between German and Soviet Russia. On the 18th of February a protocol was signed at Moscow by representatives of the German foreign office and of the Soviet foreign office to regulate provisionally relations between the two countries. Commercial delegations were to be attached to the delegations already established at Moscow and Berlin in order to insure free intercourse between the two nations. Among other things, this agreement regulated passports and visés required of citizens of either country when traveling in the other. It guaranteed the inviolability of the property of Germans who might settle in Russia, with the permission of the soviet authorities, in order to engage in business there.

Again, says the article:

On the 11th of January the Rosta, or official Russian telegraph bureau, announced that after the 6th of that month the German National Bank and the Dresden Bank had agreed to recognize the drafts of the Soviet National Bank. At the same time the Soviet National Bank directed its representatives in Berlin to deposit several million marks with the German National Bank. The same day the Soviet National Bank drew its first check against the German National Bank for 15,000,000 marks. Thus, after an interruption of more than seven years, banking relations were restored between Russia and Germany.

The first fruit gathered from this policy, therefore, is the coming together of these two great powers. If they were associating themselves together as friendly nations would ordinarily do, having no antagonism and no reason for antagonism with other nations, it would be a very desirable thing to see; but when we realize, Mr. President, that they are brought together, in a large measure, by reason of the policy obtaining against both of those powers, thereby creating a certain state of mind upon the part of these vast peoples, it presents an entirely different aspect and one not at all desirable. I say it is the fruit of this narrow-visioned, intolerant policy—a policy which has borne no fruit save that of hunger, misery, estrangement, and may now be conducive to war. I challenge anyone to point to one single advantage, to one benefit, to one fruitful gathering from this policy. It has been a vindictive policy, and such policies are always barren of good results. My interest in this question from the beginning has been not that of recognition of the soviet government because of any sympathy with the principles upon which that government may be founded, nor, indeed, because I believed it would ever in its present form or in the form which first obtained ultimately succeed; but leaving that for them to work out for themselves, the wiser policy, it seemed to me, after the war had closed, was to hold the friendliest possible relations, considering our interests, with this great nation and also with Germany.

Think for a moment of the country which has been outlawed; its population; what it means among the nations of the world and its place among the family of nations as a power when measured by its population and its natural resources. There are in Russia 140,000,000 people—a very industrious, law-abiding, home-loving people, so far as 95 per cent of them are concerned—a people holding the utmost friendliness toward the people of the United States and toward this Government. Russia has an area of 8,166,130 square miles, and, including Kiva and Bokhara, her area is 8,273,130 square miles.

Continental United States has only 3,026,789 square miles, and, including all our territory, continental and insular, 3,743,510—a little less than half the area of a people who are now outlaws among the nations of the world. It can not be a healthy condition of affairs; and if there is a possible way of avoiding such a condition it is our highest duty, in the interest of peace and in the interest of the restoration of sane economic conditions throughout Europe and the world, to avoid it. It can not be other than a menace to the peace of the entire world that a vast people, with vast natural resources and undoubtedly a great future, are outlawed among the nations. Prior to the war Russia comprised one-sixth of the entire land surface of the globe, and her mineral and timber wealth constituted the greatest undeveloped natural resources in the world.

Mr. President, I can understand why it is to the interest of certain powers in Europe to retard the development of Russia. It is not an interest with which I could have any possible sympathy; but, nevertheless, it is such an interest as has predominated to a marked degree in the foreign policies of European nations. I can understand why powers would organize to finance Denekine and Wrangel to break up and destroy the Russian Government or else restore the old régime, but that ought not to be a policy with which the United States could have any possible sympathy. It is not in the interest of humanity and it is certainly not in the interest of the material welfare of the people either of Russia or of the United States.

There seems to be a popular belief—I do not assume, of course, that it obtains in the State Department—that in recognizing a government we, in a measure, approve of the form of government which the people of that government may have at the time of the recognition. I have received an abundance of letters from people of more or less intelligence which say the recognition of Russia would set the stamp of approval by the United States upon that particular form of government which the Russian people are said at this time to have. Such recognition is not an approval or a disapproval of the form of government; it is a recognition of the fact that they have a government.

It it not an approval of their form of government, any more than our recognition of Turkey to-day is an approval of the Turkish form of government or of her acts under it. We, finding a people with a government which they have established, recognize as a fact that a government has been established and invite them to become members of the family of nations by the act of recognition.

Woolsey, in his International Law, says:

> The question of a State's right to exist is an internal one, to be decided by those within its borders who belong to its organization. To bring the question before external powers not only destroys sovereignty but must either produce perpetual war or bring on the despotism of some one strong nation or strong confederacy of nations, requiring all others to conform their constitutions to the will of these tyrants.
> If a nation, or set of nations, should act on the plan of withholding their sanction from new nations with certain constitutions, such a plan would justify others who thought differently in refusing to regard the former any longer as legitimate States.

If we should decline to recognize Russia because of her form of government, and should carry that principle into practice, it would necessarily require us to refuse recognition to or withdraw recognition from several nations which I might name.

So far, therefore, as the government from an internal standpoint is concerned, outside of the relationship which it may have with the governments of the earth in its foreign affairs, it is not of the slightest concern to the people of the United States or to the Government of the United States what kind of a government it is. If we shall find in this discussion that, notwithstanding its form of government, it is prepared to discharge its obligations to the other nations of the world, to meet the relationship, and in good faith to discharge the obligations which rest upon it, it is, I say, not of the slightest concern to us what their particular form of government may be.

We are inclined, Mr. President, to forget. Our memories are short. It has not been very long in the life of nations, as we measure the life of nations, since the representatives of this Republic were pathetically hunting their way about the courts of Europe, and being rejected for the same reason that is assigned here—that the young Republic was not prepared to meet its obligations or discharge its duties toward the other nations of the world. Think of Franklin and Jay and Adams going about the courts of Europe, almost kicked from pillar to post, and told that "You have no government. Your obligations we can not expect to be carried out. Your treaties will not be fulfilled." Such were the circumscribed and such was the faith of great powers who looked upon the formation of a great, free government.

John Fiske, in that perfectly fascinating volume in which he recounts what he calls the critical period of American history, has a paragraph which it may not be out of place to read:

> Jefferson, at Paris, was told again and again that it was useless for the French Government to enter into any agreement with the United States, as there was no certainty that it would be fulfilled on our part—

That is, on the part of the United States—> and the same things were said all over Europe. * * * We were bullied by England, insulted by France and Spain, and looked askance at in Holland. The humiliating position in which our ministers were placed by the beggarly poverty of Congress was something almost beyond credence. It was by no means unusual for the superintendent of finance, when hard pushed for money, to draw upon our foreign ministers and then sell the drafts for cash. This was not only not unusual; it was an established custom. It was done again and again when there was not the smallest ground for supposing that the minister upon whom the draft was made would have any funds wherewith to meet it. He must go and beg for money. That was part of his duty as envoy, to solicit loans without security for a government that could not raise enough money by taxation to defray its current expenses.

Mr. President, I hope we have heard enough about the fact that after six years this government in Russia is unable to meet its obligations; that it has no money; that it may any day fall or fall by the wayside. That is not a matter, under present conditions and circumstances, which ought to weigh in the least.

The preponderating, controlling, dominating fact is that there is a government which has had an existence for nearly six years, performing all the duties and obligations of a government.

What is the first test of a government? It is to keep order at home, and then to deal honorably with foreign powers. Life and property are just as secure to-night in Petrograd and Moscow as in New York or Chicago. The laws of that country are as thoroughly enforced, so far as the protection of human life is concerned, as in any country in Europe. It is true they passed through the cruel, bloody period which characterizes revolution ever and always, for which no man would even attempt to make an apology. They passed through a period characteristic of all great revolutions, and there never has been a revolution upon such a stupendous scale as this; but at the present time and for months and months past they are meeting the supreme test of a government, and that is the protection of property and of life, notwithstanding the venal and corrupt propaganda which is constantly being sent out in this country.

To give you an idea, if I may turn to it hastily, about the manner in which this cause is repeatedly presented to us, Captain Estes, in making a speech a few nights ago in the city of New York before the Republican Club, stated, according to the press dispatch, as follows:

> Capt. W. B. Estes, who was kept in a soviet jail in Moscow for a year during the World War, declared that to his certain knowledge there is in New York banks to the credit of the Lenin-Trotski government $540,000,000.

He said:

> New York banks held at least $180,000,000 in gold while I was locked up in jail, and the deposits are three times that sum now. The most of it is with Kuhn, Loeb & Co. and the Guaranty Trust Co., although many other banks have heavy deposits. Much of it is in old Russian gold rubles.

The intention undoubtedly was to disclose that Lenin and Trotski were not only tyrants but were also engaged in robbing their people, pushing their money out of the country which they were wrecking, so that in the hour of escape they would have something with which to take care of themselves. It has been repeatedly circulated over this country that this was true and that they were engaged not in an attempt, however unwisely from our viewpoint, to construct a government but in holding power for a sufficient length of time to enable them to take care of themselves financially in proper fashion. I thought, in view of the fact that Captain Estes had mentioned the firms, that we might indeed find out whether they had the money on hand. I telegraphed to these two banks as follows:

Are you free to state to me the facts concerning the statement of Captain Estes relative to Lenin-Trotski government having large deposits in your bank?

Kuhn, Loeb & Co. replied:

We are in receipt of your telegraphic inquiry. We have never had any dealing of any nature with the Lenin-Trotski government, and have no deposit, directly or indirectly, for their account.

The president of the Guaranty Trust Co. says:

I assume your telegram of to-day refers to Captain Estes's statement before National Republican Club, as reported in Sunday's New York Tribune. We have no deposit here to the credit of the Soviet Government, either in gold or otherwise.

Comment is unnecessary. It is a fitting sample of the misinformation which the people in this country are given with reference to Russia. Countless other illustrations might be given. I do not know Captain Estes. I shall assume he was also misinformed. But it certainly seems the statement was without foundation.

Mr. President, let us review briefly, as nearly as we can from accurate statements, the actual present condition of affairs in Russia.

I shall ask, first, the privilege of reading a portion of a letter from Bishop Nuelsen, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who has been for many months in Russia, and, as I understand, is there now. This letter is addressed to me under date of December 8, 1922. Knowing that Bishop Nuelsen had been for a long time in Russia, and that his business was the occasion of his being there, and knowing something of the standing of Bishop Nuelsen in the Methodist Church, it seemed to me that whatever his view might be it would be one upon which we could reasonably rely, especially as to those things which are open to observation. He says:

As far as I was able to observe, the present government in Russia is as firmly established as any government in Europe. I do not look for a revolution, but I do expect that a gradual evolution will take place. I did not find anybody in Russia who looked forward to a revolution, even among those who were quite outspoken in their criticism. One of the American newspaper correspondents whom I met in Moscow had just returned from a trip through the greater part of the country, and he said to me with reference to the government, "There is not a crack in sight."

The argument often presented to us is that this government does not represent the Russian people at all, that it is a coterie of autocrats who have seized control of affairs, that the people of Russia as a people are not in sympathy with it, and that it does not represent them at all. That is not the view which Bishop Nuelsen gets of the situation.

In fact, Mr. President, it is not the view which anyone would obtain who would make an impartial investigation, and there are good reasons for it. The peasantry constitute from 85 to 90 per cent of the people of Russia. They have been struggling for many, many decades to secure their land, and they have secured the lands under the present régime; not absolute title—and it is a very good thing they have not—but they have possession of the land and are availing themselves of the benefits of working the land and cropping the land just as completely as if the title were in them. The reason why the Russian peasantry were arrayed almost solidly against Denikin, Wrangel, and Kolchak was because they believed that the restoration of the old régime, or of anyone who represented the views of the old régime, would be to deprive them of their lands; and, while Bishop Neulsen says they expect the evolution of this government, the working out of a more satisfactory form of government, they are not in favor of destroying the present government or of accepting as leaders and as governors those who are opposed to this form of government. They prefer to work out their salvation upon the principle of evolution, as other peoples have to do who have changed their government from despotic forms to revolutionary forms of government. Therefore these people are thoroughly behind the government so far as it is opposed by other governments, whatever may be their view as to the necessity of reforming the government itself.

Again, Bishop Neulsen says:

I do not think that anything is gained by refusing to recognize the Soviet Government. The two pivotal points in the whole European situation are Russia and Germany. As long as these two countries can not recover we shall have no stability in the economic life of Europe. Whatever may have happened during the days of the revolution and the following period of terror—and there is no question that terrible things have taken place, just as they took place in every revolution—I discovered that the people think they have reached the turning of the road and can begin now constructive work. The government has practically given up a number of the radical communistic ideas, and I believe the country would be greatly helped in the efforts to reconstruct economic and political life by a sympathetic attitude on the part of America. In fact, as long as we treat the Russians as outlaws we furnish the radical elements ammunition for their propaganda against "capitalistic" States. It seems to me that they have reached a stage where they are open to reason and friendly advice, but they resent being treated as outside of the pale of civilization.

I have not the impression that the government is maintaining itself merely by terrorizing the people. That was the case for a while, but it does not seem to be so now. I took the opportunity to converse with a great many people, representing different classes of society, and I did not at all gain the impression that these people were afraid of expressing their opinions and were fearing acts of terrorism on the part of the government.

While the economic life is absolutely chaotic, I found that they are making strenuous efforts to educate the masses of the people. I was astonished to find thousands of people visiting the art galleries and attending high-class concerts. The department of education is the largest department of any, and while they no doubt undertook some unwise experiments, yet I am impressed with the sincerity of the purpose to lift the masses out of their state of ignorance.

The Methodist Episcopal Church had several congregations in that country before the war, and I found all church property perfectly intact and found that no impediments whatever are put in our way.

Whether we like the Russian government or not, I think it is futile to wait for an overthrow, and I think we can advance the process of reconstruction best by recognizing the government and taking a helpful, sympathetic attitude. I think the moral effect would be tremendous, and I think they would be open to advice and suggestion from us.

In a public address in the city of Boston Bishop Neulsen said:

Whatever may be said, however, against the Soviet Government—and I would not condone its crimes and foolishness—it must be said that order is now being reestablished. One can move along the crowds in Petrograd and Moscow in perfect safety. The railroad furnishes good service, and the trains are on time.

* * * * * * *

The Soviet Government has a department of education larger than any other department, and is making an honest effort to train the people. The equipment of the schools, however, is scant, there being almost no textbooks; but the teachers work with apparent enthusiasm and an earnest desire to educate the coming generation.

What is the attitude of the Soviet Government toward religion? I would reply that there is perfect liberty to preach.

Doubtless all who honor me with their presence will remember the attack which was made some time ago upon the Soviet Government because of its persecution of the church, and it was for that reason that I made particular inquiry of Bishop Neulsen in regard to it.

Suffice it to say that in my opinion there was no persecution of religion. There was prosecution, and, I would admit, if it were deemed essential, persecution of political agitators who were covering themselves under the cloak of religion, men who were opposing the present form of government, who were seeking to agitate against the Government and seeking to protect themselves under the cloak of religion in doing so; but not a persecution or prosecution of the church as such or of religion as such.

Mr. President, I have before me also an article by a commander in the American Navy, some few paragraphs of which I desire to read. He has been in Russia for the last two or three years and was there until a short time ago. He was there when Kolchak and Wrangel were carrying forward their plans for the seizure of the Russian Government. He said:

We have to-day the good will of the great mass of the Russian people, as no other nation has.

* * * * * * *

No country has such prestige in Russia as has the United States, nor are any people as well received there as are Americans. This comes about in the first place because Russians recognize our entire community of interest, and also, in some part, as a result of gratitude for our relief work. Still, perhaps the most important factor is simply that the individual Russian finds it so easy to get along with the individual American; he finds him sympathetic and likes him accordingly.

* * * * * * *

It follows then that recognition based not on commercial interest or advantage but on a real regard for the interests of the Russian people will mean a still greater extension of that good will toward the American people—a by-product of a right action on our part to which we will be as clearly entitled as we were to the happy results of Lincoln's great policy toward the South.

* * * * * * *

My own opinion is influenced very largely by another fact, which many people consider almost as irrelevant, but which to me is the deciding weight. It is that under the Soviet Government the Russian people have at last gotten what they have always demanded above all else; what even Czarist governments have promised them but have failed to accomplish; what all the leaders that have since arisen—Kolchak, Denikin, Wrangel—all have promised and all have failed to do; that is, under the Soviet Government the peasants have gotten the land. Under all other governments the peasants got only promises that were never kept.

* * * * * * *

And so it is that the great fact for the peasant is that he is in possession of the land, that no one can take it away from him, and that he can use it and work it for his own profit, subject only to the natural tax, which, though irksome, is no worse than the taxes of the old régime. And the very fact that he wrested the land from the soviet régime, while he could not get it from any other régime, has given him exactly as much interest in the perpetuation of the soviet régime as the Allies have in the perpetuation of the German régime, from which they wrested the treaty of Versailles and acknowledgment of reparations due.

It is a fact that in spite of the increasing amount of evidence to the contrary, practically the entire world has taken it for granted that just as soon as conditions inside of Russia got bad enough the Bolsheviks would automatically fall. But have we not seen exactly the contrary? Is it not at last obvious that as conditions became progressively worse in Russia the Bolsheviks became the more secure in power? But to return to our original question, is it really desirable that the present régime fall? On one point at least all who have any knowledge of Russia are agreed, namely, that there is absolutely no other power in sight that in the event of the fall of the Bolsheviks could take hold of authority and preserve order.

I have also a statement made by ex-Gov. James P. Goodrich, of Indiana, who, as we all know, has been very much in Russia for the last two years. He says:

Out of the present unfortunate situation a settled responsible government shall emerge. It will be a democracy and not an autocracy, either of the Czar or the proletariat. The peasant never did accept communism. He is by instinct, training, and tradition individualistic and capitalistic.

* * * * * * *

One's life and liberty are as safe in Russia to-day as in any other country in Europe, provided always he is not perniciously active in politics. The process of evolution is still going on. When we get far enough away to write an impartial history we will marvel at the swiftness of the change rather than its slowness.

It seems, Mr. President, we have a government which has been in existence now for nearly six years, which, according to those who are certainly in a position to judge and impartially to report, has the support of the Russian people; a government which is maintaining law and order throughout Russia; a government which has withstood all attacks from without and from within; a government which put down three powerful invasions financed by outside powers; a government which has stood alone six years in Europe. It is the only government which came out of the war which could stand alone.

That being true, the next question is, What is the relationship of that government to the other governments? Is it prepared to deal in a way that the other governments can afford to recognize it and undertake to do business with it?

At the present time there are 16 nations trading with Russia, either through treaties or through agreements, either by reason of recognition or by reason of trade treaties or agreements. I do not know of a single instance in which it has been successfully charged that Russia has in any way disregarded these trade agreements. I recall, which perhaps may be in the minds of others, an instance in which it was charged that the Soviet Government disregarded one of the trade agreements. There has been a controversy about that by those who were beneficiaries of the agreement, one of the gentlemen contending that the government discharged its agreement as it was made, another contending that it disregarded it. But if that be an exception it is the only exception of which I have been able to learn in which there has been any charge of a break in the integrity of the contracts with reference to commercial relations between Russia and the governments which have trade agreements with it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator give us the names of the governments with which they have trade agreements?

Mr. BORAH. Those Governments are Great Britain, Germany, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Austria, Turkey, Esthonia, Lithuania, Finland, Serbia, Afghanistan, Poland, Latvia, and, I understand, China, Japan, and Mexico.

I wish now to refer to a dispatch which was printed in the New York Times on the 15th of the present month, a dispatch from Mr. Duranty. Neither the Times nor Mr. Duranty would be charged with conscious bias in favor of the Soviet Government. I assume that they would state the facts as they understood them, and would not be consciously biased in favor of that government. The dispatch, under date of February 15, said:

Moscow, February 15.—Foreigners can do a profitable business in Russia to-day. They are doing it now, and whereas a year ago foreign business men here were mostly represented by fly-by-night firms and were interested in highly speculative, not to say wildcat, transactions, to-day there are Americans, Germans, British, Scandinavians, and even Frenchmen with real money beside them here to look the ground over.

For the government, or, rather, the governmental trading organizations of one kind or another, stick to their contracts, and life and property are as securely guarded and as safe as they would be in America. What is more, the government organizations are willing to guarantee against loss in transit, although the projected system of State insurance has not yet been carried through. For instance, a foreigner here shipped bales of valuable goods to Germany, of which one, worth about $25,000, was lost between Moscow and the Lettish frontier. On discovering his loss he went to the foreign trade monopoly bureau which had given him a permit to buy and ship goods. The bureau took the matter up with the railroad authorities, who admitted their liability, and within two weeks the foreigner received from the railroad a check on the State bank payable in foreign currency for the amount of the purchase money.

Naturally, Mr. President, during and after the period of the revolution there was uncertainty, there was insecurity with reference to trade relations, not any greater, I apprehend, than would have been in any country where such a revolution was going on. It is true also that they changed the status of private property in Russia, which gave additional ground for fear upon the part of traders from the outside. But it seems now beyond question, and it has so appeared for many months, that so far as the trade of foreign governments is concerned, a status is fixed which makes it safe and secure, that property rights are respected and protected, and that the Russian Government is prepared, so far as foreign powers are concerned, to disregard the principle of communism which obtains with reference to the internal affairs of Russia, although it obtains now only in limited degree.

Now, if it be true—and I have an abundance of other material here which I might submit—that a government is there established, doing business, protecting lives, protecting property, and respecting trade relations with other nations, is it not worth while for the United States to establish a friendly relation with those 140,000,000 of people? There can be no peace in Europe as long as Russia is an outlaw.

What is it that makes the Near East situation so full of menace to-day? It is because this great outlaw nation there, with her 140,000,000 people and with her vast man power, is coming in touch, by reason of the situation in which we have placed her, with the disciplining and organizing power of Germany. We risk much in war. We risk much when it comes to engaging in conflict. May we not risk something for the purpose of establishing friendly and amicable relations with these great powers in Europe?

What could we possibly lose? What would be the loss to the United States if we should recognize the Government of Russia?

I can conceive of nothing which could be estimated as a loss, except that which they contend, that the business men of this country would not have their security and therefore might lose some material interests. But there are two answers to that. In the first place, the business men of the country are willing to go into Russia and willing to take the risk, even without recognition. Certainly they would be more secure and safer with their government, our ambassador, and their consuls than they are without them. If there be anything to adjust with Russia or business relations to be strengthened, may we not do so better with our ambassador and consuls and dealing in a friendly way than through estrangement and with a stream of enmity flowing between us?

I have here a paper published under the head of the Amexa News. It is published by the American Manufacturers' Export Association, 160 Broadway, New York. I notice among its officers are Myron W. Robinson, of the Crex Carpet Co.; James A. Farrell, of the United States Steel Corporation; C. P. Coleman, of the Worthington Pump & Machine Corporation; H. J. Fuller, Fairbanks, Morse & Co., and so on, a body of men who are practical business men, to say nothing of anything else, who would naturally look with a scrutinizing eye upon Russia or any other government where their property might be insecure or unsafe. There is a vast amount of material in this publication with reference to business conditions in Russia and the safety or the security which a person would have in doing business with the Russian people. I shall undertake to read but very little of it. Upon page 8 it is said:

The cooperative societies, like a network, cover every town, village, and hamlet throughout the wide, expansive territory of Russia and Siberia.

The cooperative societies passed unscathed through the revolution. They were undisturbed. They continued to do business, and they carried out their contracts both at home and abroad; and they are the basis of the industrial life of Russia at the present time.

The initial efforts of the movement proved such a phenomenal success that it rapidly spread throughout the country. It is a democratic institution, created and managed by the people to supply their needs and to foster their welfare. It was instigated by lofty ideals, but, contrary to most other organizations founded on such idealistic principles, it applied itself to its manifold tasks in a practical manner. An organization so constituted was certain to make rapid strides. It merits the remarkable success it has attained.

As the individual cooperative societies progressed they found that still further economies could be attained by the formation of provincial wholesale cooperative societies. Thus the individual cooperatives of the province of Astrakhan organized and became members of the Astrakhan Regional Union of Consumers Societies, the cooperatives of Archangel organized and became members of Archangel Union of Cooperatives, and so on throughout the various provinces of the country.

On page 9 it is further said:

THE CENTROSOYUS.

In the year of 1898 the All-Russian Central Union of Consumers Societies was established. It is commonly known both in Russia and abroad as centrosoyus—a contraction in the Russian language meaning central union. The Centrosoyus is an organization consisting of all the provincial and individual cooperative societies in Russia and Siberia and might properly be termed a superwholesale cooperative society. All national and international activities of the cooperative societies are concentrated in this body. All imports into Russia and Siberia and exports from Russia and Siberia are handled by this organization. It has established banks, savings banks, insurance and credit societies, operates schools, libraries, hospitals, sanitariums, hotels, theaters, moving pictures, etc., for the benefit of its members.

RELATIONS TO THE GOVERNMENT.

It is a common belief in this country that all organizations now operating in Russia and Siberia are branches of the Soviet Government. While this may be true in a number of instances, it does not apply to the Centrosoyus. The Centrosoyus is a free and independent organization, which the government has seen fit to grant special privileges because of its altruistic ideals. In fact, the Centrosoyus is the only cooperative society in Russia and Siberia operating to-day, having replaced all other cooperative societies which previously existed separately. Direct trade with Russia and Siberia through those functions now existing outside of Russia and Siberia only, which have refused to reconcile themselves to the new order of affairs in Russia and Siberia, is now impossible.

It must be pointed out, however, that the Soviet Government exercises a certain measure of regulation over the Centrosoyus. Just as our Government or any other government exercises a certain measure of regulation over its nationals, so also the Soviet Government exercises the same degree of control over the Centrosoyus. The Centrosoyus is free to import such merchandise as the government tariff permits into Russia and Siberia unhampered and to export such products as are available to foreign countries. In fact, the government in many instances has encouraged them on in their foreign activities rather than to place obstacles in their path.

In the bulletin of the "All Russian Central Union of Consumers Societies—Centrosoyus" dated September 15, 1922, the following paragraph appears, which would seem to indicate quite clearly the attitude of the government toward the Centrosoyus:

"* * * The Soviet Government is facilitating the work of the cooperation which is enjoying the position of 'maximum of preference.' One of the proofs of this is the granting by the government to the cooperatives of a 25 per cent reduction in the taxes levied for the State. * * *."

Most American firms are still unaware of the fact that the United States Government permits exports to Russia and imports to this country from Russia, and that considerable-sized transactions are regularly taking place between Russia and other foreign countries. The Centrosoyus is looming up as a big factor in the trade between Russia and foreign countries, and it would seem that, in view of their past record, they are the proper firm to negotiate with if any American firms are desirous of obtaining any Russian business. They have the facilities within Russia and abroad to transact their business on the most intelligent basis, and it is believed that their capital and resources are such as to permit American firms to consummate business with them with reasonable assurance of safety of capital.

The Centrosoyus, as far as their activities abroad are concerned, enjoy a spotless record, notwithstanding the fact that they have just emerged from a period of time during which they have been obliged to overcome those serious difficulties occasioned by the conditions in Russia. Their transactions in the foreign market, previous to the revolution, were on a considerable scale, and yet, notwithstanding the difficult period they have just passed through, they have never failed to meet a dollar's obligation to any foreign creditor.

This is from an article contributed to the publication by Mr. Valerian E. Greaves, who seems, as I understand, to have spent a great deal of time in Russia as the representative of some business interests.

Since the new economic policy was adopted—

That is, the policy which was announced by Lenin in March, 1921—

the latter repeatedly stated that private enterprise, domestic as well as foreign, was welcome in Soviet Russia, and that enterprisers' rights and interests will be fully protected.

Mr. Sumner, a member of the New York bar, who visited Russia in the interests of business men of New York, also contributes an article upon the situation, and he says:

In a recent address on the Russian evolution, I read a signed statement intrusted to me by George Tchitcherin, the Russian minister of foreign affairs, which, I believe, is important enough to repeat for the benefit of members of the American Manufacturers' Export Association. Confirming his talks with me, he wrote:

"The Russian people and government are genuine in their desire to reestablish commercial relations with America. Russia has to-day practical aims. She will welcome the reestablishing of such trade relations in any form that can be developed along practical lines between herself and American interests. The Russian Government will gladly receive in Russia any serious and properly qualified American business men or commercial and industrial groups who will come with practical aims for preliminary negotiations and discussions preparatory to establishing such ways for restoring trade."

Then he says:

Ask anyone in a position to know—

This is the language of the lawyer—and you will be told that to date the Soviet Government has kept every formal contract it has made with any foreign interest.

Just a word with reference to the Russian debt. I presume that one of the obstacles to the recognition of Russia has been what is supposed to be her unwillingness to recognize the old Czar debts. I can well understand, Mr. President, the hesitancy of the Russian people as a people to recognize those debts. It has been the firm policy of the Anglo-Saxon people always to treat the financial integrity of a country with the same consideration as one would individual integrity, and therefore nothing I say should be construed as a justification of any hesitancy upon the part of the Russian Government to recognize these debts. Nevertheless, one can well understand why it would be so when he considers the manner in which those debts were incurred.

Those debts were created largely for the purpose of building up a vast bureaucratic and military establishment in Russia, and were a part of the preparations which were going on in Europe for the deluge which came in 1914. However, Mr. President, Russia has signified her willingness to recognize those debts. She did it at Genoa; and I have not the slightest doubt that Russia, if she were recognized and given an opportunity and a position among the nations of the world, would carry out the suggestion which she made at Genoa and would recognize these debts; and I have no doubt but she would agree to pay them in 62 years. If such terms could be granted, from the statements which Tchitcherin and others who are in responsible position have made, I should not have any hesitancy in prophesying that those debts would be unhesitatingly recognized and taken care of. I will read just a line from Mr. Lloyd-George after he returned from Genoa:

That, roughly, is the position which they took with regard to debts—the money which had been advanced to Russia before the revolution. They were prepared to acknowledge those debts; they were prepared to make arrangements for their repayment.

As stated by Tchitcherin at Genoa, they could not well go home and say that they had recognized the debts of the Czar government, which was so very obnoxious to the Russian people, and at the same time say they had been refused recognition by the governments to whom they had recognized those debts. Suppose Mr. Lloyd-George or the representative of France had consented to any such absurd policy upon the part of their governments, their ministries would not have lasted until they got home. As Mr. Lloyd-George very well says, the Russian officers themselves had a situation to deal with at home. They could not any more disregard the public opinion of their country than the Congress of the United States would disregard the opinion of its constituents.

It was a very natural thing for the representatives of Russia to say at Genoa, "We are prepared to recognize these debts; we are prepared to make arrangements for their payment; we are prepared to settle all these matters provided we are given an opportunity which will afford any possibility at all of our carrying out our contract after we have recognized the debts."

Would we have been in any worse position, Mr. President, if recognition had taken place a year ago or two years ago than we are at the present time? It is a speculation of course, and it is also a speculation as to the benefits which would have flowed. But what is the basis of recognition? Why do we recognize governments? To enable us to establish such friendly relations as that we may do business with other members of the family of nations so that we may adjust such matters as debts and commercial affairs and retain friendly relations with them.

Mr. President, suppose the present Government of Russia fails, what then? Suppose that by reason of our failure to recognize Russia, the failure of France to recognize Russia, and the failure of Great Britain to recognize Russia—although quasi recognition has taken place in the case of Great Britain—the present Government of Russia fails and falls, what is there to take its place? What has the future in store for the Russian people in case the only semblance of authority now there disappears? Chaos, hopeless, unending misery, bloodshed, and possibly ultimately a reestablishment of some representative of the old régime. If the present Government of Russia fails, if it falls, and there is nothing to take its place in Russia except that which may come out of the turmoil which may follow and concerning which no man can prophesy, the misery which has already been registered in that country will be repeated again, and even at the end of it who shall prophesy that they will have anything better than they have at the present time?

The present Russian Government has been in existence for six years; it has gone through the chaotic period; it is in the process of evolution; it represents authority; it represents at the present time the support of the Russian people. It is protecting life and property; it is transacting business with foreign nations; it is discharging every duty and obligation which rests upon a government, whether it be according to our idea of what a government should be or not; and if by our connivance or our failure to accord recognition it breaks down, we shall necessarily as a moral proposition become responsible in a large degree for what is to follow. Who is to take its place? Semenoff, or some representative of Wrangel, or some of the refugees whose interest in Russia is to see the old régime restored? In my humble opinion, the Russian peasant will suffer incalculable misery and go through years of turmoil before he will return to the old régime. Is it not infinitely better in a friendly way to undertake to bring Russia to the position which she ought to occupy under a sane and sound democratic form of government? For myself, sir, I do not want to see my Government connive at a policy which will add misery to that great people, which may bring on years of civil war, which may restore the old rule with all its incompetency and corruption and cruelty. Think for a moment what it all means. Let us forget for a time a few individuals and think of the mass of suffering humanity in case of another revolution or counter-revolution, the women and children who must pay with their lives for the wickedness of such a course. We are constantly saying officially we sympathize with the people of Russia. Is it not time to give evidence of that sympathy by deeds?

Mr. President, I wish briefly to refer to a precedent.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that one reason which has been assigned why the Russian Government has not been recognized is that the Soviet Government will not agree not to engage in political propaganda and revolution in countries to which its ambassadors and ministers may be sent when that Government shall be recognized. Has the Senator made any investigation of that situation to enable him to inform us upon that one point?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know as to that. Of course, that has been charged, and it has also been controverted. I have nothing that I could refer to as an official or authoritative expression upon the part of the Russian Government or the officers of the Russian Government as to what that Government will do. But the Minister of Foreign Affairs has declared in the most public way that Russia desires to establish friendly and cordial relations with the United States. Lenin has also declared publicly they desire to deal with all nations on friendly terms. The statements which were made early have repeatedly been discredited by the public declarations of officials since. Let me digress to say that if it is true that they are engaged or would continue to be engaged in propaganda which is designed to present their view of government to the people of the United States, could we not more effectually deal with it if we were upon friendly relations with them than we can now? What possible reason would they have for continuing an unfriendly act upon their part toward this Government after amicable relations had been established, and it was to every interest of the Russian Government and the Russian people to build up the friendliest relations and to accentuate trade relations between the two Governments? They would have no occasion for continuing any such course; and in view of the fact that they have modified their communistic form of government entirely and completely from that which existed at the time the propaganda was going on, they would have no occasion, from the standpoint of an apostle, to continue the advocacy of such doctrines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, is it not also true of this as of any other propaganda that it is much less dangerous when it is in the open and public than when it is kept secret and semisuppressed?

Mr. BORAH. I think so; but, Mr. President, I never have been able to understand the shivering fear which some people in this country entertain with reference to the effect of this propaganda from Russia or elsewhere. Whom is it going to hurt? I do not think it would affect the Senate. I do not think it would affect the House of Representatives. Whom are you afraid of—the farmer? It is the farmer in Russia who has destroyed or modified communism. It is the peasantry in Russia that represents individualism. It is the 85 per cent of people of Russia who have made that propaganda absolutely worthless and futile. You could pile your carloads of propaganda into the center of the agricultural population of the country and they would use it for fuel. Whom is it going to undermine?

Let me tell you. If you will take the tax burdens off the people of this country, if you will restore economic conditions so that they may have an adequate price for their products, if you will lift the burden which is crushing the people of the world through militarism and through armaments, there will be very little soil in which to sow the seeds of Bolshevism. Our conduct toward Russia has fed Bolshevism from the beginning. It has strengthened Lenin and Trotski every day that it continued to exist, so I do not know what they would do; I do not care what they would do. I am perfectly willing to trust the American people against such propaganda. I do not know of any soil so sterile in which to sow and let die the seeds of Bolshevism as the common people of America. I will trust our people to deal with such propaganda.

Let us go back again to the Revolutionary period.

On the 18th day of April, 1793, Washington notified his Cabinet that they would have a Cabinet meeting the next day. On the 19th day of April, 1793, they had a Cabinet meeting. He notified them in the letter that the subject about which they would confer would be whether or not they should recognize the revolutionary government of France. They met upon the 19th; and let us look in upon the Cabinet meeting for a moment.

There was Washington, who was not only a great general but had some knowledge about building governments; Hamilton, who was in many respects the greatest constructive genius who ever dealt with the science of government; and Jefferson, the most wide-ranging political philosopher that the world has ever known. It was the greatest Cabinet that ever sat under the American flag, if not in the world. It was their business to know government. They did know it. It was their business to know the proper relationship between governments, and they did know it, as no other three men in the world who ever assembled at one time knew these things. There, upon the 19th day of April, 1793, in less than a two hours' conference, they unanimously voted to recognize the revolutionary government of France.

What was the revolutionary government of France at the time they recognized it? It consisted of what was known as the Committee of Public Safety, and nothing else. Every foot of property in France and every human life in France were under the control and at the disposal of what was known as the Committee of Public Safety. At its head at that time was Danton, with him was Barrere, and later at its head was Robespierre, whose head it took off on the 28th of July, 1794.

This was the government which Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson recognized. I do not read in the account of that conference that they discussed what possible trade could be built up between France and the United States, or whether property or human life was safe in France. Only a short time before the recognition the King had been beheaded, and only a short time afterwards Marie Antoinette suffered death. The guillotine was running every morning. It was after this that the massacre took place in the prisons; and yet Washington, in his wisdom, supported by Hamilton and Jefferson, said: "These people are working out in their own way their salvation"; and so close were they to the days in which they had purchased their own liberty that they were willing to give the French people an opportunity to work it out in their own way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I am not quite certain about my dates, but I think that at that very time already the lands of the noblesse had been confiscated and a scheme originated to divide them among the peasantry.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may have been a little later, but I think it was prior to that meeting.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator is correct. The confiscation had already taken place.

May I read a letter from Washington, addressed to a friend, found in that very valuable book by the Senate historian?

George Washington, in a letter written to a friend in regard to this matter, said:

> My conduct in public and private life, as it relates to the important struggle (of the French Revolution) in which the latter (France) is engaged, has been uniform from the commencement of it, and may be summed up in a few words: That I have always wished well to the French Revolution—

Mr. President, that does not sound harsh or Bolshevik now, but think of how it must have grated upon the sensitive nerves of this gentleman who had criticized him at the time!

> I have always wished well to the French Revolution.

Bloody and inhuman as it was, cruel and merciless as it was, he wished it well, because it was the process by which they chose to get rid of a government which was worse; and, bad as the Soviet Government may have been in its worst hours, it is infinitely better than the cruel and unspeakable history of the Czars for the last 150 years.

> That I have always wished well to the French Revolution; that I have always given it as my decided opinion that no nation has a right to intermeddle in the internal concerns of another; that everyone had a right to form and adopt whatever government they liked best to live under themselves.

And at the time that he wrote this letter France was in a condition not better, Mr. President, and scarcely worse, I presume it will be said, too, than Russia in its most distressed period; but that time has passed now. That period has gone by, and order has come out of chaos, and we are in a very much more advantageous position from every standpoint to recognize Russia than Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson were upon the 19th of April, 1793, with reference to France.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Speaking of the bloodiness of the revolution in Russia and of the French Revolution, is it not true that the loss of life, the inhumanity, the cruelty, and the frenzy of every revolution in the history of the world are but the measure of the tyranny and the oppression of the government and of the ignorance and suffering of the people subject to that government? Wherever you have an oppressive government and it is overthrown by violence, you are going to have resulting disorder and bloodshed. Whether it is the French Revolution or the revolution in Russia, or revolution anywhere else, there is no escaping that travail if you are going to pass from despotism to independence and freedom.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is quite correct. That is the history of all revolutions.

May I read a single paragraph in description of the Government and the conditions in France at the time it was recognized? This is from Macaulay:

> Then came those days when the most barbarous of all codes was administered by the most barbarous of all tribunals; when no man could greet his neighbors or say his prayers or dress his hair without danger of committing a capital crime; when spies lurked in every corner; when the guillotine was long and hard at work every morning; when the jails were filled as close as the hold of a slave ship; when the gutters ran foaming with blood into the Seine; when it was death to be great-niece of a captain of the royal guards or half brother of a doctor of the Sorbonne, to express a doubt whether assignats would not fall, to hint that the English had been victorious in the action of the 1st of June, to have a copy of one of Burke's pamphlets locked up in a desk, to laugh at Jacobin for taking the name of Cassius or Timoleon, or to call the Fifth Sans-culottide by its old superstitious name of St. Matthew's Day. While the daily wagon loads of victims were carried to their doom through the streets of Paris, the proconsuls whom the sovereign committee had sent forth to the departments reveled in an extravagance of cruelty unknown even in the capital. The knife of the deadly machine rose and fell too slow for their work of slaughter. Long rows of captives were mowed down with grapeshot. Holes were made in the bottom of crowded barges. Lyon was turned into a desert. At Arras even the cruel mercy of a speedy death was denied to the prisoners. All down the Loire, from Saumur to the sea, great flocks of crows and kites feasted on naked corpses twined together in hideous embraces. No mercy was shown to sex or age. The number of young lads and of girls of 17 who were murdered by that execrable government is to be reckoned by hundreds. Babies torn from the breast were tossed from pike to pike along the Jacobin ranks. One champion of liberty had his pockets well stuffed with ears. Another swaggered about with the finger of a little child in his hat. A few months had sufficed to degrade France below the level of New Zealand.

Mr. President, the great statesmen of England who were then at the head of the English Government refused to follow the example of Washington and continued to discuss the question of whether England would recognize the so-called government of France, or treat with it, or in any way assume a relationship with the Government of France such as would even imply recognition. Pitt and Fox continued to discuss the matter for many years after Washington had recognized the Government of France.

What was the effect of the recognition, so far as we were concerned? It immediately established a relationship between this Government and the authorities of France under which Washington was able to say to that Government, "We do not like your representative, Mr. Genêt, who is engaged in"—what we would call now propaganda—"seeking to undermine our theory of government," and upon the suggestion of Washington, Genêt was displaced and another was sent in his place.

The so-called propaganda, which was then quite as rife in this country from France as it ever has been in this country from Russia, and even more so, was discontinued within a very short time after that recognition took place. The relationship which was established continued until it was broken by reason of another incident entirely.

Pitt and Fox continued to discuss the matter, and if Senators will take up Mr. Pitt's speech made upon the 3d day of February, 1800, they will find that the arguments at the present time against the recognition of Russia are nothing new in that regard. Every conceivable question which has been raised as to our recognition of Russia was raised by Pitt in relation to the proposed recognition by England of France. He said that France was an armed system, that it was not a Government at all, that it was irresponsible, that it did not protect property or life, that it would not respect treaties, that the people of England could have no protection against the inroads made by reason of the Jacobin clubs, which were being organized in England itself, and for that reason he argued with great power against dealing with the French Government.

Fox, who has the honor of having been voted down more times in the English House of Commons than any other great leader, opposed the view of Mr. Pitt, referred to the act of Washington, and plead with them to deal with the people who were seeking to establish a democratic form of government, but the contest continued until it finally ended, as we know, after some eight years of struggle, upon the battle field.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it was continued even after the fall of the so-called revolution and the régime of the first consul. It went into the nineteenth century.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Recognition was refused to the French Government under any form.

Mr. BORAH. The speech of February 3, 1800, was made after the first consul came into power.

In a late article by Peinleve, the former Prime Minister of France, he said:

> So long as Russia is not restored to the cycle of nations there will be neither economic equilibrium nor security in Europe.
> But to imagine that Europe can know any rest while ignoring Russia, or, in the expression of a diplomatist, "letting her stew in her own juice till further notice," is to put up a claim for a comfortable life in a house in which the whole of the wall is missing on the side most exposed to wind and weather.

The ex-Premier of Italy, Orlando, said:

> It is impossible to conceive a normal European existence with a State with over a hundred million inhabitants segregated, and it is unthinkable that a peace treaty can have brought a definite settlement of Europe until it has been ratified and sincerely accepted by the authorized representatives of that State.

What is the situation in Europe to-day? Of course, no one would prophesy that another war is at hand; but it is not aside to say that Europe is in a state of turmoil from side to side, from sea to sea, and by reason of the policies which have continued to be urged there are being driven together the Russian people, the German people, and this morning it looks as if a third were to join—the Mohammedans.

I can not understand why it is not the part of wisdom, in view of the conditions which now confront us, to do the simple thing, perfectly in accord with American traditions, in accord with the best traditions of America, to draw as friendly a relationship between those powers and the United States as possible.

If by the recognition of Russia we can hold our friendship and deal with her in a friendly way, it may be the means, possibly, by which the conditions which now threaten war can be averted. At any rate, why should the United States pursue a policy of enmity, of strife, of contention with a government and a people, which government is satisfactory to those people and which people are friendly to us?

I said a moment ago that we are willing to risk everything in regard to war. We build navies and organize armies, and we go to great expense because we believe in security; but there is another basis of security, in my judgment, more permanent than that of force, and that is a friendly relationship, if it can be arranged, between the nations, which means more to the security of a people than mere armies and navies.

What would be the effect to-morrow morning if it were known throughout the world that the United States had recognized Mexico and established friendly relations with that nation and brought back the sympathetic relation of all the people of South America to the United States? Secondly, that the United States had recognized Russia and established friendly relations with that nation? What would be the psychological effect upon the condition of turmoil which now tortures the human family? Is it not time for us to take some steps, to make some move, to bring back friendly relations among the nations?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I dislike to take any time of the Senate while we are engaged in an effort to pass the shipping bill, but I can not, so far as I am personally concerned, allow such a severe criticism of our attitude in regard to the question of recognition of Russia as has been made by the Senator from Idaho to pass without at least trying to explain what that policy has been and why it has been adopted by our administration.

Let me say first, that of course I agree to the natural and universally accepted proposition, that it is not for us to pass upon the internal affairs of another country, or regulate our relations to that country by the character of their government, which we may or may not approve. That is one of the conditions and the commonplaces, I believe, of international relations.

But it is also to be remembered—and this is another commonplace which has not been alluded to—that it is the exclusive right of the recognizing power to determine when they shall recognize the country seeking or desiring recognition, or recognize another country whether it seeks it or desires it or not. It rests entirely with the recognizing country itself to decide whether there are other questions affecting recognition beside the internal character of the Government.

For the recognition of a government certain conditions are generally required, especially where a new government has been established. The most important is the ability of the country seeking recognition properly to maintain international relations. Another is the ability to protect the nationals of other governments, and to give them security and safety in their persons or property. In my judgment, those are matters which must be and can only be decided by the government which is giving recognition, according to what they may deem to be for the best interest of their own country and of the world.

No doubt we are desirous of being on the best and most friendly relations with all the nations of the world. I am sure we all are; I know I am. We are now at peace with all the nations of the earth, and the better we can make the relations between us and other nations of the earth the better it will be for us and for the world. But I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho as to conditions existing in Russia as affecting us and as to their warranting recognition at this time.

Let me first remind the Senate exactly what was said by the Secretary of State in regard to our position at the time of the Genoa conference, in a letter dated March 8, 1922, addressed to the Italian ambassador. He said:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note transmitting the invitation addressed by the Italian Government to the Government of the United States to take part in an "economic and financial" conference to be convened at Genoa pursuant to the resolution adopted on January 6, 1922, by the allied Governments in conference at Cannes.

I have also received your later notes with respect to American representation, the proposed agenda, and the postponement of the date of the conference.

Since the receipt of your excellency's first note the question of American participation in the proposed conference has had the most earnest attention. I am sure that you will realize that the Government of the United States must take a deep interest in any conference which holds promise of effective measures to promote the economic rehabilitation of Europe, since not only do we keenly desire the return of prosperity to the peoples who have suffered most severely from the wastes and dislocations of war but it is also manifest that there can be no improvement in world conditions in the absence of European recuperation. It is with this sympathetic spirit and with the utmost reluctance to withhold its support from any appropriate effort to attain this object that the Government of the United States has examined the resolution adopted at Cannes and the suggested agenda for the conference.

I regret to inform your excellency that as a result of this examination it has been found impossible to escape the conclusion that the proposed conference is not primarily an economic conference, as questions appear to have been excluded from consideration without the satisfactory determination of which the chief causes of economic disturbance must continue to operate, but is rather a conference of a political character in which the Government of the United States could not helpfully participate. This Government can not be unmindful of the clear conviction of the American people, while desirous, as has been abundantly demonstrated, suitably to assist in the recovery of the economic life of Europe, that they should not unnecessarily become involved in European political questions.

It may be added, with respect to Russia, that this Government, anxious to do all in its power to promote the welfare of the Russian people, views with the most eager and friendly interest every step taken toward the restoration of economic conditions which will permit Russia to regain her productive power, but these conditions, in the view of this Government, can not be secured until adequate action is taken on the part of those chiefly responsible for Russia's present economic disorder.

It is also the view of this Government—and it trusts that this view is shared by the governments who have called the conference—that while awaiting the establishment of the essential bases of productivity in Russia, to which reference was made in the public declaration of this Government on March 25, 1921, and without which this Government believes all consideration of economic revival to be futile, nothing should be done looking to the obtaining of economic advantages in Russia which would impair the just opportunities of others, but that the resources of the Russian people should be free from such exploitation and that fair and equal economic opportunity in their interest, as well as in the interest of all the powers, should be preserved.

While this Government does not believe that it should participate in the proposed conference, it sincerely hopes that progress may be made in preparing the way for the eventual discussion and settlement of the fundamental economic and financial questions relating to European recuperation which press for solution.

I ask that with that letter may be printed the papers which were published containing an invitation of the Italian Government, so as to make the case clear, and also the further reply as to the conference at The Hague, so that the final position of the Government may be known.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 17, 1922.

The Secretary of State to-day received from the Italian ambassador at Washington an invitation to the conference to be convened at Genoa on March 8, 1922, of which the following is a translation:

"By order of my Government and through the kindness of your excellency, I have the honor to convey to the Government of the United States of America the following invitation from the Italian Government:

"'Pursuant to a resolution of the supreme council of the allied powers, I have the honor to forward to you a copy of a resolution adopted on January 6, 1922, by the allied governments assembled in conference at Cannes.

"'In accordance with that decision I have the honor to invite the Government of the United States of America to take part in the economic and financial conference which will be convened at Genoa on March 8, 1922.

"'I beg you kindly to inform me of the names of your delegates and their staff.'

"TORRETTA,
"Minister of Foreign Affairs.

"I have the honor to add for your information that the supreme council has decided that each of the small powers shall be represented by two members of their government or two delegates, and that, as regards the great powers, it would be desirable that the number of their representatives be kept between three and five."

TEXT OF THE RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT THE CONFERENCE OF CANNES, JANUARY 6, 1922.

The allied powers in conference are unanimously of opinion that an economic and financial conference should be summoned in February or early March to which all the powers of Europe, including Germany, Russia, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria, should be invited to send representatives. They regard such conference as an urgent and essential step toward the economic construction of central and eastern Europe and they are strongly of opinion that the prime ministers of every nation should, if possible, attend it in person in order that action may be taken as promptly as possible upon its recommendations. The allied powers consider that the resumption of international trade throughout Europe and the development of the resources of all countries are necessary to increase the volume of productive employment and to relieve the widespread suffering of the European peoples. A united effort by the stronger powers is necessary to remedy the paralysis of the European system. This effort must include the removal of all obstacles in the way of trade, the provision of substantial credits for the weaker countries, and the cooperation of all nations in the restoration of normal prosperity. The allied powers consider that the fundamental conditions, upon which alone this effort can be made with hope of success, may be broadly stated as follows:

1. Nations can claim no right to dictate to each other regarding the principles on which they are to regulate their system of ownership, internal economy, and government. It is for every nation to choose for itself the system which it prefers in this respect.

2. Before, however, foreign capital can be made available to assist a country foreign investors must be assured that their property and rights will be respected and the fruits of their enterprise secured to them.

3. This sense of security can not be reestablished unless the governments of countries desiring foreign credit freely undertake (a) that they will recognize all public debts and obligations which have been or may be undertaken or guaranteed by the State, by municipalities, or by other public bodies, as well as the obligation to restore or compensate all foreign interests for loss or damage caused to them when property has been confiscated or withheld; (b) that they will establish a legal and judicial system which sanctions and enforces commercial and other contracts with impartiality.

4. An adequate means of exchange must be available, and generally there must be cofinancial and currency conditions which offer sufficient security for trade.

5. All nations should undertake to refrain from propaganda subversive of order and the established political system in other countries than their own.

6. All countries should join in an undertaking to refrain from aggression against their neighbor.

In order to secure the conditions necessary for the development of the trade in Russia, the Russian Government demands official recognition. The allied powers will be prepared to accord such recognition only if the Russian Government accept the foregoing stipulations.

HAGUE CONFERENCE.

The cabled summary of the plan in pursuance of which the invitation was extended is as follows:

"1. Russian proposal May 11 for commission experts accepted in form in annex June 26, date of meeting.

"2. Powers except Germany and Russia shall be invited send representative to Hague June 15 for preliminary exchange views line of action by commission of experts toward the Russians. President Genoa conference requested to extend similar invitation to America if he ascertains she is willing to attend.

"3. Representatives at Hague will elect commission charged conduct permanently a Russian commission.

"4. Governments at preliminary meeting will intimate unless they have already done so whether willing to participate in commission; unwillingness on the part of a government will not prevent the meeting of the commission on behalf of other governments.

"5. If no joint recommendation can be submitted by commission's experts within three months from June 26 or joint recommendations not accepted by governments concerned one month after date of recommendations each government at liberty make separate agreement with Russians on matters in clause 3 annex.

"6. Delegations recommend respective governments not recognize or support private agreements by their nationals with Russian Government affecting property previously belonging foreigners before conclusion work expert commissions or during month following their joint recommendations, if any."

Annex referred to in above plan:

"1. Powers mentioned agree commission experts be appointed for further consideration outstanding differences with Russian Government and for meeting with Russian commission similarly empowered.

"2. Powers represented in non-Russian commission and names members of the commission will be communicated to the Russian Government and names members Russian commission communicated other governments not later than June 20.

"3. Matters treated by these commissions will comprise all outstanding questions relating to debts, private property, credits.

"4. Members both commissions meet Hague June 26.

"5. Commissions will endeavor to arrive joint recommendations matters clause three.

"6. To enable commissions to be conducted tranquilly and restore mutual confidence engagements will be made binding Russian Government and other participating governments refrain from acts of aggression against respective territories and refrain subversive propaganda."

The Secretary of State has directed Ambassador Child to deliver the following reply for the American Government:

"This Government has carefully considered the invitation extended to it by the president of the Genoa conference, under the conditions set forth in the agreement of the inviting powers, to join the proposed commission to meet at The Hague on June 15. This Government is most desirous to aid in every practicable way the consideration of the economic exigencies in Russia and wishes again to express the deep friendship felt by the people of the United States for the people of Russia and their keen interest in all proceedings looking to the recovery of their economic life and the return of the prosperity to which their capacities and resources entitle them. The American people have given the most tangible evidence of their unselfish interest in the economic recuperation of Russia, and this Government would be most reluctant to abstain from any opportunity of helpfulness.

"This Government, however, is unable to conclude that it can helpfully participate in the meeting at The Hague as this would appear to be a continuance under a different nomenclature of the Genoa conference and destined to encounter the same difficulties if the attitude disclosed in the Russian memorandum of May 11 remains unchanged.

"The inescapable and ultimate question would appear to be the restoration of productivity in Russia, the essential conditions of which are still to be secured and must in the nature of things be provided within Russia herself.

"While this Government has believed that these conditions are reasonably clear, it has always been ready to join with the governments extending the present invitation in arranging for an inquiry by experts into the economic situation in Russia and the necessary remedies. Such an inquiry would appropriately deal with the economic prerequisites of that restoration of production in Russia without which there would appear to be lacking any sound basis for credits. It should be added that this Government is most willing to give serious attention to any proposals issuing from the Genoa conference or any later conference, but it regards the present suggestions, in apparent response to the Russian memorandum of May 11, as lacking, in view of the terms of that memorandum, in the definiteness which would make possible the concurrence of this Government in the proposed plan."

The inviting powers referred to in the cabled summary of the proposed plan are understood to be Italy, Belgium, Great Britain, and Japan.

Mr. LODGE. I now come to the question of conditions in Russia and whether the time has come when we can properly and with advantage to ourselves and to the world give recognition to that government. Russia has a right to her own government. No one questions that, and it is not for us to meddle with her internal affairs. But in order to know conditions in Russia as affecting us we must know something about that government and what the present government has done. The present government differs in no essential respect from the government which Russia has always had. To state the principles of Russian government simply, Russia has always been controlled by a despot or tyrant or a tyranny resting on an army. Russia has no traditions like those of western Europe, of England, and of the United States as to free government. Even in the Middle Ages there were the free cities in Italy. There were the "customs," as they were called, in many parts of Spain, in France; there was a Parliament and local governments in England. There were also the free cities of the low countries. The idea of free and democratic government, though submerged and at times almost completely obliterated, had descended to the people of western Europe from the days of the free cities of Greece and from the traditions of republican Rome. Russia obtained her civilization, if we may call it such, from the Empire of Byzantium—that is, from the Greeks of the lower Empire. The Greeks transliterated the Slavonic and gave Russia her alphabet, one of the most complicated ever devised. It has been somewhat simplified, I think, reduced by 10 letters since, and still is much larger than ours. The missionaries who Christianized Russia, the land of the Scythians or Sarmatians, as they were called in classical days, were Greek missionaries and it was the Greek Church which was established. A conception of freedom as we conceive it never found home or birthplace in the imperial government at Byzantium.

That was the origin of Russian government. How much Rurik brought from the north, who was said to be the founder of the Russian monarchy as the tyrant or Duke of Muscovy, it is impossible to tell, but when Russia became known to western Europe as an actual and living entity she appeared with a tyranny of the most unmitigated kind, which finds its most striking illustration in the person of Ivan the Terrible and the government rested on the army. That was the underlying, dominating principle. That is the Government of Russia to-day. They have changed the despots, but the principles are the same. They rest on an army, and the Government is a despotism, a tyranny. That, however, is their affair and not ours. We had friendly relations with the old Russian Government, which was also a despotism and a tyranny. We have had friendly relations with many countries where that form of government existed. But that which I have described was the origin, and I am not criticizing the present Government of Russia on the ground that it is not the government of the Romanoff. I think it is probably just as good and possibly a good deal better.

I wish briefly to sketch the history of this Government now controlling Russia and then speak of the financial and economic aspects of the question.

The present Soviet Government of Russia had its origin in a "coup d'état" when the soviets of workmen's and soldiers' deputies of Petrograd, aided by certain revolting regiments, overthrew the weak Kerensky government by force of arms at Petrograd in October, 1917. The pre-parliament, which was "an assembly of notables consisting of representatives of all the classes of society, convoked by the Kerensky government to prepare for the opening of the constituent assembly," was dispersed by soldiers and sailors. (Anet, vol. 2, p. 222; see Antonelli, pp. 30–35.)

The "council of people's commissioners" under Lenin was thereupon constituted by the "Second congress of soviets of workmen's and soldiers' deputies," and then assumed the government. (Antonelli, pp. 36–37.)

The next step was to dissolve the Petrograd municipal duma in November, 1917, which body "had been elected only a little while before by universal suffrage and under such conditions of order, quiet, and fairness that its voice was sure to wield indisputable moral authority." The Moscow duma was dissolved under similar circumstances. (Antonelli, pp. 116–119.)

The references are throughout to the following books when not otherwise stated:

"Russia To-day and To-morrow," 1922, by Miliukov (foreign minister under Kerensky government).

Also earlier book by Miliukov, "Bolshevism, an International Danger."

"The Balance Sheet of Sovietism," by Boris L. Brasol, 1922.

"Bolshevist Russia," by Antonelli, 1920 (friendly to Bolshevism).

"Report of British Labor Delegation to Russia," 1920 (friendly to Bolshevists).

"The Greatest Failure in all History," 1920, by John Spargo (American Socialist).

"La Revolution Russe," by Claude Anet, correspondent Petit Parisien.

"Revolt Against Civilization," by Lothrop Stoddard.

Meanwhile in November the elections to the constituent assembly took place, and it should be noticed that this was under the Bolshevik government. The country districts gave "an overwhelming majority" to the social revolutionists, who opposed the Bolshevists (Antonelli, p. 121). Out of 703 deputies in 54 districts only 168 were Bolshevists, while 338 belonged to the Social Revolutionist Party; the Bolshevist Party counted barely 25 per cent out of 36,000,000 votes (Spargo, p. 417). When the assembly convened on January 18, 1918, there were armed sailors and Lettish troops in the hall to intimidate the representatives. Nevertheless the anti-Bolshevik candidate was elected president by a large majority (Antonelli, p. 124; Spargo, p. 420). And subsequently by a similar large majority the assembly voted in favor of the program of the social revolutionists, whereupon the council of commissioners dissolved the constituent assembly as being a counter-revolutionary body (Antonelli, pp. 123–127; Anet, vol. 4, pp. 25–30; Milukov, p. 53).

From that day to this there has never been, I think I am correct in saying, a freely elected assembly in Russia. I have no disposition to criticize them. Events followed the usual course of revolutions followed by despotisms and, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] a few months ago, it was violent in proportion to the oppression under which the people had suffered.

Under the soviet constitution "the All-Russian Congress of Soviets" is composed of representatives of urban soviets and provincial soviet congresses, elected under circumstances of intimidation which are notorious.

Mr. Spargo goes into the matter of suppression of the press at length. He points out (p. 317) that in the beginning, on November 16, 1917, the central executive committee of the soviets resolved that "the reestablishment of the so-called freedom of the press * * * would be an unpermissible surrender to the will of capital," and within a few days 10 important newspapers were suppressed (p. 380). They sometimes reappeared under other names, and would then be suppressed again.

Moreover, another very effective way of suppressing hostile journalism was found in the subsequent decree forbidding the printing of advertisements in any except the official journals and raising postal rates on all except Bolshevist newspapers to prohibitive heights (Spargo, p. 323). The Russian custom was to subscribe for newspapers at the post offices, but the decree forbade, for the future, subscriptions to the "bourgeois and pseudo Socialist" newspapers (Spargo, p. 324). They further compelled each householder to subscribe for the official soviet organ (Spargo, p. 326). They also created, in November, 1918, the revolutionary tribunal of the press, which fined and terrorized any newspapers which criticized the government (Spargo, pp. 328, 329). Mr. Spargo also quotes evidence (pp. 339–341) that "the Bolsheviki are the only ones who are able to hold political meetings in present-day Russia; everybody else is deprived of the right to voice his political opinions, for 'undesirable' speakers are promptly arrested on the spot by the Bolshevist police." And instances of such arrests are annexed (pp. 339–341).

It is safe to say that from the beginning neither freedom of the press nor freedom of speech has existed in Bolshevist Russia.

Antonelli gives a similar account (pp. 218, 219).

All students of Russian affairs refer to the Che-Ka as one of the most terrible features of the present government. The full name of this mysterious institution is the "All Russian extraordinary commission for combating counter revolution, sabotage, and profiteering." It is called for short the "Che-Ka," and its full personnel has never been made known (Spargo, pp. 154, 155). It is passed over in silence by most of the Bolshevist apologists. This extraordinary commission is situated in a huge building in a crowded thoroughfare of old Moscow. A spiral stairway leads down to the cellar, where those condemned to die are kept in small cells cut out of one of the stone walls. Many accounts have been given of the horrors of imprisonment and execution here. Similar Che-Kas exist in the other leading cities (Brasol, pp. 153–157).

The agents of the Che-Ka are described in the most recent book (Brasol, p. 158) as "dressed in leather coats, with Brownings hanging from their belts, and wearing riding boots. They can be seen everywhere. * * * The Che-Ka pass opens all doors to them. With this badge they have the right to raid private apartments at their discretion." Although something has been said about modifying their power, it does not appear that this has been done. A professor of the Harvard Medical School, who traveled through southern Russia in the autumn of 1922, recently stated in a lecture that there was universal terror of the Che-Ka agents with their revolvers, and that it was generally stated and believed that they could shoot at sight any person who expressed counter-revolutionary opinions, and that he was given repeated warnings to this effect.

Professor Muliukov, writing in 1922, speaks of the Che-Ka (p. 69) as having "gradually erected itself into a sinister tribunal of inquisition, with its branches and its torture chambers everywhere in the country," and he further speaks (p. 273) of that "notorious extraordinary commission, the Che-Ka, which in its shooting the 'politically unreliable' is not even constrained by the 'revolutionary conscience' of ordinary tribunals."

Such an institution negatives both safety of life and freedom of speech.

I have no personal knowledge of those conditions in Russia. I have not been in Russia for many years. When I was there, of course, the old régime of the Czars was in full order and operating, and the Czar had behind him, so far as an outside observer could judge, the exact source of support that the peasants, the moujiks, who are 85 per cent of the population, are to-day giving the Bolshevist government.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is quite right, I think, in his description of the Russian peasant. They are individualists. They have received great benefit from getting the land, and they have stopped the attempts of the government at Moscow to nationalize the land, and they propose to hold it. They are a conservative force and through them, in my judgment, the improvement and evolution, when they arrive, will come. I quite realize there are men who are leading that government or guiding it, men like Krassin and perhaps Tchitcherin—the force will come from the support of the peasants.

The real power to-day is in the hands of the "All Russian Central Executive Committee" (elected by the congress), which is stated in clause 31 of the constitution to be the "supreme legislative, executive, and controlling organ of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic." This committee has the right to appoint the "Council of People's Commissars" (clause 35), which council by clause 37 "is intrusted with the general management of the affairs of the "Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic" (Brasol, pp. 23–25).

The Soviet Government is everywhere recognized as identical with the communist party, although I think within the last two years there has been a movement away from it made necessary by the practical failure of the communist principles in Russia. The report of the British labor delegation in 1920—in the main favorable to the Bolshevists—says (p. 10):

"All possible means are used to secure the dominance of the communist party in the elections to soviets. The actual congresses of soviets are large and unwieldy bodies, and the power tends to be concentrated in the hands of the executive committees and presidiums. Elections become less frequent and more formal, and the party aims by means of organized groups at controlling every department and every institution of the national life."

That is the description taken from the report of the British labor delegation.

That the present Russian Government is, in fact, that of the communist party has been often stated by the Bolshevist leaders. In July, 1918, Lenin said: "The dictatorship of the proletariat is carried out by the party of the Bolsheviki." In February, 1919, the official organ of the communists said: "All the work in the soviet goes on under the influence and the political leadership of our party." Another Bolshevist organ stated: "In the country the highest organ of authority, to which all soviet institution and officials are subordinate, is again the Communist Party." (Spargo, p. 358.)

The Communists are everywhere recognized as being a very small minority of the present population of Russia, which is estimated at about 120,000,000. The Bolsheviks themselves do not claim over 600,000 members of their party, and this includes a very large number who have joined the ranks in order to hold office and avoid starvation. At the end of 1921 the third Communist Internationale—called "Komintern"—gave out an estimate of the membership in the Communist Party, and claimed 550,000 in Russia. (Brasol, p. 241.) As a matter of fact, their members are more probably not over 250,000. (Miliukov, p. 61; Spargo, pp. 362, 363.) I do not think it is necessary to go further into that discussion. The Bolshevists are admittedly a small part of the population; but it is this small minority which controls the Government of Russia. As I have already said, their rule rests, in the last analysis, solely on military force. Special military training is given to the members of the Communist Party who have the right to bear arms. (Report, p. 10.) The instructions to new members state that "every Communist must learn military science, must learn to handle a rifle. * * * He must know that the calling of a Communist imposes on him a special obligation to be ready at any moment, on the call of his party, to come to the defense of the soviet authority against the attacks of its enemies." (Brasol, p. 167.)

In every regiment there is a Communist group which spies upon the others, and the mercenary detachments of Chinese and of Lettish Communists can always be relied upon. In January, 1922, the Red standing army is stated to have been approximately 700,000. (Brasol, pp. 166, 167.) My impression is it is somewhat larger than that.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Do I understand the Senator to argue, from the fact that the present Government of Russia represents but a fraction of the population, that for that reason they ought not to be recognized?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am not making that argument at all. I am merely trying now to describe what the government is; and then I shall try briefly to show what the economic situation is and how well the life and property of strangers and of foreigners are preserved. I am making this statement merely to give an idea of what the present Russian Government is and show whether it has instituted or is likely to institute measures which guarantee the safety of the nationals of other countries, and whether it is ready to maintain international relations in a lawful and proper way.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, is he expressing his own conclusions or is he quoting from some one else?

Mr. LODGE. I have used some quotations.

Mr. SWANSON. All the statements made do not, then, represent the conclusions reached by the Senator himself?

Mr. LODGE. No. The instructions which I read, given to the new members of the Communist Party, I took from a book which was sent to me, and which I think is a pretty able book, by a man named Boris L. Brasol. The book is entitled "The Balance Sheet of Sovietism," published in 1922. I have tried only to quote statements of the soviet leaders and officials themselves, and not the opinions of any of the writers of the book.

Continuing as to the army, an article in a recent Fortnightly Review by an Englishman resident in Moscow estimated the present army at over a million, mostly well drilled under German officers.

As to the peasant population, who form 85 per cent or more of the population of Russia, the above figures show that they do not ally themselves with the Communist Party, and there is every reason to suppose that they are at heart hostile to it. The report of the British labor delegation is probably correct in saying (p. 10):

"As to the country population of Russia, it has not been won over to socialism or to anything more than a passive acceptance of the soviet régime."

Now, as to the principles of the Soviet Government as presented to us and to the world.

Class rule has always been the cardinal principle of the Bolshevists, with the corollary of the extermination or subjection of the bourgeoisie, although, as a matter of fact, the government has not been even that of the entire "proletariat" but only of the Communist Party. This principle has never been abandoned. Lenin himself in the official Moscow Pravda stated in August, 1921, at a time when some concessions were being made as to a free market, that all concessions "must be within the limits of what the proletariat can concede without ceasing to be the dominating class." (Miliukov, p. 269.)

Paragraph 9 of the soviet constitution states:

"The fundamental problem of the constitution of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic involves, in view of the present transition period, the establishment of a dictatorship of the urban and rural proletariat and the poorest peasantry in the form of a powerful all-Russian soviet authority." (Brasol, p. 11.)

This principle of dictatorship of the proletariat has been frequently and continuously emphasized by Lenin and his associates in speeches and writings.

As a consequence the subjection of the middle classes was necessary, and some of the extremists even advocated their annihilation. For example, the Red Gazette, in an editorial of August, 1918, said:

"Enough of mildness. The interest of the revolution necessitates the physical annihilation of the bourgeois class. It is time for us to start." (Brasol, p. 162.)

And similarly a prominent Bolshevik instructing his subordinates in the Che-Ka said, as quoted in the Red Terror, a Bolshevist publication:

"We do not conduct war against individuals. We exterminate the bourgeoisie as a class. When investigating, do not take the trouble to gather material and evidence to the effect that the defendant by word or deed opposed the soviets. The first questions which you must propound to him are: To what class does he belong? What is his birth, etc." (Brasol, p. 152.)

But even where the bourgeoisie, or middle class, have not been annihilated, they have been deprived of all participation in the government of the country. In the sixty-fifth article of the soviet constitution the following persons are deprived of the right to vote:

"A. Persons employing the work of others with a view of deriving benefit therefrom."

This would disfranchise not only manufacturers or persons employing servants but even the peasant employing a single farm hand, and this was probably the intention.

"B. People living on a revenue which is not earned by their personal work.

"C. Tradesmen and commercial agents.

"D. Monks and priests of every religion."

With these four classes are associated people who are mad or idiotic, and people "condemned for infamous crimes." In short, the Soviet Government outlaws all the classes to which I have referred.

All the authorities agree that these are the provisions of the constitution. (Report, p. 58; Brasol, p. 13; Spargo, p. 45.)

As illustrating how the elections are worked in practice, Professor Miliukov quotes (p. 62) an order sent around to the villages by the Bolshevist commissary of the interior in July, 1918, saying:

"The petty bourgeoisie in the villages have dared to participate in the elections and even to be elected. They must be immediately arrested and tried for having violated the law of the Soviet constitution."

Enough has been said to show that there is no semblance of a free or democratic government.

Mr. President, in this connection the well-authenticated fact should be noticed that when the system of food rations was adopted, "the urban population was divided into four categories and the 'parasitic' class, i. e., brain workers and bourgeoisie, were put in the fourth category. They were to receive the minimum of foodstuffs, a real famine ration." (Muliukov, p. 60; Stoddard, p. 195.)

Muliukov further says:

"The most effective means devised by the Bolshevists for 'eliminating' the bourgeoisie was the 'differential food ration.' The population was graded by classes and rationed accordingly, members of the Communist Party faring best, while 'Boorjooy' received least of all—in Lenin's jocose phraseology 'bread enough to prevent them from forgetting its smell.'"

As to that there can be no question. The report of the British labor delegation (p. 9) says: "Personal freedom, together with freedom of speech and of propaganda (including newspapers, the issue of election literature, and the holding of meetings), is severely repressed in the case of all those whose activities are supposed to threaten the Soviet régime."

In the appendices to the British labor delegation report, Appendix 5 gives the speech at a printers' meeting in Moscow in which it is stated that "the thousands of Moscow printers, and behind them scores and hundreds of thousands of Russian workmen, have all of them under this government no right to vote, no right to assemble, no right to print." (Report, p. 64.) As a consequence of this meeting all the members of the administrative council of the printers were arrested (report, p. 71).

Trotski himself in his book called "The Defence of Terrorism" (London, 1921), states, "We are destroying the press of the counter-revolution just as we destroyed its fortified positions, its stores, its communications, and its intelligence system (Brasol, p. 161).

The soviet commission on school reform in its decree of December 8, 1920, negatived also freedom of teaching, stating:

"Under these circumstances the Soviet Government would have committed suicide had it proclaimed freedom of scientific teaching and research. The soviet power during its present phase of material and spiritual development is unable to grant everybody the right to teach anywhere subjects in whatever way one might choose. On the contrary, having proclaimed the dictatorship of the proletariat in political and economic fields, the soviet authority must in equal manner frankly declare that this dictatorship also applies to science." (Brasol, p. 185.)

Then there is an organization to which I have already referred, known as the "All Russian extraordinary commission for combating counter revolution, sabotage, and profiteering." It is called for short the Che-Ka, as I have said, and its full personnel has never been made known. Similar organizations or branches of the main organization exist in many cities in Russia. The Che-Ka proclaimed in February, 1918, that "All enemy agents and counter-revolutionary agitators," and so forth, "will be mercilessly shot by detachments of the commission at the place of the crime" (Spargo, p. 156), and it has well lived up to this proclamation. This body excites universal fear throughout the country. The report of the British labor delegation of 1920 says (p. 9):

"But the terror has left its traces behind it in the form of a pervading fear which is expressed on all hands—a fear sometimes more vague and sometimes more definite—that any expression of opinion adverse to the dominant party will be treated as 'counter-revolutionary,' and will lead to imprisonment or some kind of penalization."

Something has been said here in regard to the comparative cruelty of the French Revolution and the revolution in Russia. I do not think that is a very profitable discussion, but of course the revolution in Russia has been aimed at what is known as the intelligentsia, the middle class. They are the people who have been killed or driven into exile. The remainder, however, are thoroughly cowed. Of course executions are much less frequent now, as became the case in the French Revolution. I will not quote some of the special cases which

I have collated here, as I do not wish unnecessarily to occupy the time of the Senate, but I will ask to print them in 8-point type with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"It is not necessary to discuss the savage character of the Soviet Government at length. As the 'intelligentsia' and middle class have been largely killed, starved, or driven into exile, and the remainder are thoroughly cowed, executions are necessarily much less frequent than in former years.

"Individual cases have often been described, such as the brutal murder of two of Kerensky's ministers, who were in a hospital, by a band of sailors, and the brutal execution of three young French boys—brothers—for having been present at a private gathering wearing shoulder straps (Anet, Vol. IV, p. 36; Spargo, p. 172).

"What is more important to note is that the destruction of adversaries has been and is a basic principle with the Soviet Government. Miliukov well says (p. 68):

"'What I must emphasize here is not isolated facts but principles. And we know already that "crushing the antagonists" is the chief basic principle of Bolshevist tactics. "No dictatorship of the proletariat is to be thought of without terror and violence." Lenin formally declared in the summer of 1920.'

"Zinoviev, the dictator of Petrograd, stated in 1918 that they must win over most of the population of Russia; 'as for the rest, we have nothing to say to them. They must be annihilated.' (Brasol, p. 55). His actions have shown that this was not mere bravado.

"As a detail of what was done it appears, for instance, that the soviet commissioner of railways reported in 1919 that 25 per cent of the trained engineers on the roads had been murdered, while about 50 per cent had fled to escape murder (Brasol, p. 77).

"Direct instances of wholesale massacres of bourgeoise are given by various authors (Spargo, pp. 103, 144, etc.), but it is unnecessary to dwell upon them. It should be mentioned as one of the worst instances of Bolshevik methods that Trotzki issued an order in September, 1918, to arrest as hostages the families of officers, including women and children, who in some cases were thereafter condemned to be shot if the officer deserted (Spargo, pp. 446, 447). What is important to note is that the Soviet Government still has not changed its methods, as is shown by the trial of a number of 'social revolutionists' only last summer, which was so outrageously conducted that the defenders of the accused persons withdrew from the trial (these included the celebrated socialist, Vandervelde). A considerable number of accused, including one woman, subsequently were condemned to death for no other reason than 'antirevolutionary activities.' The accounts of this trial were in all the newspapers. Similarly, in July, 1922, a metropolitan and 10 other dignitaries of the Russian church were sentenced to death merely for interfering with the seizure of church treasures (Brasol, p. 210).

"The Soviet Government is the same bloody tyranny of a small minority which it was in the earlier stages of its history.

"Even if we compare the terror in Russia with the worst period of the terror of the French Revolution, we shall find that Russia has been the more bloody. In Paris, during the terror, 2,625 persons were guillotined (Madelin, p. 328). Whereas in the official report of the Che-Ka, published in 1920, the figures for Moscow and Petrograd only, for 1918 and 1919, are that 9,641 persons were executed by this arbitrary commission, of whom 7,068 were shot for 'counter-revolutionary activities'; that is, for purely political reasons (Miliukov, pp. 69, 70).

"Miliukov well says: 'These figures do not include the work of the numerous provincial extraordinary commissions, and, of course, they do not mention the numerous victims slain here and there throughout Russia without any form of trial. The number of such would probably amount to tens or even hundreds of thousands.'

"This statement is entirely supported by the published accounts of eye witnesses regarding the wholesale executions which have taken place in Kieff, Odessa, and many other places."

Mr. LODGE. I may say that even if we compare the terror in Russia with the worst period of the terror of the French Revolution we shall find that the revolution in Russia has been the more bloody.

In Paris during the terror 2,625 persons were guillotined.

That is from Madelin, who is a very recent historian and high authority.

Of course, I am aware that the figures of the guillotine do not include other persons who perished in the French Revolution from actions of the revolutionary government, the Terror. There were the drownings at Nantes and the shootings at Lyons, and more or less shootings and murders in various of the smaller cities and towns; and in the same way these figures give only the victims in Moscow and Petrograd. I do not think comparison of the bloodiness of the two revolutions leads us anywhere; but no doubt the French Revolution was extremely bloody. They confiscated the property of the nobles and turned it over to the peasants, who have held it, roughly speaking, ever since and who form the great bulwark of French society to-day; but, so far as I know, they never undertook to destroy all property or adopted the communist doctrine. They respected property as an institution, so far as I am aware. They may have changed the ownership of property, but they respected property.

It is true that Washington's administration recognized them in 1793. The French were our allies. I think Washington was entirely right in recognizing the government; but it is also true that, I think, within two years—I have not the exact date here—the representative of France, from whose close alliance we were to make such gains, Mr. Genet, was given his passports by Washington. His government recalled him, but he never went home. The government had changed since he had come to this country, and he thought it safer to remain here; and he remained here, and I think his descendants are still in New York.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, our Government notified the French Government that he was no longer desired here.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; certainly they did. They gave him his passports. Washington dismissed him.

Mr. BORAH. I know; and before the dismissal took place Washington communicated with them as to his undesirability.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, certainly; of course he did. That is always done.

Mr. BORAH. I know; but that is the position I took.

Mr. LODGE. That is always done. Then I think Adet was the next one who came. I think the policy was entirely right. I am not contesting the policy. France, as I say, was our ally; but before the end of the century, although we did not declare war against France, we were fighting France; and Truxtun, who commanded the United States, captured the French frigate L'Insurgente, which was the first of our great frigate victories. The course of our affection did not run perfectly smooth with France at that time, despite the recognition.

The Senator made reference also to the relation to the Government in Russia to religion. I think, so far as I am aware, they were entirely tolerant about religious differences. When I was in Russia—which, as I say, was many years ago—there was no sign that I could see of religious discrimination of any kind, although they were an extremely devout people, with all the outward manifestations of great religious devotion. They have lately, as you have seen in the newspapers, had Christmas celebrations. They circulated among the school-children a tract called "The Failure of God," which was published in one of the Boston papers, and they had a public celebration at Christmas-time for the abolition of the day and of all religions; but I think that is probably the outburst of the young and violent. Early in their career the Soviet Government destroyed the church organization and overturned the hierarchy without apparent resistance from the people who, none the less, I am informed, still thronged the churches. Quite recently the Soviets are reported to have stripped the churches and convents of all their jewels and gold and silver vessels. Nevertheless I do not believe the general character of the Russian people can be essentially changed, and that is that they are naturally a very religious people and devoted to their church. I have not, I repeat, seen any sign of there being religious persecution, which would be, of course, a cause for nonrecognition, if they persecuted the people of other nations and of other religions.

In this connection it may be remarked that the Government is also attacking the institution of the family. Divorce may now be granted upon request of either party sent to the local court. All that the judge has to do is to convince himself that the petition is signed by one party, whereupon he annuls the marriage. (Antonelli, p. 221; Brasol, p. 197.) Not only this, but the law expressly permits abortion. (Brasol, p. 200). All observers, even Bolsheviks, refer to the terrible extension of immorality under such conditions. (Brasol, pp. 202–203).

The Soviet Government has enforced an iron discipline over the workmen in factories, which has never been approached in any other country. This point has been much emphasized by Mr. Gompers and other labor leaders. After the complete breakdown of the system by which the factories were run by committees of the workmen, with resulting idleness and terrible decrease of production, decrees were issued enrolling the workment in an "army," punishing them severely for striking, and providing for their transfer against their will from one place or one industry to another. This was done in 1920. A brief description is given by Professor Miliukov, pp. 205–207. He says in part:

"But the climax was reached when the Bolsheviks decided to militarize labor. The idea was suggested by three circumstances. In the first place, compulsory labor service had existed from the very beginning of the communist régime. But it was chiefly applied to the bourgeoisie and the intellectuals, with the obvious aim to 'break the will' and to degrade the former 'parasitic' class. The bourgeoisie were forced to remove human refuse, to pave and clean the streets, to unload the coal, to drain the marshes, etc. Now the same principle was to be extended from the 'unproductive' or 'privileged' groups to the whole population on the ground of state necessity."

After speaking of Mr. Trotski's idea of using the demobilized army for industrial purposes, Professor Miliukov explains that "desertion of work" was formidably increasing from the beginning of 1920, and

"Accordingly a decree was published in the spring, 1920, which incorporated the whole population into special labor armies."

A general committee, with affiliated local committees, estimated the number of labor requirements for 1920 in skilled and unskilled workmen, and "extremely severe measures of punishment were announced at the end of May for evasion of labor conscription." Even persons "giving refuge to labor deserters" were to be punished by fines, confiscation of their property, or imprisonment.

"The special 'revolutionary council of labor' was empowered to send the unlisted workingmen to wherever it desired without discrimination of training, in the order of their registration."

No wonder that the Petrograd workers passed a resolution in September, 1920, saying:

"We feel as if we were hard-labor convicts, where everything but our feeding has been made subject to iron rules. We have become lost as human beings and have been turned into slaves." (Miliukov, p. 208.)

Mr. Spargo goes into the matter at much greater length. He refers to the strikes of 1919, which were suppressed by the troops with great brutality and many deaths, the strikers being often shot down by Lettish battalions (pp. 248–250); and he refers to the complete suppression of many unions (p. 252), such as the teachers' union and the printers' union.

He further gave extracts from the Bolshevist newspapers as to forced labor of the bourgeoisie in cleaning the streets, ditch making, and so on (pp. 376, 377), and he quotes in detail (pp. 380–388) the various laws as to "compulsory labor," the carrying of a "labor booklet" by every wage earner, and so on. Trotski openly said in his report before the Third Russian Congress of Soviets of National Economy, January 25, 1920:

"Labor conscription gives the labor state the right to order a workman to leave the village industry in which he is engaged and to work in state enterprises which require his services." (Spargo, p. 400.)

Trotski further said, as reported in the official Bolshevik journal March 21, 1920:

"Under the unified system of economy, the masses of workmen should be moved about, ordered, and sent from place to place, in exactly the same manner as soldiers." (Brasol, p. 116.)

It is perhaps superfluous to notice that the Bolshevik Government has an enormous number of employees who are distinguished for idleness, immorality, and dishonesty, enormous quantities of goods belonging to the Government being stolen. This is not anti-Bolshevist propaganda, but comes from the reports of Bolshevik officials and the official Bolshevik papers. (Spargo, pp. 266–274, where many examples are quoted.)

It is important to notice that the supply of physicians is very inadequate, as so many have been killed or driven out, and that the hospitals are terribly neglected. As a consequence, epidemics and contagious diseases have flourished. The report of the British labor delegation says (p. 22):

"Since 1918 the country has been swept by great epidemics of typhus, of recurrent fever, of Spanish influenza, and of cholera, while local outbreaks of smallpox and other diseases have occurred."

Brasol quotes from medical reports, describing the filth of the streets and apartment houses, and the terrible condition of the hospitals (pp. 175–179), and continues:

"No wonder that under these circumstances epidemics of all kinds ravage Soviet Russia. In 1920–21 spotted typhus killed more people than the Che-Ka did. In 1922 Asiatic cholera broke out, not only in the famine-stricken districts but also in the northwestern parts of Russia."

Doctor Rollins, of the American Relief Administration, reported, May 5, 1922, that—

"Aside from the hunger victims, thousands are affected with different kinds of epidemics—typhus, measles, dysentery, and tuberculosis; recently cholera has been added with a 60 per cent mortality." (Brasol, p. 225).

This is fully confirmed by the Harvard professor who went through southern Russia in the autumn of 1922 on behalf of the American Relief Administration and reported on the filthy condition and neglect of the hospitals in Odessa and other places, where he found cholera and all kinds of infectious diseases. He regarded this as one reason, among others, against recognition of Russia, because he believed that with freedom of intercourse the whole world would be threatened by the spread of these terrible diseases.

I have here some statistics in regard to workmen in factories, which I should like to print without reading, as I do not want to take unnecessary time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The Russian Information and Review, in the article already quoted (June 1, 1922), says:

"'According to figures given by the trade unions, the movement of workers' wages, taking November, 1921, as the normal, fluctuated in the following manner:

November, 1921	100.0
December, 1921	81.5
January, 1922	72.0
February, 1922	61.2
March, 1922	39.0
April, 1922	30.0

"In this connection it should be noticed that there is no real distinction, in fact, between the Soviet Government and the Third or Communist Internationale, which holds its sessions in Moscow, was set up in 1919, and is commonly referred to as the 'Komintern.' This openly revolutionary organization is under the control of the soviet rulers of Russia. Its administrative power is vested in its executive committee, of which Zinoviev (really named Apfelbaum) is president, while Lenin, Trotski, and others of the Bolshevik rulers are among its members. (Brasol, p. 239.) It is therefore impossible for the soviet dictators to claim that they have abandoned interference with other nations while as rulers of the Komintern they are actively seeking the overthrow of other governments.

"From first to last the Soviet Government has regarded the revolution in Russia merely as a means to 'world revolution' (Miliukov, Bolshevism, p. 295), and has expended large sums from the Russian treasury abroad in support of revolutionary communist propaganda. The facts are entirely notorious. Col. Raymond Robbins admitted, in the inquiry into Bolsheviki propaganda by the Committee of the Judiciary of the Senate, that the Bolshevik government had the purpose of destroying all existing governments, including our own Government, and that everybody there (in Russia) knew it. (Miliukov Bolshevism, pp. 269–276.) This purpose is shown by many proofs. In the 'Declaration of Rights of the Laboring and Exploited People,' which is part of the soviet constitution, it is stated that the purposes of establishing the Soviet Republic are, among others:

"'The establishment of a socialist society and the victory of socialists in all lands.' (Brasol, p. 6.)

"In the official 'Program of the Communists,' written by one of the Bolshevik leaders in 1918, it is stated:

"'The program of the Communist Party is a program not only of liberating the proletariat of one country, it is the program for the liberation of the world proletariat, since such is the program of the international revolution.' (Brasol, p. 233).

"In the summer of 1920 Lenin, speaking before the second congress of the Third Internationale, said:

"'This (our) task will be that of leading on to the victory of the world revolution and to the establishment of an international proletarian soviet republic.' (Brasol, p. 235.)

"In the summer of 1921, at the third congress of the Third Internationale Zinoviev stated, in referring to the presence of delegates from foreign countries, that therein was the pledge that the victory of the revolution 'will be not merely a European revolution, but a real world revolution in the precise meaning of the term.' (Brasol, p. 235.)

"In the circular letter of Bukharin (one of the leaders in the Bolshevik government) to communists residing in the United States, early in 1921, it is stated:

"'We believe that one of the foremost problems at present is the formation of communist nuclei among the soldiers and sailors (military party organizations), the duty of which must be to conduct energetic propaganda for the formation of soldiers and sailors' soviets and the reckless persecution of the officers. * * * Soviets (of workers), before they shall prove able to seize the power, must become fighting organizations, aiming at the seizure of the power of the State and workers' dictatorship. * * * Your chief slogan shall be—

"'(a) Down with the Senate and Congress;

"'(b) Long live the workers' government,' etc. (Brasol, p. 247.)

"In accordance with these instructions from Moscow, the Communist Party of America in February, 1921, in its resolutions, referred to the need of unifying the forces of Communists 'as directed by the Third Internationale,' (i. e., the soviet rulers), and proceeds:

"'The united communist party must prepare the working class for armed insurrection as the final form of mass action by which the workers shall conquer the state.' (The Communist, No. 13, 1921, quoted by Brasol, p. 298.)

Similar quotations from many of the soviet leaders as to bringing about 'world revolution' are given by Spargo, pp. 438–440.

"The soviet rulers financed the propaganda of the Komintern so long as there was money in the treasury. For example, their first appropriation, made on December 13, 1917, signed by Lenin and Trotski, appropriated 2,000,000 rubles (this was before the fall of the ruble) 'for the needs of the foreign internationalist movement' (Brasol, p. 250).

"It must be borne in mind that even if the Soviet Government should offer to refrain from propaganda in return for recognition, such a promise would be perfectly valueless, first, because the propaganda could be continued by the 'alter ego' of the Soviet Government, the Third Internationale, and, second, because the Soviet Government would not regard itself as bound by any such promises and would hold the period, if any, of inactivity as merely a 'truce' to enable them to regain their strength. Lenin very frankly said, in January, 1919, when a discussion of peace was proposed to Moscow by the Paris Peace Conference:

"'I have never hesitated to come to terms with bourgeois governments when by so doing I could weaken the bourgeoisie and strengthen the proletariat in all countries. * * * We must be prepared to make every concession, promise, and sacrifice in order to entice our foes into the conclusion of this peace. * * * We shall know that we have but concluded a truce permitting us to complete our preparations for a decisive onslaught.'

"At that very time, in fact, Lenin was sending an invitation to the communists to come to Moscow to organize the Third Internationale. (Miliukov, pp. 109–110.)

"The Bolshevik diplomacy has never varied in this respect. In Chicherin's instructions to the Bolshevik diplomatists in 1921 the general idea was to foment foreign discords and conflicts, and he proceeded:

"'Official recognition of our representatives, development of trade relations, gradual dissemination of propaganda, and the strengthening of our authority among the proletarian masses—these are the ends of our work.' (Miliukov, pp. 113, 114.)

"Other examples of soviet foreign policy are given by Spargo (pp. 440–442). In February, 1918, Trotski stated that if Russia should be compelled to conclude peace with the Central Powers—

"'It would be a provisional, temporary, and transitory peace, with the revision of which the European revolution will have to concern itself in the first instance. Our whole policy is built upon the expectation of this revolution.'

"Similarly, in February, 1919, Zinoviev, in speaking of the proposed Prinkopo conference, said:

"'We are willing to sign an unfavorable peace with the Allies. * * * It would only mean that we should put no trust whatever in the bit of paper we should sign. We should use the breathing space so obtained in order to gather our strength, in order that the mere continued existence of our government would keep up the world-wide propaganda which Soviet Russia has been carrying on for more than a year.'

"In consonance with the above principles, the Bolshevik envoys have never hesitated to break any agreement to refrain from propaganda. This was true of the Bolshevik envoy to England, Litvinov, who was guilty of using his position, in breach of express agreement, to promote revolutionary agitation. The Bolshevik ambassador, Joffe, was expelled from Berlin for using his diplomatic position to wage a propaganda for the overthrow of the German Government, in express defiance of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk; and Joffe himself subsequently published an article in the Bolshevik official paper on January 1, 1919, confessing and glorying in his breach of an express agreement. (Spargo, pp. 442, 443.)

"Mr. Stoddard points out (p. 186) that the soviet leaders have never modified their fundamental reliance upon violence He says:

"'Lenin's famous "21-point" manifesto laying down the terms upon which socialist groups throughout the world would be admitted to the "third internationale" commands implacable war, open or secret, both against existing society and against all socialists outside the communist fold. And Trotski, in his recent pronouncement significantly entitled "The Defense of Terrorism" (English translation of 1922), freely justifies all Bolshevik acts and policies as alike necessary and right.'

"There is no doubt that the fundamental purpose of the Soviet Government has always been and is the bringing about of the 'world revolution' by the violent overthrow of all 'capitalist governments,' including our own.

Mr. LODGE. This aim of the Soviet Government to overthrow all capitalist governments, of course, affects the question of recognition.

I have no fear whatever about the propaganda that we hear so much of in this country. The kind of propaganda that the Russian communists are putting out here will never, in my judgment, gain any very great ground among the American people. It may do mischief, and probably does do mischief, in some of our great cities, but it is a great deal better to let it come to the surface and be freely discussed than to attempt any suppression. At the same time it is well to remember that their views, as officially expressed, are extremely hostile to our form of government.

Now, Mr. President, I will come to the more immediate question which lies at the bottom of our refusal to recognize them.

In the first place, there is the announcement they made at the beginning of their government that they should not feel bound by any treaty they made. I do not mean to say they have broken any treaty; I do not know whether they have made any treaties, or how well they have kept them, but it is a little difficult to recognize and enter into relations with a government which starts with that proposition as to their debts, a vital question of national good faith. They may be intending to pay their bonded debt, but they have not done it as yet. How much their offer at Genoa amounted to, I do not know. I do not know whether it really was intended as a means of purchasing recognition or not, but the fact remains that they have not paid the debts of the Russian people and Russian Government, without reference to who at any given moment controlled the Government.

I also ought to refer, as affecting our relations with them, to the nationalization that was proposed of private property owned by foreigners in Russia. The best information we can get will be found in connection with a report of the Department of Commerce made on June 12, 1922. I will ask to have printed an extract from the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
"Washington.

TRADE WITH RUSSIA.

"The following statement on the Russian trade situation was issued by the Department of Commerce last night:

"'There seems to be some misunderstanding as to the practical character of trade agreements made with Russia by foreign governments. There is nothing in the trade treaties between Russia and England, Germany, Italy, or other countries which permits or establishes trade with private individuals in Russia. In substance, all that the treaties really provide is authority for the Russian government itself to establish buying agencies in the several countries. To be sure, these treaties nominally permitted citizens of the countries making them, under certain restrictions, to enter Russia, but when they arrived there they found that trade was a government monopoly, that they could not sell to private concerns, and that, in fact, the government usually referred them back to its buying agencies in their own countries.'

"In view of the fact that the total present imports of Soviet Russia are small, the interest of foreign concerns in selling goods there would necessarily lie chiefly in the hope of laying foundations for the future. No such hope can be entertained so long as the Soviet Government monopolizes import trade. Under that practice there can be no establishment of business connections, no building up of trade reputation.

"Within the past few months, cooperative institutions, which had been converted into purely government organs, have been restored to some measure of independence, and have been given limited rights to engage in foreign trade at the same offices as the Soviet Government. Still more recently importation of some agricultural implements has been permitted to private Russian individuals. The great bulk of foreign trade, however, remains in the hands of government organs.

"Uninformed persons often speak of the so-called blockade maintained against Russia. As a matter of fact, for two years' time now no such blockade has existed. The real blockade on trade, not only with us, but with all the world, is that maintained by the Soviet Government itself. By its monopoly of commerce it has hampered the export even of the small quantities of goods which were available and has discouraged the production of more goods. Our Government puts no obstacles whatever upon selling to Russia. One result has been that even in countries having trade agreements no merchants have been able to establish themselves in Russia or to undertake manufacturing enterprises.

"The trade of Russia to-day consists of importing goods and paying out gold from the old imperial reserve. She can not pay for commodities by commodities. The magnitude of these gold-bought imports has been much less than many seem to suppose. According to official soviet statistics, the 1921 imports were valued at 248,000,000 gold rubles, or approximately $125,000,000. This is only one-sixth of the pre-war imports. Exports amounted to the sum of $10,000,000 (20,283,000 gold rubles); in 1913 they were 75 times as great. These exports consisted largely, and probably chiefly, of commodities left over from the pre-Bolshevik régime. The difficulty of exchange of commodities is evident from the fact that before the war two-thirds of Russia's exports in value were foodstuffs, while to-day the country is in the throes of a terrific famine and a large part of its imports are foodstuffs. In February, two-thirds, in weight (values not yet available), of Russian imports were foodstuffs, the larger part of which were furnished by the charity of the American people. There is little prospect that Russia will have any more to export in 1922 than she had in 1921. Meantime, the gold reserve is approaching exhaustion and with it is disappearing what might have furnished a start toward reestablishing a workable currency. The paper money of Russia is hastening to the ultimate catastrophe of utter unacceptability within the country itself. The recent attempt of the Bolshevik leaders to restore something resembling individualistic methods in the conduct of industry, and particularly by payment of wages in money instead of a communistic division of commodities in the form of rations to the workers, has itself hastened the currency debacle. There being a fundamental shortage of foodstuffs and other necessaries, wages paid in money naturally can not buy enough to support life. Prices soar and, though wages are multiplied by constant emissions, they can not catch up with 'galloping prices,' as a leading Bolshevik journal calls them. Prices in Moscow now are doubling every month, which means multiplying 4,000 times in a year. A day's ration of food cost, in April, a million rubles. The time must apparently come soon when paper money will no longer buy. Then, in the absence of precious metal, all business will have to be done by barter—a method so cumbersome that it will almost inevitably check the increase of production which might otherwise be hoped to follow from the so-called 'new economic policy.'

"As a matter of fact, despite the absence of a trade agreement, our exports to Russia compare very favorably with those of our two principal competitors—Great Britain and Germany. For example, in 1913 British exports to the Russian Empire amounted to $135,000,000; in 1921, to $33,500,000, or only one-fourth as much. The United States never had a large share in Russian trade before the war. Our exports to that country in 1913 were $27,000,000. In 1921 they were over two-thirds as much, $19,257,000, and most of this represented sale of goods, though a part consisted of relief supplies, which during the present year, 1922, have become much larger. A considerable fraction of British shipments to Soviet Russia last year consisted of reexported foodstuffs, and these, if they did not come directly from the United States, virtually created a demand for the equivalent quantity from this country.

"The British have been grievously disappointed in the results of their trade treaty. Much had been made of the enormous needs of the huge Russian population so long deprived of goods. It was forgotten that need for goods does not constitute demand for goods. Demand implies ability to produce and pay.

"The really important problem confronting American business men with respect to Russia is not that of trade but that of investment. Without a large investment of foreign capital as a means of restoring production, the prospects are that, at least for some years to come, there will be even less opportunity to sell goods in Russia than in 1921, for with the exhaustion of the gold reserve her means of payment will shrink to a minimum. The feasibility of investing capital in Russia depends essentially on the policy of the Bolshevik government and on the general internal situation and not in any important degree upon action of foreign governments."

Mr. LODGE. This report shows very clearly that although Russian ports are entirely open to us to trade—that is, there is nothing to prevent our people from trading there, and they have tried it—yet trade with Russia has not prospered, because Russia has nothing at present to trade with and it is impossible to get the necessary security. We have traded with Russia; so has England; so has Germany; but the trade has had very little effect on the actual business of any of them, even including Germany.

Mr. President, I will ask to have one more thing printed. It would be too long to read. These are some articles by Mr. Rykov, who belongs to the Bolshevist group, and is, in fact, I think, one of the ministers. It consists of a translation from the Moscow Economic Life of October 1, 1922, and I ask that it be printed. It would take too long to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ECONOMIC SITUATION OF SOVIET RUSSIA AND CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE FUTURE WORK.

[Translation from Moscow Economic Life, No. 221, October 1, 1922.]

"It is not a mere accident that one of the questions which recently has been so much discussed at the sessions of the central executive committee, in partisan circles, at general conferences, and by the press was the question of the export of our grain.

"This question is the corner stone of our whole economic policy.

"In comparing the proportion which existed in pre-war times with that which exists at present as regards the fundamental elements of Russian economic life, i. e., agriculture and 'large industry,' the following facts can be definitely established: At the time when crops of the current year yielded approximately 2,800,000,000 to 3,000,000,000 poods of grain, or 65 to 70 per cent of the pre-war yield, 'large industry' had reduced its production to 20 to 25 per cent in comparison with the pre-war output.

"Since there is a great demand in the villages for the products of 'large industry,' it is quite probable that the villages will reduce the consumption of their own products during this year, according to reduced norms—about 19 to 20 poods per person, including in this number also the food for cattle, instead of 26.5 poods in pre-war times—of the past years in order to satisfy their requirements in industrial products. Thus, in spite of the deficit of more than a billion poods in comparison with peace times, it can be expected that the villages will throw on the market such quantities of grain that the towns will not be able to pay for it with their products. This will result in the abrupt fall of the ruble, perhaps more abruptly than that which we experienced during the past winter, and the extent of this fall will depend upon how much grain the villages will sell and whether the towns will be able to pay for it with their products in quantity and value which would correspond with the quantity of grain turned in by the villages. If our expectation is justified, i. e., that the surplus stock of grain, excluding the tax in kind and other stocks, amounts to 400,000,000 to 500,000,000 poods, then in order to secure an economic balance between the town and village it is necessary that the industrial program for the current year, which was expected to reach 20 to 25 per cent of the pre-war production, shall be executed in full. Experience shows, however, that the execution of a program usually varies between 60 and 70 per cent. There is danger, therefore, that the balance will be disturbed. As a preventive measure, therefore, we must adopt the same system that was used by Czarist Russia—the sale of grain on the foreign market and import of industrial products.

"The future will show how practical this plan is and to what extent it can be materialized. We can only guess at the present time and make more or less tentative plans, since the settlement of this question depends upon a number of things (harvest, village consumption, insurance fund in case of failure of crops, quantity of seed stock which the peasantry will retain for the next sowing, etc.), which it is difficult to ascertain and an error made while ascertaining one of the above items might result in a complete change of the situation. To this must also be added the deficiencies of our statistics on account of which some statisticians, including V. T. Mikhailovsky, think that the probable yield of crops can be estimated at from 3,000,000,000 to 3,500,000,000 poods and the surplus stock of grain for export at 400,000,000 poods. Others estimate the yield at from 2,200,000,000 to 2,300,000,000 poods, the difference thus amounting to 1,000,000,000 poods.

"However, no matter how large are the differences in estimating the crops and how different are the opinions in respect to the question of grain export, it is important to point to the fact that the very discussion of this question means a concealed recognition of a fundamental conclusion, which, in my opinion, can be drawn from the experiences during the past economic year.

"The past year proved that under the conditions of the new economic policy and the change of the requisition system to the tax-in-kind system, agriculture has displayed more powerful tendencies toward regeneration and is getting upon its feet quicker than industry is. There are certainly a number of complaints as to the lack of cattle, lack of agricultural implements and tools, which fact naturally slackens the speed of reconstruction; but at the same time there is an abundance of land, working force, a possibility to cover the lack of cattle by means of a better exploitation of cattle on hand, a better utilization of agricultural implements. Persons familiar with the situation in the villages all agree that the village has become active, tries to enlarge the area of cultivated land, and that every attempt on the part of the people's commissariat of agriculture to procure seed stock and to organize breeding stations, and so forth, is met by the village with open arms, good results thereby being attained sometimes in the course of one year. It is true that we are still very far from complete restitution. It is sufficient to point out that the diagram of the sowing area still shows a descending tendency. But the reason for this is a natural disaster—the failure of crops.

"In the regions which were not visited by famine the growing area of sowing land is noticed. In regions which have not hitherto produced enough for their own use the area of sowing land increased from 8,131,000 dessiatins in 1920 to 9,757,000 dessiatins in 1922; in other words, by 20 per cent.

"The question of industry is more complicated. There have been a number of achievements which we could never have dreamed of attaining under the old economic policy. Principally they are the tremendous increase in the productivity of labor, which, as an average, reached 60 to 70 per cent of the pre-war productivity. In some places it even reached 100 per cent.

"To the number of favorable results of the new economic policy belongs also a better utilization of technical equipment by means of the readjustment of industry.

"A certain increase in the general production of all branches of industry took place as well.

"But if the question is at whose expense the production has increased during the course of the new economic policy, the investigation of industry and all items concerning the various sources prove that the increase of production was attained at the expense of our depreciating economic resources and fundamental capital. The following table confirms the above conclusion:

January 1, 1922, 1,126,097 barrels.
July 1, 1922, 1,033,019 barrels.

"Statistics show that only in case of large skins an insignificant increase was attained.

"In all other cases, comparing the old stocks with the present, a considerable decrease is evident.

"As concerns naphtha, there are 20,000,000 poods not suitable for transportation. In regard to the cotton stock, it is probable that the textile industry will continue to work on the level of the first half of 1922 and in a few months the question of cotton import will arise; the stocks of flax and wool have also considerably decreased.

"As concerns the state of the railways, one of the most important facts—the maintenance of the railway bed—shows that in this sphere also an unsatisfactory condition exists. Instead of 18,000,000 crossties, which should be replaced every year, only 4,000,000 were replaced.

"These facts show that our economic situation is grave.

"In describing the state of industry it is necessary to say a few words concerning the wage tariff, inasmuch as an explanation of this question will facilitate the understanding of the general state of industry. It seems that the economic side of this question has not sufficiently attracted the attention of our economists, at least as far as one can judge from a brief review of our press.

"Expenditures for the payment of wages must occupy a definite place in the list of expenditures, constituting a certain percentage in the general balance. And the better the state of production the less will this percentage be. In spite of the importance of this question, our statistics furnish no exact figures, as far as I know, which could enable us to receive a clear perception. But statistics on hand show that the situation is alarming.

"Thus the expenditure for wages in transport can be taken as 60 per cent of the total transport expenditures, whereas in 1913 it constituted but 48.3 per cent for the whole of European Russia. According to the data of the People's Commissariat of Posts and Telegraph, the expenditure (of that department) for wages constitutes 80 per cent of its total expenditures, whereas the state of railways and mail service is demanding tremendous expenditures for repairs and the reestablishment of the most important branches of economic life.

"As concerns industry, I have no definite data on hand, but there is certain 'indirect' information.

"For instance, whereas the average yearly production of a workman in 1913 amounted to 4,410.7 rubles, thus constituting less than 10 per cent of the value of the production, on the basis of experience during the first half of 1922 the State plan commission fixed an average production for the metal industry in 1922 at 636 rubles per workman, or about 14 per cent in comparison with 1913. On the other hand, although the average earning of a metal worker is lower at the present time than it was before the war, it constitutes at any rate a rather high percentage in comparison with production.

"In order to maintain the same proportion between the production and earning of a workman which existed in 1913 and making the same calculations as those relative to the metal industry, the average yearly earning in 1922 of a workman at a soap factory must be about 35 pre-war rubles; at a match factory 19 rubles, and at a glass factory 79 rubles.

"On the other hand, the actual earning is much larger than the above figures. T. V. Schmidt, in his report to the Central Soviet of Trade Unions, stated that the average earning of a workman (nonindustrial?) can be estimated without exaggeration at 10 rubles and in industry at 11 rubles.

"It can not be otherwise in the present situation in industry and it must be admitted that the largest branches of industry—coal, metal, and many others—pay the workmen not from the gained profit, and that the proportion between the expenditures for wages and the expenditures for other requirements went too far from normal and sound principles.

"During the last half year the actual earning has even increased in a number of branches of industry. Naturally further increase of wages is necessary, especially in such industrial branches as coal and metal, but our State and industry can stand this increase only as long as there is an improvement in production and in the productiveness of a workman.

"Unequal amounts of wages in various branches must be regarded as a weak point in the present situation.

"The situation can by no means be considered normal when a tobacco workman, pharmacist, and carpenter receive more than a woodworker or metal worker. But a number of such cases have been registered. The reason for it is naturally that there are numerous small branches of industry and enterprises which gain certain profit from their production. In the present state of our economy these profits could not be ascertained in due time and transferred to other branches of industry and factories, so they were used for the purpose of increasing of wages of the workmen and employees and for repairs and other requirements. (Continuation follows.)

"P. S.—Urgent State work prevents me from devoting more time to a more careful preparation of the present article.

"On this condition only could I comply with the insistent demand of the office of Economic Life to receive from me an article for publication in the present issue of this newspaper devoted to the beginning of the new economic year.

"(Signed) A. RYKOV."

ECONOMIC SITUATION OF THE COUNTRY AND CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE FUTURE WORK.

(Article by A. Rykov. Translation from Moscow Economic Life, No. 222, October 3, 1922.)

"One of the tremendous gaps in the otherwise splendid chain of results attained by the new economic policy is the absence of exact statistics. All examinations carried out up to the present time show there is no reliable information which may be used in estimating the cost of production, prices for products, the amount of the foundation capital, running expenses, etc. The economic program can be ascertained only on the basis of this information; only with this information is it possible to obtain an idea as to the work of the industrial enterprises and trusts; only this data can make possible the management of industry, the fixing of prices, etc.

"The struggle for the present 'principles of business efficiency,' for a strict control over production, for an exact account of every kopeck, and a maximum economy in expending the funds must become our motto in the future.

"It is difficult to carry on even a firm trade policy without a strict economic control over production, without figuring out of the cost of production. Industry has sometimes sold at exceedingly cheap prices the products which were left in stock from the former times, and, having no exact data, was fixing at random the prices for goods recently produced.

"The unsteady rate of exchange of our ruble caused great difficulties in connection with the establishment of a strict control over our industry and trade. In the first place, these difficulties could be overcome; and, secondly, we have even no approximate idea of the control which is so necessary for business transactions.

"The State plan commission has been working several months on figuring out the cost of production of fuel, and promises to furnish the necessary information by October 15, when a careful examination carried out at the places of production will be concluded.

"We left our watchword 'to trade' far behind in our commercial sphere, and went over to a specialization in our trade. A troublesome period, when everyone was dealing in everything, is coming to an end; syndicates were organized, and such vital organizations as 'Khleboproduct' and the State Universal Stores became stronger and more active; a considerable commercial experience was accumulated, the stock exchange is becoming active.

"One of the main problems in our trade policy is realizing on the harvest and the struggle against a rise of prices on grain products.

"On account of the 'deficiencies of the soviet system' and on account of the great significance of a successful settlement of this problem, the soviet of labor and defense was compelled to establish a special organ invested with extraordinary rights for grain collection.

"The purchase of grain could not as yet show important results, since up to the present time the villages were busy in turning in the tax in kind, but a number of measures (combating the competition, granting of credits to a small number of organizations, preference of credits on goods, shipment of grain into regions with high prices on grain, etc.) resulted in prices on grain either remaining on the same level or increasing very slowly in comparison with the prices on other products. The prices on industrial products show an ascending tendency to a great extent on account of an increased demand. According to data of the people's commissariat of finance the prices on industrial products, except naphtha, have outstripped the prices on grain.

"As long as the most important products (cloth, salt, kerosene) remain under the control of the State syndicates, possessing a monopoly on these products, there is every possibility of regulating the market under the new economic policy by means of regulating the output of the products and prices.

"An insufficiently developed retail business and a tendency to a tremendous development of private commission operations in trade transactions between the State institutions forms a great obstacle in this respect.

"Private capital was more willing to carry on all kinds of commission operations than to organize trade or industry. Examinations carried out by a number of institutions, and particularly that of the workmen's-peasant inspection, show that the State institutions are often doing business with each other through private commission agents, who usually receive 5 per cent of commission. This 5 per cent is usually paid twice, at the time of the purchase of the raw materials and semimanufactured goods and on the sale of the products, thus making a total of 10 per cent, not including all kinds of 'commissions' for transportation, granting of credits, etc. It is even difficult to figure out how large is the sum which goes into the hands of various private commission agents, but there can be no doubt that this sum is very large.

"An abnormal development of private commission transactions increases the high cost of products, in addition to the waste of State funds, and turns a private commission agent into a force which has a great deal to say in the regulation of our market. It is necessary to issue a decree prohibiting State institutions from concluding any business transactions through private commission agents.

"Private capital can play a great and useful rôle in commerce and can render impossible a sales crisis, which we experienced last spring, because these crises were due not to the absence of buyers but to the fact that we had no well-developed trade. We were unable to, and to a certain extent can not even now, let our goods penetrate into the villages, as well as purchase there the necessary stock of raw materials.

"Cooperative societies and the State trade must attain such positions on the market that no private dealer will be able to fix his own prices and the public be left entirely in the power of the private merchant.

"A private dealer has one great advantage at the present time—which is similar to the period of preliminary accumulation—which consists of comparatively small additional expenses. Additional expenses are also decreasing in cooperative and State trade, and great results have been attained in this respect. These results, however, are insufficient, and still too many cases take place in which the funds are being simply wasted, contrary to business principles.

"As an instance I shall quote a few lines from a letter of an old and experienced comrade, in which he tells how one of our large fuel organizations commenced trade operations in Berlin: 'They started by paying a salary of £6 per month to each employee, which at the present rate of exchange constitutes 1,000,000 reichsmarks. That is the salary of 40 responsible workers of a trade mission. Such "principles of business efficiency" can stand evidently only in Russian commercial enterprises. Yesterday they demanded seven rooms, a room for each person (whereas we have sometimes 10 persons working in one room, in some offices even 25 persons in a room), and declared that they wanted to buy an automobile. Our trade mission was able to buy two automobiles only after two years of work, and also gave the right to use these machines to the above seven workers, while the Russian ambassador, Comrade Krestinsky, even now has no car. These comrades, on the other hand, think that they should have a car for seven people and pay for it out of the government's funds. I would not like to take your time describing all these "little things," but I think that they are very characteristic and typical. These are exactly the "little things" which "make the music." I have no doubt that similar facts are usual in a number of our other missions in the foreign countries, for the independence of which a number of comrades were struggling in Moscow.'

"I am afraid that this instance is characteristic of our practice in economic policy. We have very small funds; our capital is not large; we are only beginning to reestablish our foundation capital; therefore a strict economy is necessary. This economy must be decisively brought into effect in all operations of our economic institutions, and merciless punishment must be meted out to persons wasting State funds.

"Our budget is being compiled based on the greatest economy. A budget of the State where agriculture turns in but 70 per cent of the pre-war production, and industry—less than 30 per cent can not be large—can not satisfy all of the most necessary requirements of the country. Money emission is certainly not a way to increase the quantity of valuables—otherwise we should have been long ago the richest country in the world—but is a means of redistribution of valuables, an impost to a certain extent. But even this last rôle the emission can play only in case it is not overdone, in case the new emission of paper notes does not result in an abrupt depreciation of the ruble. We have already experienced such a situation last spring and all efforts must be made to prevent it from occurring again.

"Our economic policy must be directed not toward an increase in emission, but toward the reduction of unproductive expenditures, toward the improvement and development of our taxation policy, toward a strict economy in administration, State economy, and toward a greater accumulation of State funds for the settlement of the most important problems. An approximate estimate of the funds which the government can spend within the coming economic year gives a figure of one and one-half billion gold rubles. This figure is almost twice as small as that for the pre-war times. It is true that a number of items in the list of expenditures of the old Russia have been canceled since the revolution, but in their place has come the financing of railways and industry.

"This last item seems to occupy the first place in our budget, though the support and reestablishment of large industry—metallurgical, coal, naphtha, etc.—and transport is becoming our most important problem. Those branches which represent a political and economic base of the proletarian dictatorship must be given first consideration in our budget.

"The financing of the metallurgical industry and of our transport must be carried out by means of granting them State orders. These orders must not only be placed with our largest enterprises, but by means of paying for them at a rate not lower, and, if possible, even higher, than the cost of production—at so-called reestablishment prices—to restitute these branches of industry.

"The first step in this respect was recently taken by the soviet of labor and defense, which increased considerably the prices on coal and naphtha in comparison with those which were established a few months ago. But here also the absence of statistics is clearly manifested. No figures could be obtained as to the cost of production. It is necessary to take all possible measures in order to find a starting point.

"Considerable sums from the budget must be allowed for transport where the destruction of the foundation capital is still going on.

"Concentration of all means and sources on these two problems compels us to draw a number of conclusions in regard to our economic and especially our financial policy. This concentration means in the first place a further decisive reduction of State expenditures for other people's commissariats, and a still greater reduction of their personnel. A number of measures were recently projected, which must be enforced at whatever cost. It is necessary at the same time to increase the productivity of workmen and the quality of products turned out by our institutions, and especially by the commercial ones.

"It is also necessary to develop the local budgets by means of transferring a number of expenditures to such budgets. The improvement of local budgets deserves great attention on the part of our leading organs.

"Finally, we must have a most active foreign policy, increasing at any cost our export, turning in the profits for restoration of the foundation capital in the country.

"Only by a decisive concentration of all means and forces on our principal problems, on fundamental branches of our economy, shall we be able to prevent our foundation capital from further destruction and create a strong foundation for the restoration of our economic life."

Mr. LODGE. As for the present condition of Russia and the safety of life there, if we may judge from the newspaper reports, life may be safe enough in Moscow and Petrograd, provided you do nothing counter-revolutionary; but in the country the well-authenticated report in the press and from travelers is that there are marauding bands—bandits in fact—all over the country, and that the country is not in a peaceful condition. But the main reasons for our delay in recognition have been, and are, that it has been impossible to reach a situation where we could get either safety for our own people or any assurance that any agreements we made would be supported and made good; there is no sufficient evidence that the Soviet Government will observe and carry out their international obligations.

I have partially sketched the government. I think it indicates a government with which it is well to be on one's guard. I think any prudent government ought to be careful in dealing with the Soviet, and I am unable to see how an administration, wisely or in justice to their own people, could do otherwise than wait until they could get sufficient assurances for the safety of their people and for the maintenance of proper international relations. How much good our recognition of Russia would do I do not know. If it will do all the good which the Senator from Idaho thinks, I am sure it will come at the proper time, and I hope it will be as beneficial as he imagines; but at the present time, it seems to me, it would be in a high degree unwise to recognize that government until we have some assurance that they will maintain proper international relations.

That is the whole case as it is set forth by the Secretary of State. We are not refusing recognition on the ground of the character of the government, however much we dislike and condemn it, but on account of its treatment of the people of other nations and Russia's inability to give guaranties for carrying out its own promises and treaties, when it does not even take the trouble to repudiate its original statement that their government did not feel it necessary to observe any treaties.

Mr. President, the United States can be of great service to the peace of the world, and it has been of service. It is the only nation that has as yet rendered any real service toward the return to normal condition and to the advance toward the peace and security of the world; but the return to normal conditions will not be accomplished by foreign alliances or through rash ventures in recognitions where the outlook is so uncertain and the results are so indefinite as in the case of Russia.

We hear it constantly said that "something ought to be done." In this case the something that ought to be done is definitely stated: That we should recognize the Russian Soviet Government, and that proposition it is possible to discuss and deal with; but most of these demands for something to be done avoid entirely a statement of what ought to be done. The difficulty is in finding what it is possible to do. In fact, it is never stated. We are left with a vague demand that "something ought to be done." No responsible body can act on such nebulous demands as that.

The American people have no desire, in my judgment, to enter into war for the purpose of making some other country do something or pay something, and governments can not afford to indulge in threats or in lectures unless they are prepared to carry out the threats or stand behind the advice they give.

I think the United States can be of more service to the world free, as it is to-day, and desiring only to be of service, rendering substantial service whenever opportunity arises, than by any useless complications, without plan or clear intent, in which it might involve itself in Europe.

APPENDIX.

SUMMARY OF ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA.

"A fundamental question at this time is the preservation of the essential bases of international intercourse through the demand for the recognition of valid titles acquired in accordance with existing law and for the maintenance of the sanctity of contracts and of adequate means of enforcing them. Intercourse, from the standpoint of business, consists in the making of contracts and the acquisition of property rights. Nations may adopt what policies they please for the future conduct of their local affairs, and if these policies are not enlightened the result will inevitably be that production will languish and trade will shrivel up, and they will look in vain for security and confidence. Still they will be within their rights in determing their future policy in local matters. But if they seek international intercourse, they must perform international obligations. When they have invited intercouse with other nations, have established their laws under which contracts have been made and property rights validly acquired, they put themselves outside the pale of international intercourse if they enter upon a policy of confiscation. International relations proceed upon the postulates of international morality, and the most important principle to be maintained at this time with respect to international relations is that no State is entitled to a place within the family of nations if it destroys the foundation of honorable intercourse by resort to confiscation and repudiation, and fails to maintain an adequate system of government through which valid rights and valid engagements are recognized and enforced. This is in the obvious interest of business, and this is merely a way of saying that this course is vital to the prosperity of all peoples, for the activities of business are those of production and exchange, upon which the welfare of peoples inevitably depend. If profits are anticipated through a departure from this clear path of honorable dealing, they will be found to be illusory.

"The question of relations with Soviet Russia may be approached from two angles; (1) that of the practical benefits which might be expected to flow from a reestablishment of relations; and (2) that of the moral and legal effect of such a step.

"As to the first, there is no doubt that the economic situation in Soviet Russia is desperate and that in its fundamentals it is still retrograding. Note the attached article (annex A) by Rykoff, one of the leading economists and most prominent members of the Bolshevik governing group. A more complete statement of the situation is contained in the pamphlet (annex B) published by the American Bankers' Association and based upon official reports in the files of the Department of Commerce. An article in the Nation for January 3, 1923, entitled 'A Kuzbas Chronicle,' throws interesting side lights on the general situation in Russia. See also London dispatch in the New York Times of December 5, 1922, headed 'Warned Hillman of Risk in Russia.'

"It is clear that the present economic situation in Russia affords no basis for a sustained foreign trade. See statement of June 12, 1922, by Mr. Hoover (annex C). Since 1920 this Government has imposed no restrictions on trade with Soviet Russia, and a certain amount of trade has occurred sporadically. That this trade has not been greater can be explained only by the absence of a basis for trade in Russia. It can not be attributed to the failure of this Government to grant political recognition or conclude a trade agreement. Neither the British trade agreement of March 16, 1921, nor the German-Russian treaty of Rapallo has had important commercial results. The remedy of the situation is not in the power of any foreign government, but awaits action by those who have imposed upon Russia a destructive economic régime.

"As to the moral and legal effect of a reestablishment of relations under present conditions—point (2) above—reference should be made to a statement—Annex D—of the Secretary of State in an address before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, May 18, 1922. The repudiation of the international obligations of the Russian Government and the nationalization or confiscation, decreed in 1917, of private property of citizens of other States which had been lawfully acquired have not been revoked. The proceedings of the Genoa and Hague conferences disclosed no intention on the part of the present controlling group in Russia to consent to alter effectively their policy in this respect.

"Internal production has reached a fairly stationary point, with agricultural output about two-thirds of pre-war and manufacturing and mining output about one-fourth.

"In the absence of any material change in policy or any extensive incoming of foreign capital, these conditions are likely to continue with no considerable change for a good many years to come, there being no prospect of improvement but a probability that production will decline, only rather slowly.

"1. Unless the Bolsheviks materially change their policy in favor of private operation of industry and unless foreign capital comes in in large quantities—which it will only do if policies so change—there is no prospect of any appreciable increase in either agricultural or industrial production, but decline is likely to be comparatively slow.

"2. Agriculture: The peasants will continue to produce, if they can, enough to feed themselves and will probably try to produce enough to pay the Government taxes and to have a small surplus for exchange for other commodities. The great bulk of the population being agricultural, production will not be allowed to go below a certain minimum if the peasants can help it. Although there has been a great reduction in the number of live stock, there are sufficient, except in the famine regions, to keep up approximately the present output. Although there is lack of new agricultural machinery, either imported from abroad or made in large Russian factories, the peasants can continue, more or less indefinitely, to get plows, scythes, and simple tools which are absolutely necessary by reworking the available old iron in small local shops.

"3. The peasants will continue to lack the incentive for any large increase in production unless the soviet authorities allow them to export on their own account, or unless they change their policy toward private capital, that it can come in, increase domestic production, and provide more goods for the peasants to buy with any surplus. Should this additional incentive be forthcoming, there might be a slow increase in production even without foreign credit for agricultural implements, tractors, live stock, etc.

"4. Little as the peasant cares for the Bolshevik régime, he will try to continue to produce enough to pay moderate taxes rather than to have trouble with the officials. He will also try to produce enough to support the purely local industries of the village and market town which furnish him with goods. However, there is nothing to keep the Russian peasant communities from continuing to exist with very little relation to the outside world.

"Mining and manufacturing: The soviet authorities can keep on running their mining and manufacturing industries after a fashion for a more or less indefinite period. If present policies continue, the production of these industries will probably fall, but not very rapidly. The decline will result chiefly from two causes—gradual wearing out of equipment and shortage of raw materials, due to lack of incentive among the peasants to produce them beyond the requirements of home industries. With the present organization of management and the present methods of paying wages, there is no reason to expect a further decline in the efficiency of management or of labor or a further lowering of incentive. The soviet régime is not likely to have greater difficulty in securing food for the workers or in disposing of the products of industry or in financing than it has had in the past year.

"There is likely, even in the near future, to be a very decided decline in cotton-goods production in Russia. The domestic output of raw cotton is at a minimum and is hardly likely to increase. The soviet régime is likely to use a considerable proportion of its meager resources for foreign purchases in the purchase of cotton.

"Exports. The exports of Russia are likely to increase somewhat above the present extremely small figures, even though domestic production is stationary or declining. The soviet régime, forced to buy certain things from abroad, will concentrate its efforts on production of things which it can send abroad, such as forest products, petroleum, and flax. However, Russian imports are likely to decline because of the exhaustion of the gold supply.

"Transportation. The transportation situation is roughly similar to that of mining and manufacturing industries. The railroads can probably continue to operate after a fashion, with a slow decline in carrying capacity. Just at present the proportion of locomotives out of repair is stationary, or has been improved slightly, but this is largely due to the import of locomotives, which will have to stop soon for lack of means of payment. In fact, no new orders are being placed. The condition of the railroad tracks is gradually deteriorating, especially for lack of ties, but there is no likelihood of any sudden breakdown.

"As yet practically nothing has been done toward restoring property to former owners, domestic or foreign, or toward offering sufficiently attractive terms to new foreign capital. Lenin admitted specifically in a speech in December that concessions to foreign concerns so far had amounted to nothing. There have been practically none of the so-called mixed companies formed in which the Soviet Government and private capital—domestic or foreign—participate.

"The degree of recognition which Soviet Russia has gained from Germany, England, and certain other countries has apparently had little effect on internal conditions in Russia or on the actual business relations between Russia and foreign countries. The fact that there is more trade between Soviet Russia and these countries than between Russia and the United States, France, and other countries which have not taken such steps, is naturally due to primary economic causes. There has been practically no more investment of capital in Russia from countries which have treaties with her than from other countries. It is the condition and policies in Russia itself which limit trade and investment."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this has been, if not a relevant discussion, as far as the pending measure is concerned, one of the most interesting, if not absolutely the most interesting, I have listened to at the present session of Congress. I am a little fond of historical reminiscences myself. I hope the Senator from Idaho is right and that the Soviet Government of Russia is partially repentant and is partially reformed, although I find it somewhat difficult to believe either in their repentance or their reform from what little knowledge I have.

I am heartily in accord with one thing he said—that is, his statement of the general principle of recognizing a de facto government. I do not believe we ought to wait until a government becomes thoroughly de jure, but the moment it has the power of governing its own country, it ought to be recognized. Of course, there are exceptions to that rule.

The practical reasons why the present Russian Government has not been recognized by any civilized power, as far as I now recall, are twofold; in the first place and chiefly because, as the Senator from Massachusetts announced, they declared as a principle of government for themselves that they would not keep faith with capitalistic governments; that no contract with a capitalistic government was binding upon the workingmen and the soldiers of Russia—the soviet—they having a government where nobody rules except the workingmen and the soldiers.

The second great practical trouble in the way has been the French peasant. The French peasants hold millions of rubles of Russian bonds, and no government of France could last over night which recognized the Soviet Government without giving the French peasant some plausible reason to believe that he would be paid the debt which he holds.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the French peasant will not get anything under the present procedure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is another question. I am merely dwelling now upon the practical reasons why the recognition has not been given, not upon the wisdom or the folly of the policy. So far as I am concerned, were I czar, or sole ruler, or anything of that sort, I would recognize the de facto government of Russia and allow it to jog along on its way. I do not see how it would do any of us any harm. I am not afraid of Russian propaganda—in Mississippi, at any rate—and I am not afraid of anybody, outside the hotbeds of the proletariats in a few centers in America, and if they run crazy we can hold them down.

The real trouble with Russia is easily stated. The day after the revolution somebody in the cloakroom said something about it and expressed the hope that they had started a régime of freedom and law. I said I hoped so, too. But the trouble with the Russians is that their ruling classes are corrupt and their lower classes are ignorant, and they have no middle class. If you tried to arouse a lot of soldiers and workingmen in America to declare that they alone had the right to govern the country, those of us who belong to the middle class would get down in the gutter with them and shoot them. We would not need an army; we would fight for our own property and for the property of the children to come after us. If a part of this country carried on a very brave warfare for five years, a warfare in which there was a question of doubtful right of property, you can imagine that the people of America would carry on a warfare forever before they would allow a lot of communists to take from their children their heritage.

But that is not the case in Russia. Russia has not any bourgeoisie, although they are always cursing the bourgeoisie. They have no middle class, virtually—not one of any strength, none of any stamina, none of any great numbers, and therefore none of any great courage; none that can defend itself or that has the stamina to defend itself. That is the trouble.

The French peasant was almost as illiterate as the Russian peasant, but the French peasant was not ignorant or stupid. He was one of the quickest human beings on earth. He was not bound up in a little bit of a commune without any knowledge of anything in the world outside. The French peasant had one of the brightest minds that the earth has ever in all its history come in contact with; and many of the French peasants who could not read or write were fit for high military command or for legislative confidence and trust. That is not the case with the Russian peasant.

Heaven only knows what is going to become of Russia. I do not think the Senator from Idaho knows, I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts knows, and I know I do not know. It reminds me a little bit of one of my little grandchildren talking to another, telling a story. This little one said, "Now, John, I am going to tell you a tale that you do not know, and that papa does not know, and that mama does not know, and that grandpa does not know, and even grandma does not know, and that I do not know"; and she proceeded to manufacture a tale.

The discussion is very interesting; but as far as I can see it does not lead to the defeat of the miserable bill which is now before the Senate. I saw, of course, that the Senator from Washington was enjoying it from the very beginning when the Senator from Idaho opened his lips to the very end when the Senator from Massachusetts shut his; and then I thought that he is such a good-natured and patient man and so fond of this discussion of the merchant marine bill that I would perhaps make a few remarks myself if for no other purpose than to express an absolute lack of coffidence in the conclusions drawn by either of the two, thereby putting myself, of course, upon a footing of equality with them in the matter of the expression of opinion, following the example of many Federal courts, where the court is always divided and does not consider itself very august unless it is.

One thing the Senator from Idaho said I want to notice seriously. He said we would drive the Russians into cooperation or alliance with the Germans, and with the Turks, and he might have added, with the Bulgarians. Bless his heart, it is not a question of driving them into it; they have been inviting it all along. They have invited the Turkish cooperation, they have invited the cooperation of the present government of Germany, and they have been inviting Bulgaria to come in. So that, in addition to the fact that they have declared, as a great governmental principle, that a real free government, controlled entirely by workingmen and soldiers and peasants, can not keep faith with capitalistic governments, classing all the balance of the governments on the earth as capitalistic governments, there is further the fact that they have been working for these alliances for quite a long while, not being driven to this sort of thing but working for it. But I believe this far with the Senator from Idaho, I do not think that they would be so prone to invite that sort of thing if we could satisfy their pride, or their vanity, or their sense of justice or right, which ever it may be, by recognizing them as a de facto government, and I do not believe that their being recognized as a de facto government would hurt any sentiment or interest or principle in the United States.

PROPOSED CESSION OF CERTAIN WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. President, I did not come into the Senate this evening for the purpose of discussing the Russian situation. I came in not for the purpose of discussing that but to read a reply to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who wants us to annex most of the West Indian Islands. I happened to come across a little article in a newspaper, the Rocky Mountain News, and its "entitlement," as the darkies say, is, "Who has an island?" It is so apropos as a reply to this island hunger of the Senator from Missouri that I thought the Senate ought to be possessed of a knowledge of it. The article reads:

WHO HAS AN ISLAND?

[From the Rocky Mountain News.]

The British acceptance of the American proposal for funding the debt due us for war loans has somewhat discouraged those who have been advocating the transfer of the British West Indies to American sovereignty. Their desire for the accumulation of insular properties, however, remains, and they now propose the acquirement of an odd lot of French islands, including two off the coast of Newfoundland and two in the Caribbean Sea.

This playful picking up of islands is a harmless amusement for a wet afternoon or a winter evening when the radio set is out of order. All one needs is a good atlas, conveniently spread open beneath a strong light. The latter is essential, because some of the islands are so small that one is apt to mistake a period for a valuable—not to say menacing—foreign possession. The use of a reading glass will be found helpful.

When British and French possibilities have been exhausted the game can be prolonged by hunting for the Dutch islands. There are six of them in the Caribbean, according to an authoritative list. The discovery of the sixth, which has an area of 5 square miles, might properly constitute the winning point.

Now, Mr. President, as an incident to this island-hunting greed that is sought to be cultivated, we would have to annex the populations just as well, and that would involve annexing some millions more of Americans of African descent, West Indies Americans. That might perhaps result in encouraging another favored American game, that of lynching bees. It might be possible to persuade some of the citizens of Illinois to direct their gaze toward the West Indies darkies and quit lynching white folks in their own State. There are a great many possibilities connected with this endless business of piling up islands with their populations.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri stated that there was an absolute mania in the United States for giving things away, that the American people wanted to give everything away. Some of the Senators present did not know that that was one of his jokes. I knew it, but they did not know it. There was not a smile upon the countenance of any of them.

How absolutely accurately that accords with our past history. We gave away most of the territory to the Indians as rapidly as we could make treaties with them. Then, under a threat, we gave France the Louisiana territory, and then, under a threat, after old Andrew Jackson invaded the ground, we gave Florida to Spain. Then after a while, under threats, I suppose, I do not know how it happened, somehow or other we added Texas with a view of giving her away, accepting her as trustee. Then, after the Mexican War, we gave away most of the territory of the country in which dwell these western Senators who now form the farm bloc.

Our entire history has been absolutely altruistic and unselfish. We never have grabbed any land, either from the Indian, the white man, or anybody else. Some of our people thought while we had both oceans as boundaries, while we had a friendly country speaking the same language on the north of us as a boundary, and we could not make a second pounce upon Mexico without some good excuse, that now maybe we would suffer. Bless your heart, not a bit of it. We went down into the West Indies and we gave ourselves Porto Rico. Then we went 12,000 miles away from home and we gave ourselves the Philippine Archipelago, including the Moros down in the Sulu Islands.

What a wonderful record we have by any comparison with Great Britain and all other countries for unselfishness. We have never been annexationists. We have annexed nothing. Everything just fell into our laps and we could not refuse it. Somebody said, "Oh, well, having fallen into our laps, who is going to haul down the flag?" Nobody wanted to haul down the flag, and so we went on until we got stepping-stones pretty much around the earth, with some wanting some more. I believe it was Samuel Butler, in Hudibras, who said:

> Compound for sins you are inclined to,
> By damning those you have no mind to.

So the Senator spent a right long time swearing at Great Britain because she was always trying to annex territory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator forgot Hawaii.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; the Senator from Nebraska reminds me that Hawaii also fell into our laps. We sent missionaries out there to Christianize and civilize the natives. We gave them Christianity and civilization, and we got all of their other possessions and then we annexed them. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Chair must admonish occupants of the galleries that demonstrations of approval or disapproval are not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the way, Mr. President, the Senator talked quite awhile upon the fact that we had given Cuba her freedom. That was an accident. While the Spanish war measure was under consideration some Senator in this body—I have forgotten now just which Senator it was—seeing further ahead than most of them, offered a resolution saying that we had no idea of annexing Cuba and pledging our faith and our honor that we never would. Now, although we belong to the so-called Anglo-Saxon race and although the Latin nations are partially correct in saying that Anglo-Saxon public policies and church professions are very frequently hypocritical, there is a limit at which the Anglo-Saxon stops. He is willing to be hypocritical, but he is not willing to be caught at it. So after the war was over we did not annex Cuba. If it had not been for that resolution we would have done it. Then we concluded that was a mistake, so we quietly annexed Porto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago.

Mr. President, there is nothing like complimenting one's self. A man may compliment himself so often that after a while he will begin to feel that he is really good, that he is pretty nearly an angel, that he is thoroughly altruistic and awfully unselfish. Every race has its faults. Perhaps the racial vice of the negro is lust. Perhaps the vice of the Hindu is a desire to do nothing. But the vice of the white man is greed. All this hypocritical talk about carrying the other man's burden is nonsense. We are the burden and we are on his back, and we carry ourselves wherever we can and make ourselves a burden to him. It is not the white man's burden. It is the other man's burden, and the white man is the burden instead of bearing the burden.

The greediest animal that God has created is the white human being. Perhaps his greed has led to his being in the forefront files of time, just as discontent leads a man to progress. Perhaps if it had not been for his greed some other race would be ruling the world to-day instead of his. But, at any rate, that is his greed. I do not know of any nationality of the white race that has any right to throw the charge of greed in the face of any other. It would be a very delicate intellect, indeed, as delicate as the finest apothecary's scale, that could determine whether the white population of the British Empire or the white population of these United States had been the greediest. The British Empire has a little bit more to show for its greed, because it has been in existence a great deal longer, but that is about all. After we got into the race we gave her 2 and beat her at a game of 3, and we do it all along.

By the way, I almost forgot to mention it. We were not satisfied in our early history with going to the forty-ninth degree in the Pacific, but we also invited the Czar of Russia to give us Alaska, in trust for him, I suppose, or it may be for the Eskimos or somebody else. We are making a very valuable thing out of that.

The Senator from Missouri was particularly dwelling, however, upon the Isle of Pines. Oh, Mr. President, how well do I remember an eloquent Senator from the State of Indiana one day describing how the streams in the Philippines rolled the gold down to the seas when he was persuading the American people to give away to themselves the Philippine Islands.

I remember that when he got through with the picture of it, half of America felt like they would each be about a thousand dollars richer next morning if we could just annex the Philippine Islands. I remember that three-fourths of that half, or nine-tenths of it, never had heard of the Philippine Islands in all their lives except perhaps one day in school when maybe they struck it in a geography lesson, and nine-tenths of the American people did not know anything about it except that Manila hats probably came from Manila, or perhaps Manila straw came from there. Immediately they discovered that the possession of the Philippine Islands was absolutely necessary to our happiness, our stability, and our safety, and that if we did not take them maybe Germany would, forgetful of the fact that the Philippine Islands were thousands of miles farther away from us than Berlin was. But they talked as if the Philippine Islands were right in our backyard and if Germany got them she would be disturbing our hen roost all night long.

But even then the Senator from Indiana was almost outdistanced this morning when my friend from Missouri described the Isle of Pines as a winter resort. Oh, the things that were in it and the things that we might have if we but had it! He finally closed by saying that it was a paradise. Well, Mr. President, it is a paradise right now, but would it be a paradise after we annexed it, with Wheeler, the head of the Anti-Saloon League, down there to govern it? I am inclined to think there would not be so much enthusiasm for the Isle of Pines if it were known it was coming under the Volstead Act.

Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will not think that I am cooperating with him in this wicked effort to filibuster against all the useful legislation needed in the country by consuming all the time possible in the consideration of the shipping bill. I hope he will remember the extreme relevancy of the observations of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is the titular, the nominal, if not the real leader, when he was speaking a longer time than I have been at it.

I merely ask him to measure me by the same standard and to remember if what I have said has had nothing to do with the merchant marine that the remarks of other Senators have not had much to do with it either. But I ask him also to remember that if it was not for my opposition to taking the Isle of Pines very possibly he would have to build three or four or five or six more ships to carry on commerce with the Isle of Pines, and that would lead to an annual charge that might possibly amount to more within an average lifetime than the Isle of Pines would sell at under the hammer.

Everybody who knows me knows how very careful I am about my business. I am not as careful about anything else in the world except, perhaps, my clothes, but I am careful about business; and I always like to cooperate with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or any other real business man. I am opposed to taking the Isle of Pines, because if it has many pines it will conflict with our interests, and a tariff on lumber would not do us any good. I am opposed to it because it would add to the expenses of a shipping board as long as it is in existence or add to the subsidy for shipping after we annexed it.

Mr. President, I am also a little bit opposed to annexing six or eight million more darkies in the West Indies. I like darkies in their place and they like me, but we have just about enough of them right now, and we do not want any more. While we are throwing up bars against the immigration of white people from Europe, I do not want to go out and annex six or eight millions of colored people down in the West Indies, especially that class of colored people who have been taught the very valuable to them and very destructive to the white race lessons of social and political equality.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield willingly and gladly.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator from Mississippi wants to remember that the colored men voted the Democratic ticket in New York last fall.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My heavens, Mr. President, I did not hear of that. [Laughter.] I did not know anything about it. There have been only three elections since the Civil War, I believe, when without the colored vote the Democrats would not have won; possibly there have been four, but certainly three elections were carried by the Republican Party by the white vote without any regard to the darkies in the doubtful States; but, Mr. President, I always did have a certain amount of ultimate confidence in the darkies, especially my own darkies, and I always thought that perhaps some of these days their sentiments, if not their intellects, would cause them to see who were their true friends. It may be that they are going to try the Democratic Party for awhile, and after that disappoints them they may try the Republican Party a little while longer, fluctuating between the two parties in the hopeless effort to secure social equality between whites and blacks. I do not think either party will ever quite establish the fact that the darkies are white men with black skins, any more than they will ever establish the fact that donkeys are mules with longer ears. [Laughter.] I think there are certain inherited and inherent racial differences of which color and kinks of hair are the mere outward and visible signs. A man may have an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual disgrace. I believe that is a quotation from the prayer book, or it is very nearly so, though it may be wrong in one syllable.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not literal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But at any rate, if their object in voting the Democratic ticket was merely to declare their lack of confidence in the Republican Party, for once they were about right, because neither darkey nor white man has any right to have any confidence in it from the way it has been operating in the last two or three years. I believe even the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] would agree with me about that. [Laughter.] He might not have more confidence in the Democrats, but certainly I do not believe he would say that he had any in his own crowd.

However, Mr. President, I rose partly for the purpose of getting this gem from the Rocky Mountain News into the RECORD. Is not this game of islands a great game? You sit down with a big map spread out in front of you, have a bright electric light thrown on it, then get a large magnifying reading glass and look all over the map, discover all the islands you can, see which ones of them you can take in, how much money you can pay for them, and then just charge off that much debt to France and to Great Britain. Belgium has not any islands, but we might get Holland to help Belgium out by putting a few of her islands in, for there is no telling how far altruism might go.

I forgot to mention a moment ago that we allowed ourselves to give ourselves the Danish Islands, amongst the other possessions that we are giving away all the time, according to the Senator from Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator is exactly right. We are always giving things, but we are always giving them to ourselves, somehow. When we can not give them by fighting we give them in some other way.

The real God's honest truth is, we acquired Louisiana because Mr. Jefferson practically threatened that America would marry herself to British power and the British fleet, and then Napoleon knew that Louisiana would be gone; that America on land and the British fleet together would prevent him from reinforcing it or holding the territory even if he succeeded in getting reinforcements there. We ought not really to speak of the "Louisiana purchase"; it was the Louisiana purchase on the face of the papers, but it was the lessen contained in the secret diplomatic clauses that was in Napoleon's mind. He never would have sold that vast territory for $15,000,000 except for the fact that he knew that if America did not fight to keep Great Britain from seizing the territory Great Britain would seize it; and he foresaw that Great Britain would be very willing for us to take it provided we came in on her side. That was about the truth.

We not only rather coerced the Florida purchase, but old Andy Jackson went down and invaded the territory, fought everything in sight, hung three British subjects, and then afterwards got so mad because the Secretary of State questioned his right to invade foreign territory and hang three British subjects, somebody having censured him for it, that he and Thomas H. Benton spent pretty nearly the balance of their official lives trying to get the censure removed; and finally they did get it removed; so that the Journal of this most august body to-day stands with various lines run through it and others rubbed out.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. STANLEY. I dislike to take up the Senator's valuable time, but will he kindly yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will for a few moments, but not longer, because the Senator from Washington is becoming just a little impatient, although he became impatient before the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] sat down.

Mr. STANLEY. I realize that the time of the Senator is limited and I hesitate to intrude at too great length, but I have always thought a great deal of "Old Hickory," and while I hesitate to question the historical accuracy of a great scholar like the Senator from Mississippi, I think he has given Andy one too many, for my recollection is he hung two and not three British subjects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps so, but that was not Andy's fault, for he would have hung another if there had been any more he cared to hang.

Mr. LODGE. They were hanged in Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; they were hanged in Florida, for Andy did not even take the trouble to bring them over the line.

Mr. LODGE. Their names were Arbuthnot and Armbrister.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; one was an Englishman and the other was a Scotchman.

Mr. President, I will inquire if any other Senator can suggest food for thought by asking me a question? [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I seem to have exhausted both subjects, and very nearly exhausted myself; I do not want to exhaust the audience, and therefore I will cut this discussion off without completing it, especially as I have about reached the point which the boy described in a baseball game when he said that the game never was played; they quit it right in the middle; they got to a point where they could not finish it to save their lives.

Mr. President, I hope that no Senator will take up any time unnecessarily. [Laughter.] I hope that all Senators will be considerate of the feelings of Senators on the Democratic side of the Chamber who are anxious to have the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] stop the filibuster which he is carrying on by keeping the ship subsidy bill before the Senate, to the delay, if not the denial, of important legislation which concerns the welfare of the people, which will be beneficial to them, and which the newly elected representatives of the people want to see enacted. With that parting prayer and injunction, Mr. President, I surrender the floor.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the filled milk bill, so called.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to occupy a few moments of the Senate's time with reference to a letter written yesterday by Secretary Mellon to Mr. MCFADDEN, chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency. I have not a copy of the letter, although I have read it; and in such remarks as I now make I shall have to content myself with such portions as appear in the public press this morning.

Mr. President, Secretary Mellon—as is, of course, within his rights—condemns utterly and completely all those portions of the rural credit bill known as the Lenroot-Anderson bill, recently passed by the Senate with a unanimous vote, that set up in farm-land banks a separate personal-credits department and are designed to afford to the farmers of this country an intermediate credit running from six months to three years.

I pass for the moment the fact that the bill now condemned by the Secretary of the Treasury has been approved by the President of the United States, has been approved by the Federal Reserve Board, has been approved by the Senate of the United States by a unanimous vote, and, last but not least, has been approved in all its essential principles by Mr. Mellon himself. The fact is that the bill has not been changed in its essential particulars, but the views of the Secretary of the Treasury have changed.

Mr. President, in his letter, in which he also incloses a memorandum analyzing the bill in detail, the Secretary condemns that which he himself approved in a letter which I have before me, dated February 16, 1922.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator referred to a letter. Was that published in the morning paper?

Mr. LENROOT. Just extracts from it.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator that letter in full?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not. I have seen it, but I have not yet been able to get a copy of it in full.

In this letter the Secretary makes the statement that the bill as passed by the Senate never received the approval of the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry. Mr. Mellon ignores the fact that five Senators were members of that commission and every one of them voted for the bill as it passed the Senate. If there could be any clearer expression of the views of the Senate members of that commission than their votes for it, I do not know how it could be expressed. In addition, while it is true that the commission has never met and formally approved the bill as it passed the Senate, it has the approval of every Senator, and I happen to know that in its present form it has the approval of a majority of the House members; and yet Mr. Mellon in his letter would have the House understand and the public understand that the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry does not approve the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I have not seen the letter; but does Secretary Mellon state the ground of his condemnation?

Mr. LENROOT. He does.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator is going to discuss that.

Mr. LENROOT. I am, in part. As I say, I have not the letter, and I must content myself with using such extracts as appeared in the paper this morning. One of them—quoting from the Washington Post—is as follows:

> Mr. Mellon said that, contrary to current reports, the Joint Agricultural Commission never had indorsed the Lenroot-Anderson bill in its present form, which, he asserted, "differed radically from the bill which the commission indorsed."

He further—> declared the financial provisions of the Lenroot-Anderson bill to be "dangerous" on the whole, and its administrative provisions to be "unworkable."

Mr. President, what are the essential differences in principle between the bill as passed by the Senate and the bill as originally reported by the Agricultural Commission? There is only one. The bill as reported by the Agricultural Commission did not give the benefits of the bill to cooperative banks nor to agricultural credit companies. The bill as passed by the Senate did give cooperative banks and agricultural credit companies the benefits of the bill. That is the only respect, so far as any principle is concerned, in which it differs from the original bill. There were, however, other material differences. The bill as originally reported, for instance, provided for a capitalization of $1,000,000 for the personal-credit side of each farm-land bank, or a total of $12,000,000 in all, while the bill as passed provided for a capital of $5,000,000 for each bank, or $60,000,000 in all, and with a possibility of that being increased an additional $60,000,000.

It is also true that the commission reported against extending agricultural paper eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system from six months to nine months, and the bill makes it nine months; but Mr. Mellon can not complain of that, because he himself approves of that in his letter.

So, Mr. President, there is only one distinction so far as principle is concerned, between the bill when it was approved by Mr. Mellon and the bill which he now condemns. I want to read Mr. Mellon's approval of the bill last year. He said last year in a letter to the chairman of the Agricultural Commission:

> The bill now before the committee, it seems to me, affords a good basis for this sort of permanent legislation, and I think in general it follows sound lines.

To-day he says the lines followed are extremely dangerous. He said:

> I understand that the Federal Reserve Board has already approved it, and the Federal Farm Loan Board, though mindful of the greatly increased responsibilities which it would entail, believes that it can be made workable. The farm-loan commissioner may in this connection wish to make several suggestions as to the details of the bill which relate to the administration of the farm-loan system. The Treasury, as already indicated, would like to see the provision as to subscription of the capital of the farm-credits departments changed so as to throw subscriptions open to the public, and relieve the Treasury to that extent of the obligation to subscribe. With this change, and the minor changes suggested, the Treasury would offer no objections to the bill, and would, in fact, be glad to see it enacted into law.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator point out what the real differences were in principle between the bill which he approved and the one which he now disapproves?

Mr. LENROOT. I thought I just did so. There is only one, and that is that the bill as reported by the commission did not give the benefits of the system to agricultural credit companies and rural credit companies; the bill as passed by the Senate did. But how easy it would have been, if the Secretary thought that was a dangerous provision, to have suggested to the chairman of the House committee that it was dangerous, and that that provision could have been eliminated from the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think there is another difference which should be stated, in justice to the Secretary. The Senator has already indicated it. The Secretary repeated it before the committee when he gave his testimony. He made strong objection to the subscription to stock by the Treasury.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that; but that was in the bill as reported by the commission; it has not been changed. The bill as reported by the commission did not provide for any subscription to stock. Yet the Secretary says in his letter that the bill has been radically changed; and that is the point I make.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that in discussing the bill as reported by the commission he objected also to that feature of stock subscription by the Treasury.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course. It is fair to the Secretary to say that he has never been in favor of utilizing the Treasury to any extent with reference to furnishing any of this capital, and he has been consistent in that all the way through. But what I do object to is that the Secretary is trying to make it appear by this letter that the bill has been radically changed since it was reported by the commission. It has not been radically changed, except in the one particular as to cooperative banks and rural credit companies. He says in the letter of yesterday:

> The greatest service to agriculture would be by enacting the Capper bill and withholding action on the Lenroot bill until the situation can be more thoroughly investigated. The Capper bill will go far toward satisfying the needs of those sections of the country which have suffered in the past from inadequate credit facilities. At the same time it is financially sound, and avoids exessive centralization, which constitutes a serious defect in the Lenroot bill.

There is no greater centralization in the bill as it passed the Senate than there was in the bill when Secretary Mellon approved it—not a particle.

In this connection I want to repeat what I stated when the Capper bill was up. None, except Mr. Mellon and other enemies, apparently, of real rural credit legislation, have contended that the Capper bill would afford relief to the average farmer of the United States. The interests that pushed the Capper bill were the large live-stock interests of the country, and it was never pretended that it would be of benefit to anybody except the large live-stock interests.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to make myself plain; I make an exception of the provisions in regard to extending eligibility to the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to ask the Senator if there is any supervision provided by law over the banks which would be organized under the Capper bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; Federal supervision, similar to that of national banks.

Mr. POMERENE. That was one of the reasons for the Capper bill.

Mr. LENROOT. That was the whole reason, really.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is about all there is in the bill, when we come right down to it.

Mr. LENROOT. That is about all there is in the bill. All there is in the world in the Capper bill that is not found in the Lenroot-Anderson bill is the provision that these corporations which can not have a capital of less than $250,000 shall have the benefit of Federal supervision, so as to give their debentures a better standing in the investment world.

Mr. POMERENE. It was conceded before our committee that those corporations could now be organized under the several States, and one of the reasons for organizing them under the Federal Government was to give them this inspection.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly. That was the purpose of it, and it was conceded by everybody, and must be conceded, that the average farmer in the Middle West and in the South, the man who owns his 80 acres or 160 acres of land, whose land is mortgaged now, the man who needs credit to produce his crop would find it practically impossible to get the money to organize $250,000 corporations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I imagine the Senator from Wisconsin has in mind the question of governmental supervision over the trust companies which are provided for under the Capper bill, not the corporations.

Mr. LENROOT. Both; discount corporations and the corporations created under it for the purpose of making loans.

Mr. FLETCHER. The main provision whereby the Government is supposed to be of help in that connection is the one providing for supervision by the Government, the appointment of inspectors, and that sort of thing.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. But is it not true that the Secretary's real objection to the Lenroot bill, as we call it, is his disinclination to supply $5,000,000 to each of the Federal land banks? That seems to be the main trouble with the Secretary. He does not feel that we ought to call on the Treasury to furnish the $5,000,000 for each of the Federal land banks.

Mr. LENROOT. I am afraid there is much truth in what the Senator says, because we did not find the Secretary objecting to this bill when it was provided that only $1,000,000 should be taken out of the Treasury for each bank, but we find him objecting now to every part of the bill when it is proposed to secure $5,000,000 for each bank out of the Treasury.

I am not going to take any extended time of the Senate in a discussion of the matter at this time. I have said what I have said because I do not think it fair that this condemnation of the bill, which has passed the Senate, should go to the country without the country at the same time knowing that the same Secretary who now condemns the bill in practically all of its provisions just about a year ago approved in its essentials the same measure he now condemns.

I do not question the Secretary's sincerity, but it is very unfortunate, indeed, if the Secretary can only see, as those needing better credit facilities, the large live-stock men of the West, with large resources. It is unfortunate if the Secretary can not see the needs of the little farmer, with his 40 or 80 or 120 or 160 acres of land. It is unfortunate if the Secretary can not see that the little man, small though he be, and poor in this world's goods though he may be, is not entitled to the same consideration as a business man, as the man whose wealth may be counted in millions. The Capper bill, I repeat, makes no provision for and will be of no benefit to the average farmer of the United States.

It is suggested by the Secretary in this letter that there be no action upon any bill other than the Capper bill, and that further time be taken to investigate the question of additional rural credits for the farmer. The commission to which the Secretary has referred spent over a year in the investigation of this question. I do not know of any question that has been so thoroughly investigated or upon which Members of the Senate are better informed. But I have not heard from the Secretary of the Treasury any expression to the effect that he thought there ought to be a further investigation of the problems connected with ship subsidy, a question tenfold more complicated than is the problem of rural credits. Neither have I heard from the Secretary of the Treasury any objection upon his part to paying out of the United States Treasury the sums which will be paid out under the pending subsidy bill. So far, I only hear objection from the Secretary when we propose not to give the farmer something, but to enable him to have a facility in the use of which he will be able to pay back every dollar to the Government that it will loan him.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the Senator from Wisconsin any objection to saying whether he approves or disapproves paying out money as a subsidy, as provided in the pending bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I will be very glad to answer that question. I would not support the subsidy bill in its present form. It is possible that such amendments might be made to it that it would receive my support, and while I did not intend to touch upon that subject at this time I will take this occasion to say that I believe it is in the interest of the Government, both from an economic and financial standpoint, and to the interest of the people as a whole, to have a merchant marine for the carrying of American products to foreign lands. It is to the interest of the American people that our present Government-owned ships shall be disposed of, and the $50,000,000 loss now accruing to the Government stopped; but I am not in favor of and I should never vote for a bill which would pay enormous subsidies to floating palaces for the carrying of passengers across the Atlantic to Europe at the expense of the United States Treasury.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Wisconsin said he would not agree to vote to give subsidies to these palatial ships which cross the sea carrying passengers. Has the Senator given any thought as to just how he would operate those vessels?

Mr. LENROOT. I will be very frank with the Senator. There is only one possible reason for paying any kind of subsidy or compensation of any kind to a passenger vessel, and that is upon the theory of service as a naval vessel, and when that time comes, I do not want it put in a bill under the pretense of being a bill for the American merchant marine, but I want it placed just where it ought to be placed if it is going to come as a part of the cost of the naval defense of the country.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. In reply to the statement of the Senator from New York with reference to passenger ships, it is a well-known fact that the passenger ships plying between here and Europe have not only paid expenses but have earned a large amount above expenses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator understands, of course, that there is an amendment in the reprint of the bill which is intended to be offered to place a limit on vessels exceeding 19 knots.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand there is such an amendment, but I do not understand that it would cut off the subsidy to vessels exceeding 19 knots.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; but they would take the subsidy on the basis of 19 knots.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not be diverted from discussing the rural credits bill by any discussion that might be precipitated with reference to the ship subsidy bill. I would like to ask the Senator what the chances are for the passage of the rural credits bill which received the unanimous vote of the Senate after elaborate discussion here lasting for nearly a week. Has the Senator any information as to the possibility of its passage and what is holding it up in the House?

Mr. LENROOT. I will frankly answer the Senator that I am not very optimistic as to action in the House upon anything other than the Capper bill. I do not for a moment even indicate that I think the House should accept the bill as passed by the Senate. My only contention is that there is a need for legislation upon the subject, which Secretary Mellon has said should not be legislated upon at this time.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the commission of inquiry was composed of Members of the House and the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. It was.

Mr. SWANSON. And they were practically unanimous in reporting the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. They were.

Mr. SWANSON. The members of the commission, after a thorough investigation lasting for 12 months, reported the bill unanimously. I understand further that those Senators, some belonging to the farm bloc and others not, were interested in rural-credits legislation, and appointed a committee of five, of which I was a member, to investigate the rural credits bills. That committee, after hearings lasting for five or six months, recommended the Lenroot bill as the most feasible to pass at this session of Congress. It had the indorsement of that committee.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand now, the Senator thinks that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the views of the administration, will preclude any rural credits bill at this session of Congress?

Mr. LENROOT. Permit me to correct the Senator. Secretary Mellon's letter does not represent the views of the administration.

Mr. BORAH. That is a question on which I would like to have a little more light.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask the Senator a question. The President has selected Mr. Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury, and I thought he spoke for him in that respect. If the President disagrees with the Secretary of the Treasury I hope he will send a special communication to Congress to-morrow and urge the House to pass the measure. I can explain to the Senator why I think the Secretary of the Treasury possibly objects to the bill.

The bill, as originally reported, provided for 12 banks with a capital of $1,000,000 each, which would give a total capital of $12,000,000. That would only give $120,000,000 credits for all the farmers of the country to conduct the great agricultural industry. The committee of which I had the honor of being a member recommended that each of the banks should have $10,000,000, which carried 10 to 1, and would give $1,200,000,000 credits for all the banks, which would enable the farming communities and rural borrowers to have a credit to that extent. The committee reported the bill giving $5,000,000 to each of the 12 banks as compulsory and another $5,000,000 optional, which would give a possible credit of $120,000,000 to the farmers of the country. Under the bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury they only get $1,500,000,000.

Does the Senator think that that great increase of credit, when there is no difference in principle except in minor matters, as the Senator said, and which would make the bill potential and effective to relieve the distressed condition of the farmers, was what accounted for the Secretary of the Treasury changing his views as to the bill as it passed the Senate? It was an efficient bill and gave a possible credit of $1,200,000,000 for the rural sections of the country, a safe, sound, and reasonable proposition, exactly on the terms of the bill which the Secretary had formerly recommended, except that it went further and gave substantial relief.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not, of course, going to attempt to comment on what motive I think the Secretary of the Treasury may have had. I have already stated that he now condemns the very principles which he indorsed about a year ago in this very bill.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said he was interested in knowing whether the Secretary of the Treasury represented the views of the administration in this respect or not. I just want to read a paragraph from the President's message.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator from Wisconsin understand that the message of the President, which coupled the ship subsidy with the rural credits measure, really recommended the bill as it went over to the House from the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. I prefer to read the paragraph and let Senators judge for themselves.

Mr. SWANSON. I have read that, but I did not know whether it was a substantial indorsement of the bill then pending in the House or not. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin another question. I have noticed in the papers a statement that unless the ship subsidy bill passed the Senate there would be no rural credits legislation pass the House of Representatives; that the two were coupled together in the President's message, and the two must be coupled together as enacted legislation. I would like to have the Senator state whether he has any information as to whether the failure of progress of the ship subsidy bill in the Senate has made the condition unfavorable in the House of Representatives for the passage of the rural credits bill which passed the Senate without a dissenting vote?

Mr. LENROOT. I would not say that, but I think perhaps it is fair to say that the shoe can be put upon the other foot. I do not know whether the ship subsidy bill will ever be brought to a vote or not, or if it is brought to a vote whether it will pass; but I think it is safe to say that if the House is not going to act on the rural credits legislation there will be no ship subsidy bill passed at this session.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think there will be, from the indications here now.

Mr. LENROOT. Probably not. I am simply making that general statement.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to know if there is any truth in the statement that the rural credits bill is held up in the House for the simple reason that the ship subsidy bill is making slow progress through the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know that. I think Mr. Mellon is sincerely and honestly opposed to paying any money out of the Treasury for any such purpose as is proposed in the rural credit bill. I could understand the Secretary's attitude a great deal better if he would take the same position with reference to other matters upon which there is to be a draft upon the Treasury.

Mr. SWANSON. When the bill was making progress through the Senate and the Senator had charge of the measure, did the Senator receive any communication from the President or Secretary Mellon intimating that they opposed the bill then pending in the Senate or after it had passed the Senate by unanimous vote?

Mr. LENROOT. Secretary Mellon appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency before it had reported the measure and opposed the bill. The President has never opposed the bill, but, on the contrary, my best information is that he has favored the bill and favors it now.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator has drawn a comparison between the ship subsidy bill and the means to be used for the farmers under the terms of the Lenroot bill. The money that will be used by the farmers will all be paid back.

Mr. LENROOT. I have already stated that.

Mr. BROOKHART. While the money paid to the ship owners will be retained by them.

Mr. LENROOT. I have already stated that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will not be deterred from reading what the President had to say. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be very glad to read it. The President in his message of December 4, speaking of the subject, said:

> The Farm Loan Bureau, which already has proven its usefulness through the Federal land banks, may well have its powers enlarged to provide ample farm production credits as well as enlarged land credits. It is entirely practical to create a division in the Federal land banks to deal with production credits, with the limitations of time so adjusted to the farm turnover as the Federal reserve system provides for the turnover in the manufacturing and mercantile world. Special provision must be made for live-stock production credits, and the limit of land loans may be safely enlarged.

That is the centralization which Secretary Mellon objects to, and he condemns the President at the same time he condemns the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me that that statement of the President is an indorsement of the bill which the Senator had charge of when it passed the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the reason why I read it. Of course it is. It contains all of the essential features of the bill which passed the Senate by unanimous vote and which the Secretary of the Treasury now so vigorously condemns. Of course, the Secretary of the Treasury has a right to condemn the Senate or the President or anybody else, but I desire again to suggest that the Secretary of the Treasury might at least in the same connection have said that in his opinion he was wrong a year ago when he explicitly indorsed the principles which he now condemns.

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator made any effort to reconcile the differences between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President? Has he tried to bring them together to get those differences reconciled so we may get some legislation on the subject?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not think that is any part of the duty of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator would recommend that they do get together and agree on the measure, so we can enact it at this session, would he not?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I would not say that; but I do sincerely hope that the President of the United States, before the week is over, will make his position as clear and as emphatic in favor of the rural-credit legislation, following the Secretary's letter, as he has with reference to his position regarding the ship subsidy bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I fully agree. I hope it will be done.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. In the last message the President urged not only the enactment of a law approving of the English debt settlement but also the enactment of the ship subsidy bill. However, he said nothing about the rural-credits legislation. Does not that indicate that the President is also against rural-credits legislation?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I did not take it that way. I think the President assumed at that time that there would be no real contest in the House upon rural credit legislation. He knew there was a contest upon the ship subsidy legislation and he knew there was a contest on the British debt settlement, because he had been given notice of it. But I am going to assume that the President assumed that there would be no contest in the House over the rural credit legislation. I am going to assume that the President did not expect that the Secretary of the Treasury would take the position that he did take yesterday upon the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is satisfied the President did not change when the Secretary of the Treasury changed?

Mr. LENROOT. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I said, appeared against the bill before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has been against the bill practically from the moment that we increased the capitalization from $12,000,000 to $60,000,000, although I may do him an injustice in that. That is merely my supposition.

But, Mr. President, I am not going to pursue the matter further at this time. I only want to say in this connection that I am very much afraid the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury has destroyed any probability, or at least certainty, of legislation upon rural credits at this session of Congress other than the Capper bill. So far as the Capper bill standing alone is concerned, I think it is better that it should not become a law unless we shall at the same time that we are providing benefits for the large live-stock industry of the country do something for the average farmer of the country.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, Does he not think it would be better for the different departments of the Government to function each in its own capacity? Why is it necessary for Congress to wait for an expression from the Executive?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, that is very good in theory, but I have been in Congress a good many years, and I desire to say that I never saw a Congress so subservient to the Executive department as was the Democratic Party, to which the Senator from South Carolina belongs, during the last administration.

Mr. President, I fear that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury has destroyed the chance of securing the enactment of legislation upon the question of rural credits at this session. I hope that I am mistaken, but at this time it does appear that such is the case. It does appear that this Congress, now soon to expire, will fail to pass legislation so necessary for the farmers of America. That being so, Mr. President, I have come to the conclusion that we should at least pass such bills as are upon our calendar which are clearly for the benefit of the farmer. So when the pending motion shall be voted upon, to take up the filled milk bill, I purpose to vote in favor of that motion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, from the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, it would seem that we are not to have any farm-credits legislation at this session. I think the friends of the farmer, wherever they come from, ought to get together immediately and prevent all legislation and thereby force an extraordinary session, if necessary. No administration ought to have the unmitigated affrontery to play with the farmers as the present administration has played with them. The farmers have been deflated to the ground, they have been robbed and pillaged right and left. Now when we are trying to give them a breathing spell and get them on their feet again, giving them some sort of legislation which will aid them to obtain money with which to carry on their business, the other branch of Congress, it seems, is about to tie it up; and the mournful notes that come from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the author of one of those bills, are enough to put us on notice and to arouse our fighting spirit. So let us go to work in earnest and cooperate, to the end that nothing more shall be done until this farm-credits legislation is put through.

We have the power here to do it, Senators. There are, I believe, enough friends of agriculture in Congress, if we will get together earnestly and intelligently, to stop everything and force action. And now, instead of discussing the ship subsidy bill, let us proceed to discuss the treatment of the farmers of America by the administration. Let us at least tell the country that Mr. Mellon's suggestions about legislation to grant relief to the farmers of America are not in accord with the views of those who really represent the farmers of the country. I say this with all respect to him. I would not accept a measure which Mr. Mellon would write for the relief of the farmers of the country. Mr. Mellon's environments have been and are such that he is not in sympathy, as I am and some of you are, with the farming class of the people. The small business man, the man in the common walks of life, the little fellow, the cross-roads merchant, the one-horse farmer, never crossed his mental vision. He deals in millions; he himself is an immensely wealthy man, one of the richest in the world; and he has been in that atmosphere so long that he does not know how to sympathize with this class of people who now number in this Government seventy-odd millions out of our 110,000,000 of people.

I merely rose to say this much, Mr. President, that we ought to get together and earnestly do something to force legislation. That is not too strong a term to use. What are we here for? We ought not to permit the two other appropriation or deficiency bills which have got to go through this body to pass; we ought to force the President to call Congress in extraordinary session if that is necessary. Everything that the special interests have desired has gone through except the ship subsidy bill, and we are being held here from 11 o'clock in the morning until midnight as they strive to put that through. The farmers of America, who feed the American people with their toil and with their produce, are about to be kicked out in the cold and Congress is to adjourn with no manner of credit legislation enacted for the farmer. I am willing to join in a movement to enact legislation for their benefit.

RESIDENCE FOR THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I rise to speak briefly of another than the pending matter.

Several weeks ago a public-spirited, patriotic, generous-hearted woman tendered to the Government of the United States a residence for the Vice President of the United States. This was done in memory of her distinguished husband, Hon. John B. Henderson, who was a Senator of the United States from Missouri during the trying period of the Civil War and in memory of her son, Mr. John B. Henderson, jr., who was a distinguished student and scientist.

I am one of those who have felt for a long time that the Government of the United States, rich as it is, ought to furnish a residence for our Vice President, the second official in dignity in the Government. We pay him, I believe, the munificent sum of $12,000 a year, which is not enough to pay the expenses of himself and family so as to permit them to live consistently with the dignity of his official position. The Government of Haiti, with about 2,000,000 population, pays its president $25,000 a year.

The tender of this edifice for the official residence of the Vice President was referred, if I am rightly informed, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The newspapers report that the committee after having duly considered the matter refused the gift because it would entail an additional expense of $15,000. I submit the Government of the United States ought to pay a larger salary to the Vice President than it does, or it ought to furnish a residence for him.

This munificent gift was tendered to the United States; it would cost the Government nothing, and I am a little at a loss to understand why the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should refuse the gift. Again, I can not understand how that committee of any other committee has the authority to refuse that gift. It is for the Congress of the United States to determine whether it will receive it or not. With all due respect to the action of the committee, I submit that whether or not we shall accept that gift is a question to be determined by the Congress, and it ought to have been referred to the Senate for its action upon a report from the committee, whether favorable or unfavorable. I regret that there is this seeming indifference toward the generosity of this very estimable woman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is temporarily out of the Chamber, because he has given a great deal of study to the question to which the distinguished Senator from Ohio has referred, and the views of the Senator from Maine in respect to the proposal would be most enlightening to the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I am a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and was present during all the consideration of this question, and I am very frank to give my own views and what I think became the views of the committee. We had before us the sole question as to whether the gift should be accepted. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had no jurisdiction as to the matter of fixing the salary or allowances for the Vice President of the United States. To have accepted the gift unless before it was utilized Congress should make proper provision for its maintenance or increase the salary of the Vice President would mean one of two things: We would bankrupt any man of average means who happened to be Vice President of the United States or in the future make it possible only for millionaires to accept a nomination as Vice President of the United States. The position of the committee was that if Congress will at any time make proper provision for the Vice President of the United States, so that he may maintain such an establishment, the gift would not only be accepted but unanimously accepted.

Mr. CURTIS. Was not the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds advised that the Committee on Appropriations had been practically polled, and that the indications were that the committee was favorable to making the needed appropriations for the care of the building?

Mr. LENROOT. I did not know that was true; I do not question the Senator's statement, but——

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that is true.

Mr. LENROOT. But, even if that be true, as one member of the committee I was not willing to go to the extent of accepting the gift unless it were settled beforehand that proper provision should be made for the maintenance of the property.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, was it the view of the committee that they had the right to reject that offer or to accept it?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. POMERENE. Were they not acting in an advisory capacity, and should not a report on that subject have been made to the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it would have been very much better. Of course, the committee acted upon that bill as it does upon all other bills. If it does not act favorably upon a bill, it does not report it unless there is some special request for it to be reported.

Mr. POMERENE. I can understand that; but it has seemed to me that the committee rather usurped the power of the Senate itself; and I say that with all due respect. In other words, the Senate, in my judgment, should have acted upon that bill before a communication should be sent to the donor refusing her gift.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator is quite right, especially if the communication was in the nature of a refusal. The communication, of course, should not have gone any further than the committee's action in refusing to report it favorably. Of course, the committee had no power or jurisdiction to refuse the gift, and I am very sure that the chairman of the committee, upon the suggestion, will be very glad to report the bill unfavorably and let the Senate take such action as it sees fit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think some report should be made. I do not say that it should be favorable, although if I had been a member of the committee I should have reported in favor of it, as far as I know; but, in any event, the report should have been made to the Senate and the Senate should have been allowed to act upon it.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senafor is right.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to report a bridge bill, at the request of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, carrying out the policy that we have adopted in this contest, I shall have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think Senators should be here on this matter, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McNary	Smith
Brandegee	Harreld	Moses	Smoot
Brookhart	Harrison	New	Spencer
Broussard	Heflin	Oddie	Stanley

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has called the attention of the Senate to the letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which appeared in part in the morning paper, to the effect that he was opposed to the so-called Lenroot-Anderson agricultural credits bill, and in effect pleading with the House to take no action during this Congress.

I want to congratulate the Senator from Wisconsin on the timely suggestion that he has made and the protest that he has entered to this important communication. I am afraid, Mr. President, that there is more behind this proposition than merely the opposition of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am afraid that there are hidden somewhere certain moving causes that are not revealed; and when I say that I am not unaware of the fact that the President of the United States in a message to the two Houses has advocated most strongly and eloquently the passage of agricultural credits legislation during this Congress.

Before I proceed further, Mr. President, if I shall not lose my place if I do this courteous and, if I may say so, generous act, I am willing to yield the floor to the distinguished senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] if after he shall have closed I can proceed with what I had to say with respect to the agricultural credits situation in the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will reassure the Senator from Mississippi that if the chair is occupied by the same Senator at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Maine the Senator from Mississippi may resume the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Chair. He is always generous and kind.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, for what purpose does the Senator wish me to take the floor?

Mr. HARRISON. I was just going to explain to the Senator from Maine that while he was temporarily absent from the Chamber—because, as I have scanned the Chamber through the day I have seen him in his accustomed seat, patiently attending to the discharge of his duties——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada will state his point of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understood the Chair to say that he would recognize the Senator from Mississippi after he had lost the floor. I understand the rule of the Senate to be that the Senator who rises first in his place shall be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Mississippi would be in his place, and therefore claiming priority.

Mr. PITTMAN. I simply wanted to have an understanding on the subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Now that we have settled that important controversy, I will say to the Senator from Maine that while he was temporarily absent from the Chamber after having been here until 12 o'clock last night, doing about 13 hours of work yesterday by staying in these closed walls, with an atmosphere that is not particularly wholesome, and after he had stayed here in his seat since 11 o'clock this morning—I did not even miss him when lunch time came—the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] discussed the very important proposal made by Mrs. Henderson, which was before the Senator's committee, and occupied a good deal of the committee's attention and time.

I do not know that the Senator is familiar with the position taken by the Senator from Ohio. It was to the effect, in substance, I believe, that we should have accepted the proposal; but I thought it called for an answer from the distinguished chairman of that important committee, because his colleagues are anxious to know his views on the question, and the whole country, with respect to so important a proposal, are entitled to know what are the views of the chairman of that committee. So, if the Senator wants to express himself, I shall yield the floor temporarily.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I accept very graciously the great compliment paid to me by the Senator from Mississippi. I suppose the country are pretty generally informed as to the very generous gift that was proposed by Mrs. Henderson to the Government of a residence to be used by the Vice President of the United States. The matter has been taken up by the committee and considered in great detail.

In my letter to Mrs. Henderson, written as chairman of the committee, I explained the situation rather fully; that the committee were united in considering the gift as a very generous offer, but we did feel that if the gift were accepted, either an appropriation must be made for the maintenance of the home or an increase in the salary of the Vice President would have to be made, both of which seemed to be inexpedient at this time, and the committee decided to make an adverse report on the proposal.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio also suggested that a report at least be made to the Senate, so that the Senate could take action one way or the other. The Senator, as chairman of the committee, has authority to make an adverse report, and I am sure no objection would be made to his making it.

Mr. FERNALD. I might make such a report now. The time has been so fully occupied during the day that I have had hardly an opportunity to submit a report from the committee, but I intend to do so to-morrow. However, I am prepared to make an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HARRISON. For a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Speaking of increasing the salary of the Vice President and accepting a gift from somebody of a home for the Vice President leads me to say that we had better look into these matters very carefully, especially the matter of raising the Vice President's salary. What does the Vice President do to entitle him to more than $12,000 a year? [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to admonish the occupants of the galleries that expressions of approval or disapproval are contrary to the rules of the Senate, and if those rules are violated the Chair will order the Sergeant at Arms to clear the galleries.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that is not the first time that the applause or approval of the people have been interfered with. I know one Vice President who is drawing $12,000 a year who made a ruling here the other night against me, and suppressed free speech in this body, and I am opposed to raising the Vice President's salary, at least until that ruling can be repealed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if the proposal of Mrs. Henderson and the reply of the Senator have been placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. FERNALD. I had not made the report until this minute.

Mr. HARRISON. I read the reply which the Senator wrote to Mrs. Henderson which appeared in the papers.

Mr. FERNALD. As I stated, I had intended to make the report at the first opportunity. It has not been made yet.

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. HARRISON. Getting back to the subject to which I desired to address myself before I was rudely interrupted, namely, the situation with respects to agricultural credits legislation in the House, I stated that I thought there was something hidden behind this letter written to some one in the House by the Secretary of the Treasury. I said that I was not unaware of the position taken by the President in his message to Congress indorsing agricultural credits legislation during this Congress, and putting his O. K., so to speak, on the so-called Anderson-Lenroot bill.

Of course, none of us know—and it would be rather difficult to ascertain—because of the difference of opinion between the President and his Secretary of the Treasury. Usually a Secretary of the Treasury and the President agree upon certain policies, especially when the President has gone so far as to bring his message in a special appeal to Congress and to the American people. There have been few instances in the history of this country, I dare say, when a President has so strongly advocated a proposition, and the Secretary of the Treasury has taken equally as strong a position against the suggestion; but the difference is there, and I hope the House will accept the suggestions of the President, rather than the views and advice of the Secretary of the Treasury.

As stated by the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin, the Secretary of the Treasury has changed his views with respect to the so-called Lenroot bill. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has already read what the Secretary of the Treasury said some months ago about the bill recommended by the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, and the Senator showed, from those remarks of the Secretary of the Treasury at that time, that he found favor with the bill. He did not then see the many alleged defects which he has apparently detected in the proposed legislation at this time. I want to say, as one member of the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, that that commission was practically unanimous; indeed I think every member, Democrat and Republican, after a free exchange of views, after a compromise of differences which arose in the commission, indorsed the proposed bill introduced in January, 1922, a year ago, by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The Commission on Agricultural Inquiry thought the principles embodied in that bill were probably the best that could be incorporated in legislation, guaranteeing and insuring to the farmers of the country a modern agricultural credits system. It was on the suggestion of the commission that the bill was introduced.

After that commission had thoroughly investigated the subject, after the commission had heard the representatives of the Farm Loan Board, heard a representative from the Treasury Department, heard the heads of the various agricultural associations throughout the country, and heard everyone we thought might throw light upon this important question; then it was, after an exchange of views and a compromise of differences, that we agreed upon that bill. So I say that the Secretary of the Treasury is wrong when he says that this bill, in principle and substance, at least, is not the bill indorsed by the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry.

After this bill was introduced in January, 1922, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency in the Senate and its twin note, introduced by Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota in the House about the same time, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House, certain Members of the Senate, associating themselves together in what was known as the "farm bloc," which has aroused the ire not only of the Secretary of War in this administration but of the President of the United States, met in solemn conclave and there, in a spirit of brotherly love, with no thought at that time of doing injury to any other class but to serve the farmers of the country by giving them a good agricultural system, appointed a subcommittee of the farm bloc to take all the bills which had been introduced in the Senate, including the Lenroot bill, and to study those various bills, bring witnesses before that subcommittee, allow experts on agricultural credits from whatever section they might come to appear before the committee and give to the committee the benefit of their views.

That subcommittee of the farm bloc, consisting, I think, of seven Senators, nonpartisan in character, heard all these witnesses and experts and considered for months, working by day and night on this subject, and at last the subcommittee with certain modifications and changes unanimously indorsed the so-called Lenroot bill.

If the Secretary of the Treasury at the time thought the bill as originally framed by the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry was a good bill, he should think that the last bill as amended and modified was much better than the former bill, because the latter bill, O. K'd by the subcommittee of the farm bloc and reintroduced by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin on January 6, 1923, in its amended or modified form, carried some changes which helped the bill. Those changes have already been alluded to by the Senator from Wisconsin.

In its original form the bill carried an appropriation of only $1,000,000 for each of the 12 Federal districts.

Of course, it had the privelege to loan 10 times that amount, which would have made $10,000,000 for each district, or $120,000,000 in all. But the bill as finally indorsed by the subcommittee of the farm bloc and which was indorsed also by the Senator from Wisconsin and afterwards introduced by him on January 26, 1922, increased the amount of capital stock for each of the 12 Federal land banks from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000, insuring not merely a capitalization of $12,000,000 for the 12 districts, but a capitalization of $60,000,000, and at the same time permitting loans to be made up to $1,200,000,000.

Not only that, but it added the splendid features to which the Senator has already alluded of extending the time from 6 months to 9 months, and of rediscounting agricultural paper in the member banks of the Federal reserve system. Other changes were added which helped the bill. It was a better bill for the agricultural interests of the country as finally passed by the Senate than it was when it was introduced on January 26, 1922, and when it received the O. K. of the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry.

I know not what has come over the spirit of the dreams of the Secretary of the Treasury. Why should the Committee on Banking of the House of Representatives and the House itself accept the views in this particular of the Secretary of the Treasury when they have so often heretofore turned down his views? I know of no suggestion the Secretary of the Treasury has ever made to the House or to the Senate that has been accepted and incorporated into law.

I recall when the question of surtaxes was before the Senate and before the House the Secretary of the Treasury recommended a reduction from approximately 68 per cent on the large incomes to 25 per cent. Did the House accept it? No; they repudiated the suggestion. Did the Senate accept it? No; they spurned the recommendation. Did the President accept it? He may have indorsed it in the beginning, but he afterwards wrote a letter to Mr. FORDNEY, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, suggesting a compromise on a much larger figure with reference to the tax on high incomes than that proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

When the Secretary of the Treasury suggested the creation of the British Debt Commission, did the Senate and House of Representatives accept his suggestion? No, indeed. The Secretary of the Treasury wanted blanket authority to deal with the question as he saw fit. He did not desire, in the resolution creating the commission, any limitation on the amount of interest that might be exacted by the Government against the British Government. Notwithstanding his opposition to the suggestion, the Senate and the House of Representatives both placed a limitation of 4½ per cent on the interest charge.

Did the Secretary of the Treasury, in his suggestions to the Congress in reference to the creation of the British Debt Commission, want any extension to 62 years or 100 years or 50 years in the debt-payment period? No, indeed; he wanted blanket authority, and yet the Congress of the United States, both the House and the Senate, said that it should be, if I recall correctly, not more than 25 years. Other conditions were imposed in the legislation that met the opposition as well as the protest of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I might follow the argument down the line, and I would not be able to recall any instance when the Congress has accepted the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury on any piece of legislation. And yet at this late day, with only 10 days remaining before the Congress expires, when many bills are upon the calendar awaiting action, we find that he has grown powerful, that he has become influential, that he dominates either the steering committee or the powers that be in the House of Representatives.

When I recall the failures of the Secretary of the Treasury heretofore with respect to having his suggestions adopted and looked upon with favor by the Congress, and now realize the picture that confronts the agricultural interests of the country with respect to the Lenroot-Anderson agricultural credits bill, I am surprised—oh, indeed, I am amazed. There must be something behind the proposition more than Mellon. There must be a "nigger in the woodpile." What is it? Can it be that the arm of the President of the United States, that once waxed strong, has become palsied? Can it be that the once eloquent voice is now hushed? What has become of the once beautiful tree beneath the umbrageous branches of which the President once reclined and rested? What change has there been in the administration that is going to destroy the hopes of the farmers of the country for agricultural credit legislation after we promised it to them, after every assurance had been given to them that it would be forthcoming, and after the Senate had passed the bill, not by a small majority—in fact, not after a sharp contest—but by a majority of 62 votes. When I say by a majority of 62 votes I should add that there was not a single Senator out of the 96 composing this body who voted against the proposed legislation. When the roll was called, every Senator who responded answered "yea" on the proposed legislation. So the vote was 62 yeas and no nays when the Lenroot agricultural credits bill was put upon final passage. With this indorsement, we now read that it is not to pass the House; that Mellon has written a letter and holds it up. Pray tell me, you who are on the inside, what moving cause is it that strangles this legislation which the farmers of the country thought they had almost within their grasp?

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the story. The country has read it. Mr. Mellon's letter has just come in, published only this morning, but the story was written and carried in the press of the country on February 6 of this year. Two weeks and a half ago the country was apprised of what was going to happen to the legislation. The newspaper men got onto the situation. Somebody "spilled the beans" and let out the secret, and here it is couched in this item, I believe, by the Associated Press under a Washington headline that explains what is the matter. If this story can be believed, Mellon is not the only influence behind the movement that is withholding from the farmers the Lenroot-Anderson agricultural credits bill.

The bill is now in the House, after it was unanimously O. K'd by the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry and after it was unanimously O. K'd by the subcommittee of the farm bloc, and after it received the consideration of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. When Mellon had made his protest, when he had been patiently heard, when his views had been given to the committee fully, they turned him down and reported the bill out to the Senate. And here in this august body, after days and days of consideration, after a debate hardly equaled in recent months in this body, that bill was passed through the Senate. We heard the Senators from the far West tell of the distress of the agricultural interests of the country. We heard them tell how the transportation facilities had been handicapped, how the high freight rates had depleted their exchequers, how the drought and climatic conditions had in many instances destroyed their crops and had virtually ruined and had brought bankruptcy to the western farmer. We heard Senators representing the Great Lakes region and on to North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Idaho tell of the pitiful condition of the farmers of that section. We heard the melodious and eloquent voice of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] pleading in behalf of the agricultural interests of his section for the legislation then pending.

I heard him tell how the barberry bush had flourished there and how the wind had taken the spores from the barberry bush and spread them across the level land of the Dakotas and had injured the wheat crop. I heard him tell how the farmers' wheat, which had brought $2.50 and more per bushel under a prosperous Democratic administration, had gone down until now the farmers could realize but little more than $1.12½ a bushel for their wheat. I have heard the Senators from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Iowa tell how corn had depreciated in price; how in happy, good old Democratic days—of course, some of them did not say this right out loud on the floor, but they would whisper it into one's ear—magnificent prices were realized by the corn farmers of Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana; but how the price had fallen so low that some of the farmers had to burn corn for fuel as a substitute for coal; how the price had gone down to 25 and 30 cents a bushel.

Then I heard in committee and on the floor the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] tell how the farmers along the Pacific slope were in distress. I have also seen the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] come before the committee and heard him tell about some Japanese beetle, I believe it was, had greatly injured the farmers of his State. At the same time the distinguished leader of the majority, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] appeared before the committee, and also spoke on the floor, telling about the ravages of the corn borer.

I think I have also heard an eloquent speech from the distinguished Presiding Officer [Mr. MOSES in the chair] who now presides over the deliberations of this Chamber telling about the ravages of the corn borer in New Hampshire. Tracing the situation all the way from New Hampshire through the Middle West and out to the Pacific slope the farmers have suffered hard times; the prices of their products have declined; their bank balances have diminished, and in many instances poverty has stalked on their farms.

The same condition has prevailed in certain sections of the South, where the bollworm and the boll weevil have ravaged the land, and have been carried from Mississippi into Alabama, from Alabama into Georgia, and from Georgia on into the Carolinas, leaving distress and poverty and wreck and ruin in their pathway. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has also recalled to my mind the ravages of the sweet-potato weevil. The sweet-potato weevil, of which some people never before heard, has cost my section of the country, consisting of five States of the South, $35,000,000 in the last two or three years. It has greatly effected the sweet-potato crop. What I have depicted is the condition of the American farmer. So it was quite enough to start the heart throbs and the lamentations of some of us when we saw, under this new and so-called modern yet untried and unworkable Budget system, appropriation after appropriation which had been estimated for by the experts of the Agricultural Department decreased by the Budget Bureau through certain men in its employ who did not know whether cotton grew on trees or was dug from the ground.

So it is but natural, Mr. President, that the farmers of the country, confronting such disaster as they have in the past two years, should desire an agricultural credits system; and yet we read in the newspapers that the real reason behind the movement of strangling in the House of Representatives the agricultural credits bill which was passed unanimously by the Senate is disclosed.

Let me read a news item:

No farm credits till ship subsidy passes.

That is the way the article is headed. Ah, the news manager of this paper, away down in Memphis, knew the value of the article. He knew what those lines meant; so he printed them in big type.

No farm credits till ship subsidy passes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. That statement is about the same as that of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] this afternoon, except that he reversed it and stated that there would be no ship subsidy bill passed until the farm credits bill was passed.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I am in favor of that proposition; that suits me exceedingly well—that no ship subsidy bill shall pass here until agricultural credits shall pass the House of Representatives. Indeed, I will go further and say, after the agricultural credits bill shall have passed the House, I am willing that no ship subsidy bill be then passed through the Senate. I am glad that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has taken that position, and I wish we could get more recruits on it.

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

So I believe in a little while the distinguished Senator from Washington will come into the fold, because no Senator here took a greater part or was more enthusiastic for agricultural credits legislation than was he. He served on the subcommittee of the farm bloc and helped to write the provisions of the bill and voted for it; he has spoken for it; and I am sure that he has no part in this alleged conspiracy which is broadcasted throughout the country to the effect that no farm-credits legislation shall be passed in the House of Representatives until the ship subsidy shall pass in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have long since learned not to believe everything I see in the newspapers or in the headlines of the newspapers, and I frankly say that if I thought that the rural credits legislation was being held up in the other House by the Republican leadership there because of the delay of the ship subsidy bill the ship subsidy bill would be dropped. I do not believe in legislating in that way, and I am satisfied that there is absolutely no truth in the suggestion to which the Senator from Mississippi refers, that that legislation is being held up in the House for the passage of the ship subsidy bill in the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I knew that that was the way the Senator from Washington felt about the matter, and I am glad to have his statement to that effect. I hope it will have influence with those in some other body to withdraw any scheme that might be contemplated or any suggestion such as that which has been made in the newspapers, if there be any.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I, too, certainly hope so.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator from Washington would not be a party to such a scheme. I said that before the Senator made his statement. He is for the ship subsidy bill, and he is about the only Senator of whom I know on the other side who is for it, but he is for it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes once more to admonish the occupants of the galleries that under the rules of the Senate confusion or manifestations of approval or disapproval are not permitted. The Chair does not intend to spend the evening admonishing the occupants of the galleries, and unless occupants of the galleries, who are present by courtesy of the Senate, can observe the rules of the Senate the Chair will order the Sergeant at Arms to clear the galleries and close the doors. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I never had an idea that the Senator from Washington was a party to any such scheme as that to which I have referred, and I do not want the Senator to think that I was even making such an intimation, because while other Senators may have strolled out of the Chamber since the discussion of the ship subsidy bill began—and that time is now so far distant that "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary"—the Senator from Washington has remained here, day in and day out, and through the lonesome hours of the night when others of his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber have forsaken him and gone to some party in the city, some reception, or some banquet that is being given every night in honor of many of our departing friends over there. They can not be held here; their friends want to pay the last sad rites to them, which is a perfectly natural thing. So they have left the Senator from Washington; but every time one scans the other side of the Chamber the distinguished Senator from Washington, like a beacon but far-away light, sits there waiting his turn to speak on the proposition. However, Senators do not give him a chance to speak on it; so many Senators desire to speak on this subject that the contest really is becoming one in which I am afraid animosities may be engendered and bad feeling aroused [Laughter.] I hope, although we have but a few days left before the 4th of March comes, that the contest between the Senator from Washington, in charge of the ship subsidy bill, and the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], in charge of the "spilled" milk bill, who are fighting here like gladiators for position with respect to their proposals will not result in their becoming estranged and falling out over the situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Mississippi may not be aware of it, but the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Washington are ready to vote on the proposition at any time; there is no contest at all between them.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear that statement, because I was afraid that the contest would become so sharp between my friends that bad feeling might become aroused in the end; and just as an humble Democratic member of the minority I have sat here patiently in my seat, always watching the movements of those two Senators, so that at the first sign of an overt act toward each other I could fly between them and prevent the conflict. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What has really disturbed me is this: I have seen some evidence of animosity developing on the other side because some Senators are afraid that some of their colleagues may talk longer than they will. I understand there is quite a contest arising on that side of the Chamber over that matter.

Mr. HARRISON. It is perfectly natural that there should be. Important questions are under consideration; and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin calls the attention of the Senate to a grave situation that has arisen in the House of Representatives. Democratic Senators are always ready and "clamping at the teeth" to avert threatened wrongs or right grievous mistakes.

Our attention and the attention of the farmers of the country have been called to a situation brought on by Republican leadership in the House that means much to the agricultural interests of the country. We want to discuss these propositions, and when we get ready to discuss them there rises in his place the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the leader of the majority, and he occupies minutes and then half hours and goes on into hours, utilizing the time of the Senate in carrying on this alleged filibuster. Then there is the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], another Republican—he talks for two or three hours—and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. How can you expect us to help you when you take up so much time here in the discussion of these matters?

I am ready for a vote, but how can we remain quiet when a Republican leader in this body from Wisconsin calls to our attention a situation that is so grave that it threatens the defeat of a piece of legislation as important as the Lenroot agricultural credits bill, and why? Not, as I said, because of the letter written by Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, but, if this reporter is correct, for other causes.

We got the explanation and the disclaimer from the distinguished Senator from Washington. I knew it before he made it. Let me read further, after these big headlines:

No farm credits till ship subsidy passes.

Then it makes this startling statement, part of the headline, placed there by an employee in a newspaper office 1,100 miles away, in Memphis, Tenn. He did not know what had transpired here in Washington with respect to agricultural credits legislation except what this item that was sent over the wires revealed to him, and on the basis of the news that came to his desk he placed this headline there:

No farm credits till ship subsidy passes.
Harding may outmaneuver the blocs after all.

Oh, can it be that the real cause of the tie-up in the House of Representatives to-day is the President of the United States? I do not believe it, I shall not believe it, although here is a news item that hints at it, and the circumstances as disclosed by this news item point that way.

Why did this news editor put here the heading that "Harding may outmaneuver the blocs after all"? Here is the item upon which he based that statement:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—A possibility that the Lenroot-Anderson-Capper farm credits program may be blocked in Congress unless there is some assurance of action on the administration shipping bill was foreseen in some quarters to-day after a series of conferences to discuss the legislative outlook for the remaining four weeks of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

That was over two weeks ago—"conferences to discuss the legislative program in the House of Representatives." What more?

After a talk with President Harding—

Here are circumstances, here are alleged facts, here is the testimony, upon which this news editor placed at the head of this column in his paper:

Harding may outmaneuver the blocs after all.

Let us see when we read it and put the circumstances together whether or not this news editor who put in larger type than the others "Harding may outmaneuver the blocs after all" was acting upon reasonable grounds.

After a talk with President Harding, Representative MONDELL, of Wyoming, Republican leader of the House, declared there were so many "difficulties" in the way of an agreement that it was entirely possible the farm credits measures could not be finally written into law before March 4 despite the fact that legislation on the subject had passed both the Senate and House.

There is your conference, held over two weeks ago, between the President and the leader of the Republicans in the House; and the Republican leader of the House declared that there "are so many difficulties in the way" that perhaps farm-credits legislation will not be passed in the House before March 4 of this year.

What else? That is pretty strong testimony. That calls for an explanation. You know I am fond of the Republican leader of the House of Representatives. I served with him for many years—eight years, I believe. He is a splendid, fearless, upright, able man—it is not violative of these rules when you say something nice about somebody in the other House—but he is smart. He knows what he is about. He knows pretty well how to get the things that he goes after. Of course, it was difficult for him to get to the Senate, because there was KENDRICK in the way; but he is a fine fellow. He sometimes spills the beans, however, and here is one of the times, and I will tell you another time, and at that time the Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, was very helpful in doing it.

I am sure that the Senator from Washington recalls the incident. It was when, just before we adjourned to go home to administer the late political catastrophe to the other side of the Chamber, just before the storm broke and we were on the eve of an adjournment, Speaker GILLETT and Leader MONDELL went up to see the President, and they came back, and they told some newspaper men after their conferences with the President, or they were so quoted as saying, that immediately following the election an extra session of the Congress would be called to consider the ship subsidy bill; and it took all the other Republican leaders the balance of their time, from the date of that alleged interview with the newspaper men up until the date of the election, to explain what these leaders meant and to deny that there would be an extra session of Congress to consider the ship subsidy bill following the election. The people were mystified as to what would happen, and no assurance was given before the election that there would be an extra session of Congress. Why, it was denied by practically every other Republican leader, but it let the "cat out of the bag"; and I have no doubt that that statement, getting to the people in many of the States of this country, helped to defeat many Senators for reelection and really defeated scores of Representatives in Congress running for reelection. It just naturally caused some of those fellows to say, "Yes; if he calls an extra session of Congress, I will be with my President, and I will vote for the ship subsidy bill"; and at that time they did not know what was in it. They did not know that it taxed the American people to an amount of about $875,000,000 and gave it over to the shipping interests of the country, and so it caused their defeat. That is the way they act sometimes.

You know there are times when silence is golden, and that would have been one of those times, and this would have been another time; but immediately after the leader in the House left the President this news item states that he declared that it is not at all probable that the agricultural credits legislation will pass before March 4, "there are so many difficulties in the way."

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this money will be spent principally for a few large passenger lines on the North Atlantic, not for freight lines.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. That is the way our Republican friends do things.

This item further says, on which this news editor bases the startling statement that "Harding may outmaneuver the blocs after all":

Mr. MONDELL insisted—

That is a strong word—"insisted." It does not say that he advocated it; it does not say that he acquiesced in it; it does not say that he suggested it; but it says that Mr. MONDELL "insisted." On what?

Mr. MONDELL insisted that the barriers to Senate and House agreement on details were real and important.

He "insisted" they were real and important. Well, there is the Anderson bill, the twin bill of the Lenroot bill, introduced in the House in January, 1922, 13 months ago. On that day it was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. A majority of that committee is made up of Republican Members of the House. Was it their duty in behalf of the agricultural interests of this country to begin an immediate consideration of the bill? Why should a committee wait for months and then suddenly take a bill up after the President comes to Congress and in a message advocates the passage of it? I ask you, would it not have been wiser for the committee to have taken up the bill in behalf of the agricultural interests of the country within a reasonable time after its introduction, that some action before the adjournment of Congress might be assured? Then we must not overlook the fact, Mr. President, that the Lenroot bill was pending here in the Senate for weeks, being debated and considered, amendment after amendment, and the leadership of the House knew that there was no opposition to the Lenroot bill here. They knew that the Commission of Agricultural Inquiry had given its indorsement to the bill. They knew that the subcommittee of the farm bloc in the Senate had given its indorsement to the bill.

They knew that the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate had given its indorsement to the bill, and they knew that the bill would pass the Senate. Yet during all that time the House Banking and Currency Committee, if they were having hearings, evidently thought they were not sufficient, and the 4th of March was constantly getting closer and closer.

What are the difficulties which the distinguished leader of the Republican Party in the House would have the country believe would cause nonconsideration of the agricultural credits bill in the House before the 4th of March? What are the details that are so different in the bill which passed the House and that which passed the Senate? Yet this item says that Mr. MONDELL, the leader of the Republican Party in the House, insisted that the difficulties were too great between the House and the Senate to be ironed out very easily. This item continues:

But some friends of the farm credits program took his statement to mean that the pressure for passage of the ship bill might be greatly augmented during the delay in perfecting legislation for the aid of the farmers.

Where did he get that? Newspaper reporters do not write news without having some basis for it which they believe to be fact. They do not go out and write an article like that on mere suspicion. Yet Mr. MONDELL insisted that the barriers to Senate and House agreement on details were real and important, "but some friends of the farm-credits program took his statement to mean that the pressure for passage of the ship bill might be greatly augmented during the delay in perfecting legislation for the aid of the farmers."

It further says:

Much of the opposition to the shipping measure has come from those who are leading the fight for farmer legislation.

That is an insinuation that is unjustifiable. Sitting before me is the champion of the ship subsidy bill upon this floor, the man who has patiently waited, ready to move its passage at the first opportunity, a man who, without reservations of any kind, without Lodge reservations, or Watsonian reservations, or any other kind, is whole-heartedly for the proposition. He has done his bit in attempting to pass it. All honor to him, if there is any honor in it. He thinks there is; I think there is not, and we never will know what the Senator from Indiana thinks about it.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; the Senator will.

Mr. HARRISON. We are not going to let you off. You can rest assured of this fact, that while this important motion, presented by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], will be fully discussed, and these other important questions which are constantly arising will be fully discussed, you will have to come up to the "lick log,"—that is what they call it down in Mississippi—and vote on some of the important provisions of this bill before the 4th of March.

Do you think we would not let you show to your constituents how you stand on the Madden amendment, for instance? Do you think we are going to let you off without voting on a motion to recommit this obnoxious monstrosity? It might cause you a sleepless night, it might irritate you and worry you, but, listen to me, you have to face it before the 4th of March comes.

If you will accept my advice about it, rather than be caught in a hole, as you have been caught so many times, and have had to explain on so many occasions, I would "get out from under" and come over here and join with us in adopting the Madden amendment, so that future Congresses can take care of the appropriations to operate the ships of the country, and not delegate to a shipping board authority for 10 or 15 years in the matter of appropriations.

That is the reasonable thing for you to do. That is the fair thing for you to do, and it is politically the safest thing for you to do; and I am always trying to keep you out of trouble. But you will not accept my advice. I do not know whether you are going to accept it on this or not. We are going to give you three or four days to study about the proposition.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WATSON. When do the three or four days begin?

Mr. HARRISON. We are going to give you a vote before the 4th of March on some of these amendments. Of course there are so many Republicans over there who are against this proposition that it is hard for us to manage them. If it were just opposition from this side, there would not be any trouble; we would all be together; but it is hard to control a band of insurgent Republicans.

Mr. WATSON. Why does not my friend——

Mr. HARRISON. And I am hopeful still that the Senator from Indiana will come across and class himself as one of us, so that he will save himself future embarrassment.

Mr. WATSON. The only embarrassment that occurs to me, I will say to my very good friend from Mississippi, is the fact that we can not get a vote on this at all.

Mr. HARRISON. You are going to get a vote on the Madden amendment.

Mr. WATSON. We can not get a vote on the Madden amendment or anything else.

Mr. HARRISON. You will get a vote on some other things that you perhaps might not want to vote on.

Mr. WATSON. We want to vote on everything.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. WATSON. Why does not the Senator permit us to vote and thus disclose the alleged division on our side?

Mr. HARRISON. We are going to.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator says there is discord in our harmonious relationships over here. If the Senator will let us have a vote, it will disclose what it is. Let us find out whether we have discord or not.

Mr. HARRISON. We will. We want you to study about the proposition some more——

Mr. WATSON. We have been studying on it for about four months.

Mr. HARRISON. In the hope that you will get into the fold yet.

Mr. WATSON. My friend may recall that three months ago I asked him whether or not any of his associates on the other side intended that there ever should be a vote on the ship subsidy proposition, and the Senator said then, as he says now, "Oh, yes; we are going to give you a vote."

Mr. HARRISON. I said on certain things.

Mr. WATSON. But it is only 10 days before the session will close, and, as far as I can see, we are no nearer a vote now than we were three months ago.

Mr. HARRISON. If we stay here a few more nights we will be a little closer to it.

Mr. WATSON. I am willing to stay, but while my friend and his associates on the other side continue to talk we are not getting any closer.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; we are; I am getting closer to the Senator all the time.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator and I are close all the time, but that does not get us to a vote. What we want is a vote.

Mr. HARRISON. We are going to give you a vote.

Mr. WATSON. That is what we want. When is the Senator going to give us a vote?

Mr. HARRISON. You might as well make up your mind to it. I know it is going to worry you and irritate you, but you are going to have to vote on this Madden amendment.

Mr. WATSON. When?

Mr. HARRISON. When we think we can put it over on you. All we need is about one more convert.

I will get back now to the subject I was discussing. Whenever I get to talking about the farmers and agricultural credits I get diverted. I was reading the statement of the Republican leader of the House, Mr. MONDELL, which gave to the news editor the impression, "Harding may outmaneuver the blocs after all," and cause the defeat of the agricultural credits bill.

I shall not allow the adroitness of my distinguished and genial friend—and he is a genius, too—to get me off the track. Here is what Mr. MONDELL further said in this news item:

Much of the opposition to the shipping measure has come from those who are leading in the fight for farmer legislation.

There is a Senator, as I said, sitting on the other side who helped to frame the Lenroot agricultural credits bill, and he is leading the fight for the ship subsidy bill. That ought to be illustration enough to disprove the thought that those alone who are the friends of the farmers in the Senate, or are members of the farm bloc, are obstructing the passage of the ship subsidy bill. I suppose if you would take the vote of all Senators on both sides of the Senate as to whether or not they prefer the passage at this Congress of the agricultural credits bill or the ship subsidy bill, every one of them would say, "Let us pass the agricultural credits bill." Yet we find in this reputable paper a news item sent out from Washington, published not only through the South but in the West and the East, everywhere, in all the papers, to the effect that Harding and MONDELL had a conference, and after that conference the leader of the majority in the House insisted that there were so many difficulties in the way that it was highly improbable that they would get any agricultural credits legislation through the House of Representatives.

Then the newspaper reporter, who carried these lines and broadcasted them everywhere, said that it had something to do with the ship subsidy legislation in the Senate. Then he said that Harding "may outmaneuver the blocs after all."

The item continues:

It has been apparent for some time that President Harding and his administration advisers were preparing to exert their influence for action on the ship bill at the present session, but it was denied generally by administration leaders to-day that any plan had been perfected contemplating undue delay in consideration of the farm credits measure.

There you have it, Mr. President; and I say that it looks very much as if there is more than merely the Mellon letter, sent to the House of Representatives this morning, protesting against the passage by the House of the Lenroot agricultural credits bill. It seems that somebody else is in the background; that there are conferences going on; and that conferences were going on on February 5, the day before this item was written and carried in the press, between the leaders of the Republican Party in the House and the President of the United States; and that following those conferences the press of the country got the impression that there was a scheme on foot to hold up the agricultural credits bill until the ship subsidy bill could be assured of passage in the Senate.

Ah, Mr. President, this side of the aisle does not play the game that way. Fair-minded men do not play the game that way. We believe that the agricultural credits bill should pass. We have shown it by our votes. This body has cleaned its skirts of the mater by voting 62 strong for this agricultural credits bill, with none against. If it fails, the failure is upon the House Republican leadership.

But if it fails, after articles carried in the press like the one which I have read, after conferences that have been held between the Republican leader of the House and President Harding, and from which these assertions were made, when the leaders of the Republicans in the House insist that the difficulties are so great that agricultural credits legislation is in danger of failure of passage before the 4th of March, they will believe that Harding, Mondell, Lasker & Co. killed the agricultural credits bill. Let that firm operate in that way if they want to. There are some Senators here representing the minority of the Senate, aided and encouraged by some of the stalwart champions of the people on the other side of the Chamber, who themselves, will constitute a firm to help the farmers of the country by saving $875,000,000 for them which is sought to be imposed upon them and others by the passage of this legislative monstrosity, the ship subsidy bill.

Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent, before I yield the floor, that we do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; that is simply evading the proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I asked for a ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I asked unanimous consent to adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the point of order that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move that the Senate now take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is not in order until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. I made the point of no quorum.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggested the absence of a quorum, and that was the transaction of business. I made a request for unanimous consent which was objected to, or a point of order was made, so that business has been transacted. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for a ruling on the point of order made on the previous request for a quorum call.

Mr. HEFLIN (at 8 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.). Pending that, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, hold that back a moment.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I will not hold it. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. That is always in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROUSSARD in the chair). The point of order made by the Senator from Washington is sustained.

Mr. HARRISON. Now I suggest the absence of a quorum. Business has intervened.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the Chair hold that a motion to adjourn is not in order?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator can make a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. HEFLIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 101, 106, 119, and 122 to the said bill and concurred therein; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 18, 21, 34, 36, 38, and 49 to the said bill and concurred therein each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; and that the House had insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriation for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 86) providing that in the enrollment of House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to make a correction, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the usual course I presume the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a moment? The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is temporarily out of the Chamber and he desires to be present when the motion is made. Will the Senator wait until he returns? He will be here in a few minutes.

Mr. PHIPPS. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for the purpose of calling up the report of the committee of conference on the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I myself have called up a conference report.

Mr. PHIPPS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 13793, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 21, 1923.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 101, 106, 119, and 122 to the bill (H. R. 13793) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes," and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$250,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: After the word "headquarters," in said amendment, insert: "Provided, That not exceeding $60,000 of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the maintenance of divisional and regimental headquarters of the Organized Reserves."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Strike out the first sentence in said amendment.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "be construed to."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

"None of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association as a sales or contract agent or as the manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. And none of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the War Department or Army."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows:

"On and after July 1, 1923, the cost of transportation of material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Signal Corps, Ordnance Department, Chemical Warfare Service, Air Service, Medical Department, Engineer Department, and the Coast Artillery Corps, and in connection with the construction and installation of fire-control projects at seacoast fortifications by the Coast Artillery Corps may be charged to the appropriations for the work in connection with which such transportation charges are required; and the Budget estimates for each of such appropriations shall hereafter carry separately the amounts required for such transportation costs."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] requested that if this conference report were presented and unanimous consent were asked for its consideration, that objection be made to it. I realize that under the rule the Senator from New York may move to take up the conference report; I presume that is correct, and, perhaps, that is the motion which he has made, though I am not sure whether he has made a motion that the report be taken up or has asked unanimous consent that it may be taken up. However, I mention the fact that the Senator from Nebraska, who is temporarily absent, having merely gone to get his dinner intending to return directly, has asked that if a unanimous consent request for the consideration of the conference report were made it be not granted until his return.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he understood the Senator from New York to have made the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report, which motion is not debatable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my hesitancy in withholding the motion until the return of the Senator from Nebraska is due to the fact that if it is withheld the matter loses its privileged status, which I do not want lost. I am willing to withhold the motion if I may have the unanimous consent of the Senate to bring the matter before the Senate upon the return of the Senator from Nebraska, and to renew my motion at that time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is reasonable, and I think no objection will be made to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Have we the assurance, so far as the Senator may give it, that the Senator from Nebraska will be here in a short time?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no doubt that he will be here very shortly.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment, if the Senator please. The Senator from New York received unanimous consent to make a statement, but the Chair does not understand that any other Senator has received unanimous consent to make a statement, and the motion is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I wished to say that the Senator from Nebraska left the Chamber with the impression that this report would not be over here until about 10 o'clock, and he expected to return within the next 30 minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Nebraska will be here within that time?

Mr. HARRISON. He will be here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Mississippi to ask unanimous consent that at 9 o'clock the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report in its privileged status shall be entertained?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I thank the Chair.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada will state it.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a motion pending, and that motion is privileged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But it is not debatable.

Mr. PITTMAN. The motion is that the Senate take up what is called the filled milk bill. The presentation of a conference report is privileged, but its consideration is not privileged. I make the point of order that the motion, if there has been a motion—I do not know whether or not the Senator from New York has made a motion——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did make the motion.

Mr. PITTMAN. I make the point of order that the motion is out of order, because there is a motion pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule XXVII, in its first clause, relative to reports of conference committees, provides that such reports may be received under certain conditions, which existed when this report was received. The rule then goes on to provide:

And when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

The question was raised by the motion of the Senator from New York, and the Chair was about to put it when the Senator from New York received unanimous consent to make a statement. The point of order raised by the Senator from Nevada is overruled. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from New York to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Chair will bear with me, my point of order is that when there is nothing pending before the Senate the presentation of a conference report is a privileged matter and it may be received by the Senate; but I can not conceive how the Senate, when it is considering action upon an existing motion, without a motion to displace it, can act on some other motion.

Mr. LODGE. A privileged motion can displace it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will read the complete rule. Rule XXVII provides:

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

1. The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read, or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing—

None of those things was in process when the report was received. The rule proceeds—and when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

The Chair holds that the point of order raised by the Senator from Nevada is not well taken. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that a unanimous-consent request was made that the motion should be entertained at 9 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Without losing its privilege.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Without losing its privileged status.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; without losing its privileged status.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that at 9 o'clock the Senator from New York may be permitted to renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report without losing the privileged status of that motion. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. If agreed to, would that displace the important measure now before us, to wit, the ship subsidy bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator refer to the request for unanimous consent? If so, the Chair is of the opinion that it would not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. KING. I refer to the consideration of the conference report submitted by the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being under a unanimous-consent proposal, the Chair would think not.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Did I understand the Chair to say that the unanimous-consent agreement would not displace the unfinished business, but when the motion is made at 9 o'clock, if it should prevail, that would displace it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the Chair's understanding. The Chair understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to make an inquiry with reference to the present status of the unfinished business, which, of course, will not be disturbed if the unanimous-consent agreement shall be entered into; but if the motion of the Senator from New York when made at 9 o'clock shall prevail, of course the unfinished business will be displaced. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement requested by the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the conference report on House bill 13660, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of the conference committee is privileged and may be presented. The Secretary will read the report.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 124: That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124, and in accordance with the authority granted by House Concurrent Resolution No. 84, passed at the present session, agrees to the amendment of the Senate with the following amendment: In lines 6 and 7 of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment strike out the words "at the Virginia end of the Key Bridge"; and the Senate agree to the same.

LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
L. HEISLER BALL,
W. L. JONES,
CARTER GLASS,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
ROBERT E. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit the Chair to state the question? The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Secretary read a statement concerning this conference report, but it was impossible to understand the effect of the report. I will ask the Senator from Colorado to explain the issues between the two Houses that are to be composed by this conference report, and to discuss what adjustment has been made of the respective issues.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. LODGE. My point of order is that we have to determine first the taking up of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Quite so. That is a motion that is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the status now of the ship subsidy bill and the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands they have been displaced.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I will say that this is the final and complete report of the conferees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask whether, in the opinion of the Chair, the shipping bill has been temporarily displaced, or whether it will be necessary to take it up by motion?

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opinion of the Chair is that since the Senate, by regular motion, has proceeded to the consideration of the conference report, the unfinished business is displaced, and can not resume its place before the Senate except upon motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Chair is unquestionably correct.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, continuing my statement——

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator from Colorado whether the conference report has been printed? Is it available? Has a print been made of the conference report?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; some days since. The Senate agreed to a concurrent resolution which authorized the conferees to eliminate a certain phrase in the wording of an amendment which was in disagreement, eliminating the words "at the Virginia end of the Key Bridge," in amendment No. 124, which extends for one year an appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of providing a bathing beach for the colored residents of the District of Columbia. That was the only item remaining in dispute. It has now been agreed upon, pursuant to the concurrent resolution already adopted by both Houses. This is merely a matter of form in presenting the report for the RECORD.

Mr. President, I ask to have the question put on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate adopt the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May I inquire as to the first item in the report?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say, for the information of the Senator, that there is only one item in the report.

Mr. KING. I was diverted for a moment.

Mr. PHIPPS. It relates solely to one item. All others have been disposed of. This is the item with reference to the bathing beach for the colored residents of the District.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator what disposition was made of the item with respect to parks—the Patterson tract as well as other tracts, as I recall—for which provision was made by the Senate?

Mr. PHIPPS. That was not in dispute at the moment. That was disposed of in the earlier conference. The Senate receded. The House declined to agree to those items, and the Senate was under the necessity of receding, because the Senate had put them in; and, under the rule generally recognized, the House introducing new matter is the one which is compelled to recede when the other House refuses to agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Colorado what disposition was made of the items respecting schools and school-houses—the appropriations for schools?

Mr. PHIPPS. There were various items, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator that all of the items that were contained in the original bill, and which had been stricken out on the floor of the House under points of order, have been restored to the bill, and have now been approved by the House as suggested by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what became of the Archives Building?

Mr. PHIPPS. That was not an item in the District of Columbia bill. That item, I believe, was carried in the independent offices bill, or some other bill. It was not a feature of this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was not provided for in the conference report, then?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; the District would not be interested in the Archives Building.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understood the statement of the Senator, and if I did not it was my fault and not his. My recollection is that there were a number of items dealing with schoolhouses and the purchasing of ground for additional school buildings that were in dispute. May I inquire whether all of those items have been composed by the House receding and accepting the position taken by the Senate?

Mr. PHIPPS. All of those have been. The House receded in every instance, but there were two or three additional items proposed by the Senate which the House was unwilling to accept, and on those the Senate has receded.

Mr. KING. What were those items, may I inquire of the Senator?

Mr. PHIPPS. If the Senator will allow me time to get to my desk, I shall be glad to answer his question. I can not remember them all.

Mr. KING. I shall be very happy to give the Senator such time as he requires.

Mr. PHIPPS. They have been disposed of, however. They are not in dispute and have no effect on the present motion.

Mr. KING. I know, but we shall be very glad to hear from the Senator what disposition was made of those items. I think the Senator will make time by making an explanation at this moment.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I do not yield, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Answering the inquiry of the Senator, Mr. President, the Senator will find on page 55 of the bill amendment numbered 80. On that amendment the Senate receded. On amendment numbered 81 the Senate also receded. The first was for the purchase of a site near the Brightwood School, and the second was for the purchase of a site near Rittenhouse and Fifth Streets NW. On amendment numbered 82, for the purchase of a site north of Webster Street and east of Georgia Avenue, the Senate receded. The House receded on the land for the Dunbar High School, which is in amendment numbered 79, and several others which I have mentioned—the extensible building at Georgia Avenue and Sixteenth Street and the Tenley School, including the building, the John F. Cook School, and the site for a 16-room building at Georgia Avenue and Sixteenth Street. The great majority of the items recommended by the Senate have been included in the bill in its approved form and agreed to by the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the acting chairman of the committee what became of the item on page 108 of the bill in reference to the water supply—the appropriation of $6,150,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the appropriation carried by the bill is $1,500,000. There is a recitation to the effect that the total amount available, either by money appropriation or authorization to contract, up to the present time is $6,150,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; but did the House agree to that?

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, yes; the House agreed to that. The only question involved at all was that of improving the language in the amendment on page 110, providing for the progress of the work, construction under way and proposed within the District. The words "and without" were inserted, so that it reads:

Construction under way and proposed within and without the District.

That was done so as to cover any possibility of their getting into the State of Virginia, which it was intended to cover.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President will the Senator yield to me again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator for the purpose of propounding a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was done with amendment No. 126, on page 103, the proviso? Was that included?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; on amendment No. 126 the House receded. The purpose of that amendment was simply to take off the cloud which covered this property during the period of time it was under consideration for park purposes. The areas described in that amendment, 126, are those which the Park Commission has decided that it will not acquire and has no use for; and it was determined that they should be cleared of any cloud to their title, so that the owners of the property would be free to sell or otherwise dispose of them as they might see fit. The District would have no further claim to them.

Mr. REED of Missouri and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Tennesssee, or does he yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KING. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I wanted to inquire where the land lies to which the Senator was just referring?

Mr. PHIPPS. In what is popularly known as the Piney Branch section of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was done with amendments Nos. 127 and 128, found on pages 105 and 106?

Mr. PHIPPS. Those are the ones on which I have heretofore stated to the Senator from Utah the Senate conferees were under the necessity of receding. The House refused to agree, and therefore the three pieces of property will not be acquired under this bill.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KING. For a question.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator what provision has been made for lighting the school buildings?

Mr. PHIPPS. The House agreed to an addition of $25,000 over and above the amount they had passed for that purpose. In addition to that there was an increase of $35,000 made in the item for repair and upkeep, part of which may be devoted to the same purpose, providing modern lighting for schoolrooms.

Mr. DIAL. Is that sufficient for all the school buildings?

Mr. PHIPPS. I would not like to venture an opinion as to that. I think it would be quite an undertaking to change the lighting in every schoolroom in every building in the District, but this will permit the work to proceed as rapidly as it has to be carried forward.

Mr. DIAL. I did not mean to change the lighting in all of them; I meant, to see that everyone of them had lighting facilities. In some they have no electric light and no gas.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have heard that statement made, but I have not yet been in a school building that did not have some form of lighting. They have not had to resort to tallow candles in any of the schools I have been in.

Mr. DIAL. In some they have very poor gaslight.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. For a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the conference report with reference to the amendment on page 101:

> For improvement and care of public grounds in the District of Columbia, including foremen, gardeners, mechanics, laborers, office rent, maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of not to exceed three motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and the maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of motor cycles and bicycles for division foremen, $343,750.

Was that agreed to by the House?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to congratulate the House on not agreeing to it, and I congratulate the Senate conferees on yielding.

Mr. PHIPPS. We were in disagreement, and under the compulsion of yielding.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word or two with respect to this report and some of the subject matters which are comprised within it. I regret that the appropriations made by the Senate committee with reference to the schools, the acquisition of additional lands for the erection of schoolhouses, and the appropriations for the erection of schoolhouses were not all acceded to by the House.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the Senator's own remarks on the floor of this Chamber were used by the conferees on the part of the House in opposition to those very items.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if so, they were distorted. With respect to the park provisions, there was one provision, I think, if I understand the Senator, on which the Senate yielded, as to which, in my opinion, it would have been for the benefit of the District of Columbia if they had not assented to the position of the House. I was in accord with the position which I understand the House took regarding the so-called Patterson tract. There may have been ample justification for the purchase of that tract, but it did seem to me at the time that there were grounds available the title of which was in the District, perhaps subject to some incumbrance or some servitude—as to that, I am not quite clear—which would have been proper and suitable for park purposes for the section of the city which it was presumed that park would serve.

However, as to the other tract, I understand the Senator to say that the Senate yielded, and the House refused to assent to the purchase of the other tract?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. KING. I regret that the conferees yielded in regard to that matter. I believe that one of the important duties and functions of a municipality is to provide suitable parks and playgrounds within the municipality. A few years ago our municipalities seemed to ignore the importance of parks. Quite recently civic pride, as well as a desire for the improved condition of the health of the people, have taken possession of municipal bodies, and there has been a very general movement in favor of acquiring lands for suitable parks.

Congress has manifested, in the main, a very commendable spirit in acquiring lands suitable for park purposes, but with the growth of the city, with the development in various other parts, it is quite apparent that we must make further provision for parks in the future. Whatever money is spent in the acquisition of municipal parks, in my judgment, is a very wise investment, not only for the health of the people and the welfare of the people, speaking in a physical sense, but from an artistic and esthetic standpoint. So I regret that as to this particular item the Senate conferees felt constrained to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee as to amendments 116 and 117, on pages 93 and 94, for the aid and support of the national library for the blind, and the Columbia Polytechnic Institute for the Blind. Were those two items agreed to in conference?

Mr. PHIPPS. One of them in full, and the other in part. I think the House agreed to $2,500 in one instance, where we proposed $5,000, and in the other they conceded $1,500, the full amount proposed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say that I greatly regret that the full amounts were not allowed in both cases. There could not be anything more deserving than these two institutions, and I regret very much that the amounts were not allowed.

I want to ask about the amendment on page 29, amendment numbered 46.

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was done with that amendment in reference to the allowance for automobiles privately owned?

Mr. PHIPPS. The number in the bill was kept down to a total of 48 automobiles and 8 motor cycles, as I recall it, at a monthly allowance of $20 in the case of automobiles and $10 in the case of motor cycles.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate yielded and accepted the House provision?

Mr. PHIPPS. It did.

Mr. McKELLAR. Had the House fixed the number?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; the House did not fix the number.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the conferees agreed on a number?

Mr. PHIPPS. They made an inquiry as to the number that should be used, and there was no disagreement as to the number that should be used.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I can say about that is that I am sorry they did not cut it out entirely.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want at this time to compliment the distinguished Senator from Colorado, and I do not want him to infer from any observations I have made that I am criticizing in the slightest degree his conduct as a conferee. I think the District of Columbia is to be congratulated upon having upon the important committee that deals with the appropriations for this great District a man who has given so much time and who is so well equipped for the discharge of his duties as the able Senator from Colorado.

I did make a comment with respect to the schools which my friend, as I understand him, has misconstrued. When the bill was under consideration in the Senate, I did call his attention to the fact that a joint committee had been appointed by the House and by the Senate for the consideration of the school question. I suggested that that committee had taken testimony, that it had not yet submitted its report, and I believed the committee, when it reported, would submit a comprehensive plan dealing with the entire subject of education within the District of Columbia, not only the curriculum of the schools, but the mechanics, if I may use that expression.

The members of the committee took testimony as to the condition of the schoolhouses, and the lack of school facilities, and I am not betraying any confidence when I say that the committee were unanimously of the opinion that there should be larger appropriations to build schoolhouses and equip them, to meet the needs of the people of the District. That committee will soon be able, in my opinion, to report to Congress, and I believe the committee will report that land must be acquired upon which to erect other schoolhouses, and that a considerable sum of money should be appropriated in the near future for the erection of buildings so necessary for the education of the young men and women of the District. I am sure that when that plan is reported to the Congress, it will meet with the hearty approval of this body, as well as the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, first of all I want to thank the Senator for his complimentary remarks, and to take this occasion to say that in my conferences with the Senator on items of public interest here in the District, I have found him very broad minded, and indeed helpful, and I thoroughly understood his attitude with reference to the Patterson tract, and also with regard to the other tract of land. As I have stated, it was not possible for the Senate to insist on its position, on account of the parliamentary situation.

With reference to the matter of the schools, and my statement that the remarks made on the floor by the Senator were used as an argument to prevent the allowance of the items proposed by the Senate, that was merely in this limited manner. Perhaps I should have stated it at the time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, may we have order, so that we may hear the charming eulogies which are being pronounced by Senators?

Mr. PHIPPS. It was simply that these programs should be carried out, and perhaps the placing of the school buildings in advance would kill it. I am for a vote on the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, there was so much confusion that I could not hear all that Senators were saying in tribute to each other. I want to hear all that. It delights me to hear them paying tributes to each other in this fashion.

I wanted to know if the provision for the pay of school-teachers was retained in the bill as we passed it through the Senate.

Mr. PHIPPS. There was no change in that item at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in further response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, a report relative to the number and cost of maintenance of motor vehicles in use in the field service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of sundry railway postal clerks of Cheyenne, Wyo., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 13136) to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented a petition of sundry railway postal clerks of Cheyenne, Wyo., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 13609) to amend an act entitled "An act to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and adjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis," approved June 5, 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions of the city council of Worcester, Mass., condemning the so-called Ku-Klux Klan, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McNARY presented a telegram from Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state of Oregon, at Salem, Oreg., transmitting a joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

SALEM, OREG., February 21, 1923.

CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Pursuant to the provisions thereof I am transmitting senate joint memorial No. 6, thirty-second legislative assembly, State of Oregon:

Senate joint memorial No. 6.

Whereas at the legislative assembly of the Oregon State Legislature, held in the year 1864, the Government of the United States in the interest of its Military Establishment requested the State of Oregon to cede all of its right, title, and interest in and to certain land in front of Fort Stevens, Point Adams, and also to Sand Island, all of which lands were situated at the mouth of the Columbia River, in Clatsop County, Oreg.; and

Whereas in pursuance of said request said legislative assembly of Oregon at the session held that year passed an act, "An act to grant to the United States all right, title, and interest of the State of Oregon to certain tide lands herein mentioned," the said act passed both the house and senate and was duly approved on the 21st day of October, 1864, by Addison C. Gibbs, Governor of the State of Oregon, bill being house bill No. 65 of said legislature held in 1864; and

Whereas said United States Government has never in any manner whatsoever made use of said Sand Island for military purposes nor for any other purpose except as hereinafter stated; and

Whereas for a great number of years last past the War Department of the Federal Government, through its Engineering Department, has leased said Sand Island to different persons and corporations for the purpose of salmon seining, and has received through the medium of said leases large sums of money approximating several hundred thousand dollars; and

Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon feels that, by reason of the fact that this revenue has been secured from a non-military commercial use of said Sand Island, a use never contemplated at the time this land was ceded by the State of Oregon to the United States, the money belongs really, rightfully, and morally to the State of Oregon, and believes it unfair that the United States Government retains revenue secured from the lease of said Sand Island for purposes other than were originally intended; and

Whereas the State of Oregon desires to assist the city of Astoria, in Clatsop County, Oreg., to rehabilitate itself from the effects of the conflagration which destroyed the business portion of said city on December 8, 1922, and in that connection desires to have the Federal Government repay to the State of Oregon the sums of money morally belonging to the State and secured by the Federal Government through the lease of Sand Island: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House concurring), That we do hereby petition and memorialize Congress to immediately pass an act which shall provide that all such amounts of revenue heretofore secured by the Federal Government from said leases on Sand Island shall be immediately turned over to the treasurer of the State of Oregon; that when so received by the treasurer of the State of Oregon the secretary of state shall draw a warrant payable to the city of Astoria upon the treasurer of the State of Oregon for the amount of the money so turned over by the Federal Government to the State of Oregon; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be immediately wired by the secretary of state to the Clerk of the United States Senate and to the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives and to each of the Oregon Members of Congress.

Concurred in by the house February 20, 1923.

K. K. KUBLI,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate February 16, 1923.

JAY UPTON,
President of the Senate.
SAM A. KOZER,
Secretary of State.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The hour of 9 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, the question is on the privileged motion made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the message from the House on certain amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 21, 1923.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 101, 106, 119, and 122 to the bill (H. R. 13793) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes," and concur therein;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 18, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$250,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 21, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: After the word "headquarters," in said amendment, insert: "Provided, That not exceeding $60,000 of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the maintenance of divisional and regimental headquarters of the Organized Reserves."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Strike out the first sentence in said amendment.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "be construed to."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

"None of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association as a sales or contract agent or as the manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. And none of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the War Department or Army."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 49, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

"On and after July 1, 1923, the cost of transportation of material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Signal Corps, Ordnance Department, Chemical Warfare Service, Air Service, Medical Department, Engineer Department, and the Coast Artillery Corps, and in connection with the construction and installation of fire-control projects at seacoast fortifications by the Coast Artillery Corps may be charged to the appropriations for the work in connection with which such transportation charges are required; and the Budget estimates for each of such appropriations shall hereafter carry separately the amounts required for such transportation costs."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 30.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 30, and agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 18, 21, 34, 36, 38, and 49.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we have not had an opportunity to examine this report, and I should be very glad if the Senator would explain to us those items which he has asked us now to recede from or accede to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Amendment numbered 30, concerning which I have moved the Senate recede, was an amendment put on while the bill was in the House, requiring recruiting officers of the Army to obtain the written consent of the parents or guardian of a recruit, if the recruit was between the ages of 18 and 21.

Amendment numbered 18, concerning which I have moved the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, provides that reserve officers when attending the 15-day training camps shall receive mileage at the rate of 4 cents a mile.

Mr. KING. May I make an inquiry of the Senator? I understand this was a House provision and the Senate disagreed to it and the Senate conferees receded?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; this was a Senate amendment.

Mr. KING. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The conferees suggested it should be amended by decreasing the appropriation from $275,000 to $250,000. Then the Senate added the language concerning 4-cent mileage.

No. 21 refers to the maintaining of divisional and regimental headquarters for the Organized Reserve. The House has amended the Senate amendment in that regard by limiting the amount of money which shall be used for maintenance of those headquarters to $60,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state to what extent the Senate provision was cut down?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was not cut down specifically. Maintenance of divisional and regimental headquarters was one of a number of items taken care of by one appropriation. The House has inserted a proviso that not more than $60,000 of the $350,000 appropriation shall be used for the maintenance of headquarters.

Mr. McKELLAR. That merely limits the activities of the Reserves?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It limits the expense of the headquarters.

Mr. OVERMAN. What was the total appropriation for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was answering the question of the Senator from Utah as to what the particular amendments were. May I finish that?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. 34 relates to the validating of payments heretofore made to 12 retired enlisted men of the Regular Army who are now employed in the Veterans' Bureau or have been employed there up to this time at salaries in excess of $2,500. The comptroller has ruled that these retired enlisted men fall under the prohibition of the statute of 1894 forbidding officers of the Government receiving more than two salaries if the civil salary is in excess of $2,500. This language validates the payments made in the past, so the money shall not be collected from the 12 old soldiers.

No. 36 has to do with the heat and light in kind allowance and straightens out the pay of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps bill, so it is entirely clear.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment in order that there may be discussed the procedure in the Senate after the conference report on the Army appropriation bill has been disposed of?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say, as the Senator has intimated, that in consideration of the disposal of the two conference reports without any unnecessary delay, and after the conference report is disposed of, I shall make my motion to take up the shipping bill and then agree to a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. ROBINSON. With the motion pending to proceed to the consideration of the shipping bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to have that distinctly understood. Is this a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to ask unanimous consent to recess until 11 o'clock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator make the request now?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. I ask unanimous consent that immediately upon the disposal of the action of the House on the amendments of the Senate to the War Department appropriation bill I shall be permitted to make a motion to take up the shipping bill and, with that motion pending, the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. 36 makes it entirely clear that the pay law does not permit the giving of heat and light in kind.

No. 38 relates to the activities of retired officers in the employ of concerns which sell goods to the Government.

No. 49 relates to the charging of transportation costs to the appropriations made for the purchase of materials by the division of the War Department named in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 30 and agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I move that the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold the motion until the Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is not in strict accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement; but if there is nothing more, I have no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was not mentioned, but it was understood that no other business would be transacted. This, I think, is in connection with the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is for the correction of a clerical error in the bill which has just been disposed of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection, if there is nothing further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 86) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13793) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes," the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed to make the following correction: In line 15 of the matter inserted by Senate amendment No. 29 strike out "Congress). Promotions" and insert "Congress), promotions."

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12817—the shipping bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not to be voted on this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to be left pending, the Chair understands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is. Several Senators are apparently anxious to obtain recognition. As I said, it was understood, at the request of Senators on the other side of the aisle, that no other business would be disposed of to-night. Personally I would be perfectly willing to allow it to be done, but that was part of the understanding. It was not mentioned openly. Now, in pursuance of the unanimous-consent agreement, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12817—the shipping bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the order heretofore entered into be carried out and that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 22, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, Lord of all mercy, we bless Thee for the new day. Surely we are encompassed by Thy rich abundance; no good thing dost Thou withhold from us. We find that all Thy ways are pleasantness and all Thy paths are peace. Let us feel the impulse and the restraint of Thy presence. May we trust Thee without doubt or fear, and all the while just know Thee as our dearest Friend. By faith in Thee and fidelity to the right may the blessings of all the Christian virtues rest upon our people and let fall upon the world the hope of a better day. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday during the vote on Senate amendment No. 21 to the Army bill I intended to vote "nay," but got into a little discussion with my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], and let it get away from me. I should have voted "nay" on amendment 21 if I had voted.

REVISION OF THE FEDERAL CODE APPROVED BY OUR ABLEST LAWYERS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the Record by printing letters from Mr. John H. Wigmore, letters from Judge Trieber, of the Federal court in Arkansas, and a letter from Mr. John W. Davis, president of the American Bar Association.

Mr. STAFFORD. On what subject?

Mr. LITTLE. On the Federal code revision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

FROM WIGMORE ON EVIDENCE.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW,
OFFICE OF THE DEAN,
Chicago, Ill., October 22, 1921.

Hon. EDWARD C. LITTLE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am much interested in learning the progress of congressional action upon your report containing the excellent revision of the laws of the United States. I have admired the speed with which you have made the compilation, and I have lamented the delay in taking action upon it. I am just now trying to bring down to date my book on evidence. I have carefully gone through your revised code and have noted all the present law by references thereto. I am much interested to know whether there is any likelihood of your numbering being changed substantially before the revision is enacted into law. I have assumed that without doubt it would be enacted substantially as presented.

The interval since the last official revision, of 1874–1878 is the longest that has elapsed in any jurisdiction except Illinois. In this State, owing to the small compass and the biannual appearance of a one-volume private edition with the session duly interspersed, the bar has suffered no inconvenience. But in the Federal laws the bulk and contents of the intervening legislation has now piled up into a mess which is a terror to the practitioner and a shocking waste of time. The state of things has now become intolerable. Since the completion of your draft revision the failure to act has become a disgrace on the part of Congress. The shame of leaving the Federal laws in this condition is no longer excusable on any ground.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. WIGMORE.

OPINION OF UNITED STATES JUDGE TRIEBER.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE'S CHAMBERS,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS,
Little Rock, Ark., February 12, 1923.

MY DEAR SENATORS: I am not unmindful how valuable your time is at this time, but the importance of the subject is my excuse for writing you this lengthy epistle.

On May 16, 1921, the House of Representatives passed H. R. 12, consolidating and revising the acts of Congress up to that date, but no action has been taken on it by the Senate.

It is one of the most important bills now pending and any assistance you gentlemen can render to have it enacted into a law will be of great benefit to the people.

The last Revised Statutes enacted by Congress as a law, and which repealed all other laws was published in 1873. In 1878 a second edition was published, but this edition is only to be taken prima facie as the law. The act authorizing the publication was approved March 2, 1877 (ch. 82, 19 Stat. 268), as amended by act of March 9, 1878 (ch. 26, 20 Stat. 27). Section 4 of that act provides, among other things, that this revision "shall not preclude a reference to nor control, in case of discrepancy, the effect of any original act as passed by Congress since the 1st day of December, 1873." Therefore, there has been no revision which makes the laws conclusive since 1873.

Two publishing houses have published compilations of all the laws down to 1919, but they are not official, nor are they absolutely correct. The result is that quite frequently Federal judges must examine the original acts of Congress, as published in the Statutes at Large, to ascertain what the law is. As but few lawyers have a complete set of the Statutes at Large, they can not even make these examinations. Since 1873, Congress has enacted innumerable statutes, many of them new, others amending the Revised Statutes, and still others of such a nature that it is hard to determine whether they repeal existing laws or not, until that question is determined by the Supreme Court.

I will call your attention to one such instance, although I could mention many others. When the Volstead Act was enacted, the question arose whether former acts regulating the internal revenue taxes and offenses were repealed by implication. District courts and circuit courts of appeal differed and the question wasn't finally determined until the Supreme Court, a little over a year ago, in United States v. Yuginovich (256 U. S. 450), held that the former laws were repealed by implication.

Mr. LITTLE, who spent a number of years on this bill, kindly sent me a copy thereof, requesting me to examine it carefully and advise him whether there were any errors in it. No doubt he sent copies to other Federal judges also. I spent considerable time in examining the article referring to the judiciary and the penal laws, and found but two slight errors. I called his attention to them, and they were corrected.

The enactment of this bill will save a great deal of time to Federal judges and lawyers practicing in those courts. Nearly every State, including the State of Arkansas, has such a revision published every 10 years, and Congress hasn't made one for 50 years. If you can possibly assist in having this bill enacted before Congress adjourns, it will be a great boon to judges and lawyers and the people at large.

I consider the work of Mr. LITTLE not only of great importance but a work for which he can not be too highly commended.

With highest regards, yours sincerely,

JACOB TRIEBER,
United States District Judge.

Hon. J. T. ROBINSON and Hon. T. C. CARAWAY,
United States Senators, Washington, D. C.

FEBRUARY 13, 1923.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE: Unless your H. R. 12 is identical with H. R. 9389 of the former Congress, I will appreciate very much if you can send me a copy of it. I consider the bill of such value that if I am in doubt as to some matter in the Compiled Statutes of the West Publishing Co. or the Thompson Co.'s Annotated, I refer to your bill.

With kind regards, yours sincerely,

JACOB TRIEBER,
United States District Judge.

Hon. EDWARD C. LITTLE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

JANUARY 15, 1923.

MY DEAR SENATOR ERNST: I have been very hopeful that the Senate would proceed to the prompt enactment of the new United States code, passed by the House a year ago last May. During the past year I have used the copy of it in preparing a new edition of my "Treatise on Evidence," and have been through every page of the work and find it entirely satisfactory. For 20 months it has lain in the hands of your committee.

Is there any reason you care to give explaining the delay?

Very truly yours,

JOHN H. WIGMORE.

Hon. RICHARD P. ERNST,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

[From president American Bar Association.]

STETSON, JENNINGS & RUSSELL,
New York, January 31, 1923.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE: Your letter of January 10 reached my office while I was absent attending the midwinter meeting of the executive committee of the American Bar Association. Since my return a few days ago I have been hoping that I might have time to make the critical inspection of the bill which you suggest, but with the pressure of other matters it is quite clear that I shall not be able to do so in time to make my views of any service to you during the present session of Congress. There can be no question on the part of anyone that such a recodification is urgently necessary, and it will be a great pity if Congress adjourns without putting its stamp of approval upon the work. I know, of course, how difficult it is to get attention for such matters in the closing days of a busy session, but after all a bill of this character is distinctly a work for committees rather than for either House as a whole, and the general body, I should think, would be willing to adopt with a minimum of discussion a bill which comes to it with a favorable report.

Believe me, very sincerely yours,

JOHN W. DAVIS.

REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads from the further consideration of House Resolution 492, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman for that now.

Mr. ROUSE. It is a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but there are various other privileged matters demanding recognition. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in due time.

FLORAL WREATH FOR THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 39, directing the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives to place a floral wreath at the base of the Washington Monument on Washington's Birthday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 39.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and directed to purchase a floral wreath to be placed at the base of the Washington Monument on Washington's Birthday, February 22, 1923, on the occasion of the ceremonies attending upon the silent tribute, the expense of such wreath to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the War Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up the conference report on a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Amendment 30 is pending. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 30.

The SPEAKER. On that the time was practically exhausted, as the Chair remembers.

Mr. ANTHONY. How much time remains?

The SPEAKER. There are six minutes remaining of the hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. Practically all the time in the debate was used by gentlemen who were opposed to this motion, and I would like very much to have a vote in a few minutes, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. It is entirely agreeable to me. I should like to have one short speech on this side.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment in full, the provision to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 30: Page 18, line 12, strike out the following: "Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be utilized for the recruiting or enlistment of boys under the age of 21 years without the written consent of the parents or guardians, if any, of such boys, or unless the applicant furnishes a birth certificate or the affidavit of two disinterested witnesses showing such applicant for enlistment to be 21 years of age."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, if the House agrees to the motion which is now before it, it will prevent the enactment into law of the language which has been read. As I stated to the House yesterday, this is a very serious proposition, and should the House amendment be written into the bill the War Department will be confronted with a very critical situation. I think under no circumstances, even under the furthest stretch of sympathy with enlisted men under 21, should the House adopt such a drastic provision.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. As I understand, a vote "yea" will be equivalent to a vote against the proposition that passed the House a few weeks ago?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will. It will strike the language from the bill. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] such time as he desires.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I have two minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are only four minutes remaining.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the yielding of unlimited time is not authorized, that the time yielded should be definitely stated.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman yields the remainder of the time.

Mr. BLANTON. No; he said such time as the gentleman desired.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is predicated upon the idea that there are four minutes remaining.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I yield to the gentleman four minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, not to be taken out of the gentleman's time, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and I had an informal agreement that I might yield to one man on this side.

Mr. ANTHONY. There were but six minutes remaining out of the hour, as I understood, and practically all of the time has been used by gentlemen on the other side of the question. I have used two minutes, and I now yield the remainder to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. SISSON. By unanimous consent, I should like to have two or three minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. SISSON. All right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, last year we succeeded in cutting down the Army from 150,000 men to 125,000 men, and if you adopt this amendment you virtually cripple the small skeleton Army that we have to-day-. Thirty-seven per cent of all the enlisted men of the Army are under the age of 21. Of course, you can accomplish by indirection what you sometimes accomplish by direction. Some on the other side would have an Army of 100,000 men, some would have an Army of 75,000 men. If you are going to have a skeleton Army of the smallest efficient number, strike out the amendment as agreed to by the Senate.

It is unworkable to have these men between 18 and 21 furnish a certificate of their birth or the written consent of their parents. A large percentage of those who apply between the ages of 18 and 21 do not apply from their homes. They are away from home and willing to enter the Army. What better service can a young man find if he wants to enter the Army than three years' training in that service? Bear in mind that every boy under 18 who misrepresents his age and enlists and desires to leave the Army before he reaches 18 years receives an honorable discharge and has transportation furnished to his home.

Every boy in our Government should be trained, if he wishes, between the years of 18 and 21. Before they reach the age of 21 they have the adventurous spirit, and that is the age when they determine whether they want to make the Army a career, as thousands have made it a career, men of the highest character. I know you can cite cases where boys have misrepresented their age under 18, and in every instance they are discharged upon request.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. If we interpose obstacles like this to enlistment, is it not likely that many men would enlist, even though they could obtain their parents' consent?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; it hamstrings the enlistment. Do you mean to say that if I was 19 years old I should not have the privilege of enlisting in the Army without my parents' consent? Perhaps it would have been better as far as my physical stature is concerned if I had enlisted instead of grinding away at books into the wee small hours of the morning. The conditions in the country are that it is difficult to get men at present; when the industries are demanding men it is difficult to get men between the ages of 18 and 21. If you are going to place these restrictions on enlistments, you make it unworkable, and all those who vote for it will vote for crippling the Army and depriving it largely of its most efficient part—the young men from 18 to 21.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may have four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to retain the proviso passed by the House. I disagree entirely with my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD], who has just spoken, and I disagree absolutely with what the gentleman from Wyoming said last night in support of the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to strike out this amendment.

No State in the Union will permit a boy 18 years of age to do anything with property which may have been left him. The law says that he is incompetent to dispose of his property. And yet a boy 18 years of age can go to one of these recruiting offices, covered with posters depicting beautiful landscapes and wonderful sights for travelers to see, and be taken into the Regular Army, although his father and mother both protest that he is of a character and disposition which unfit him for military life and that he ought not to be permitted to go away from the parental roof. The practice of taking a minor child in time of peace away from his father and mother without their knowledge, perhaps over their protest, ought never to be tolerated in this Republic. [Applause.] The House did the right thing when it passed the original proviso prohibiting a wrong like that, and we should not now recede because gentlemen think, as some of them have said here, that to get a boy into the Army is easier than it is to get an adult. The motion of the gentleman from Kansas should be defeated and the original House proviso retained in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the proviso written in the bill by the House which requires the consent of the parent or guardian in enlistments of boys under 21 years and over 18 years of age. No one can accuse me of not being the friend of an adequate Army. In fact, I think I have been accused of being a big Army man. But I am opposed to taking away from the parents in this country the right to decide the occupation of their minor children between the ages of 18 and 21. If it is conceded, as it must be, that a parent has under the laws of every State the care and custody of his child until he arrives at the age of 21 years, then I say that to permit the minor son to enlist in the Army without the parent's consent is, so far as the parent is concerned, a draft or conscription in time of peace.

There is another reason why I favor the House proviso and oppose the Senate amendment. We know that many boys are taken into the Army who are less than 18 years of age. It is easy for them to misrepresent their ages. There are boys in the Army who are 16 and 17 years of age. The House proviso, if it becomes a law, will prevent such enlistments and it will discover those cases where boys are under 18 years of age. Therefore, I am opposed to the Senate amendment striking out the House proviso, and shall vote "no" on the pending motion.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask for two minutes in which to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if this thing is going on indefinitely I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recede and concur.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were—ayes 58, noes 53.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 177, not voting 116, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CONNALLY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion to recede and concur was rejected was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 34: Page 20, after line 4, insert: "Section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved July 31, 1894, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows: 'Retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard shall not be construed to hold an office within the meaning of this section. Payments heretofore made to retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, under appointments to civil offices with a compensation of $2,500 or more per annum, are hereby validated.'"

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment as follows: "Strike out the first sentence in said amendment."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a preferential motion unless we may know what the amendment does.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the motion which has just been offered strikes out the first paragraph of the section, and the amendment authorizes the language:

Payments heretofore made to retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, under appointment to civil offices with a compensation of $2,500 or more per annum, are hereby validated.

The situation is this: There are 12 retired enlisted men of the Army drawing their pay as enlisted men or noncommissioned officers retired in the various noncommissioned grades who are also in receipt of salaries in excess of $2,500, as the heads of divisions in the Veterans' Bureau. Under the law as it exists to-day, under a ruling of the Comptroller General that they are holding an office within the meaning of the law by reason of drawing pay as retired noncommissioned officers of the Army, they would be prohibited from drawing their civil pay. The effect of the language which is offered in this amendment is simply to validate the payments that have previously been made to them. That is as far as it goes; otherwise they would be subject to deductions for the payments in excess of $2,500.

Mr. FIELDS. It will not permit further payments to them.

Mr. ANTHONY. My understanding is that these men have been reemployed since this decision at salaries of $2,490 per annum, to bring them within the meaning of the present law.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I have introduced a bill seeking to do precisely the same that this amendment does. I think the amendment which the gentleman offers carries out the purpose that I have in mind.

Mr. ANTHONY. It validates the payments that have already been made to these 12 men.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a preferential motion to recede and concur and I desire to be heard upon that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to recede and concur.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question will be divided. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, this condition has arisen out of a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury that a retired enlisted man is an officer of the United States. How many of you believe that the enlisted man is an officer? If you believe that the enlisted man is an officer, you will vote for the motion of the gentleman from Kansas. If you believe the enlisted man is not an officer and desire to be consistent, you will vote for my motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment. I want to ask this side how many of you believe that the enlisted man is an officer of the United States? This condition has arisen out of a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury in which he holds that the enlisted man is an officer of the United States. If you agree with the comptroller that the retired enlisted man is an officer of the United States, you, of course, will vote for the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. If you believe the enlisted man is not an officer, I take it you will vote for my motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment. Now, why should a retired enlisted man rendering the same service in the Veterans' Bureau that is rendered there by a retired officer be discriminated against? There is a provision in the law, upon which the Comptroller of the Treasury based his decision, that authorizes the employment of retired officers in positions the salary of which does not exceed $2,500 a year. There is no argument as to whether or not the enlisted man is an officer. He is not; he never was; and nobody else but the Comptroller of the Treasury rendered such a decision, and I judge this will not be rendered again.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. LOWREY. Does the gentleman know on what grounds he based that decision?

Mr. FIELDS. I do not, and nobody knows. But here is what the House is to do by its vote: If you support the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the House says by its vote that a retired enlisted man is an officer of the United States. I do not believe the House wants to take that position. There is more at stake here, gentlemen, than the question of the position of these 12 enlisted men who have retired and who have been employed in the Veterans' Bureau, and who, because of the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, were called upon to return to the Treasury their salary they have received for their service in the Veterans' Bureau for the last 18 months. There is the question whether this House by its vote will confirm the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury that an enlisted man is an officer of the United States.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. If an enlisted man is not an officer under that decision, what is he?

Mr. FIELDS. He is an enlisted man.

Mr. SNYDER. All right.

Mr. FIELDS. Is an enlisted man an officer in the Army?

Mr. SNYDER. I would say that he was.

Mr. FIELDS. Is an enlisted man an officer in the Army?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not mean to say that he is an officer in the Army, but he is a noncommissioned officer of the United States in the service of the Army.

Mr. FIELDS. He is a noncommissioned officer when advanced to that grade; but an enlisted man is not an officer of the United States, and that is the question we must determine.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think, to be fair, the gentleman ought to state that these 12 men are retired as noncommissioned officers, and they draw retired pay of $94 a month.

Mr. FIELDS. The decision is not in that shape. It applies to retired——

Mr. JAMES. If a commissioned officer is entitled to draw compensation, why not a noncommissioned officer?

Mr. FIELDS. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] has suggested, if the retired commissioned officer is entitled to draw this pay, why not a noncommissioned officer?

Mr. STAFFORD. The commissioned officer is not entitled to draw pay above $2,500.

Mr. FIELDS. Up to $2,500. The motion of the gentleman from Kansas validates the compensation already paid but does not settle the other question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, let me take up the question where the gentleman from Kentucky left off. The law provides that a commissioned officer who is retired can be appointed to another office and draw a salary of any amount, provided he is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Therefore there is a provision of law by which any retired officer of the United States Army can draw two salaries, and this is an absurd ruling of the Comptroller General when he says that an enlisted man is now holding office under the United States Government. If he holds an office, what authority has he, what duty has he to perform? He does nothing at all except draw the small pittance as a retired enlisted man of the United States Army. Whenever these officers come before this House and ask for relief they almost without exception get it, but when one of these retired enlisted men comes before us they have not the same advocates upon the floor of this House that the officers have.

There are 12 of these men and I wish the House membership to listen to this because it is important—12 of them have been employed in the bureaus here because of their technical military knowledge, and they are performing duty that other men who occupy similar positions are paid for their services from $3,500 to $5,000. These men by this absurd ruling of the Comptroller General will be made to work for less than $2,500 simply because they are drawing a small pittance as retired enlisted men.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I will.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I think it is fair to state to the House there is now pending on the calendar this identical bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, and I simply want to call the attention of this House to the fact that this committee, not being a legislative committee, have validated these payments which have been already made, so these men will not have to refund and then permit the House to take action when we get a day.

Mr. KEARNS. I am very thankful to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] for bringing that matter to my attention. This was reported out of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House by a unanimous vote, including the vote of the gentleman from Illinois who has investigated the matter and stated before the Committee on Military Affairs that this ought to have immediate recognition upon the floor of this House. The Senate committee by a unanimous vote voted this amendment into this bill. Therefore both committees—the Military Committee of the House and the Military Committee of the Senate—have said that this is good legislation and ought to pass. If it does not pass in this bill it will go over until the next session of Congress, and these men will be required, if they hold their positions, to work for less than $2,500 a year, when every other man down there who is doing similar work will be paid from $3,500 to $5,000 per annum, and these men have a technical knowledge that the other men have not. The bureau wants them. They are requiring them to work at less salary because the Comptroller General of the United States, as every lawyer will admit that has ever investigated his decision, has rendered a very foolish opinion on the subject.

These men are not officers, and never were officers, except noncommissioned officers, when they were in the service, and every man who has ever passed upon this question, except the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], himself has said that these men ought to be paid for the service they are performing. If this provision in the bill fails, the gentleman from Wisconsin is the man who has been fighting it, and the only man who has been fighting it since this matter came up, and he has never assigned a legitimate reason why these men, with all their technical knowledge, should be discriminated against because they happened to have held in the Army a comparatively lowly position as enlisted men, and that is the only reason he can assign. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the motion offered by the gentleman from Kansas has the support of both House and Senate conferees. It is to validate the payments of money to these noncommissioned officers on the retired list in the Veterans' Bureau who were receiving $2,500 or more prior to the decision of the Comptroller General, which held that they were not entitled to receive both retirement pay, amounting in most instances to over $1,000, and the civil pay of over $2,500.

Some years ago Congress discovered that certain civilian employees were receiving pay from two or more different appropriations and that they aggregated more than $2,500. The Committee on Appropriations had no control over it, so a limitation was placed on one of the appropriation bills providing that no person should receive, in holding two offices, more than $2,500. The condition was presented to the comptroller that there were certain retired noncommissioned officers whose average retired pay was more than $1,000 and who were employed down in the Veterans' Bureau at $3,500. Since that decision was put into effect it has made them indebted to the Government for the excess pay that they received over $2,500.

I stated to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], when the provision was originally offered to one of the appropriation bills as a rider, where it had no place at all, that I favored the validation of these back payments. I do not believe it is right, and particularly as to noncommissioned officers, when they are employed under the impression that they were not only going to get retired pay but their salary as well, to withhold payment and to dock them for prior excess salaries.

The motion offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is to validate all these payments. These men since that decision have been reemployed in various activities at $2,499 plus their retired pay of $1,000 or more. It will give them $3,500, or thereabouts.

I consider that in the case of the noncommissioned officer who retires at the age of 50 years after 30 years' service and receives employment with the Government, who draws $1,000 retirement pay and then takes employment again in civilian activities, the retired pay of $1,000 should be considered as part and parcel of his aggregate pay; and this amendment seeks to continue the original intent of the law, that a man shall not receive pay from two departments of the Government, and also validates the payments made before the comptroller's decision. No one can criticize my act in seeking to validate the original payments heretofore made, even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] can not criticize that position. It is the position I have maintained from the beginning. I wish to validate these payments up to the time of the decision of the Comptroller General; and if you adopt this amendment you will allow these men to continue in the service of the Government at $2,499, and still draw in addition their retired pay.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I decline to yield.

Mr. KEARNS. Why does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because of the gentleman's strictures on my attitude in this matter. But still I will yield.

Mr. KEARNS. Congress has determined that a retired officer of the Army, even if he is retired at as high pay as $5,000, can be appointed to another office and receive the other salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the case of General Crowder and those officers employed in the construction of the Panama Canal we have always safeguarded the interests of the Government by providing that they should not receive the pay of their positions plus the retired pay, but they should have their retired pay accounted for in connection with the civilian pay. This is in harmony with the practice of crediting the officer's salary in payment of the stated civilian salary. We do not give him both.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. But I promised the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] five minutes; so I will withdraw that motion for the present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, whenever you see as affable a man as our friend from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] get wrought up on a proposition like this it just illustrates the frame of mind that the House is now in during the closing hours of Congress, when no important legislation ought to be considered, because he gets out of humor with his Republican friends. He condemns them because they are trying to uphold the law. Why, I commend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] instead of condemning them when they try to uphold the law of the country.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. It is not the law. If that was the law, it would estop every retired enlisted man and every pensioner from holding any other job.

Mr. BLANTON. The law of this land says that whenever an officer of this Government receives a salary of $2,500 or more he can not receive another salary from the Government.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a second.

Mr. KEARNS. Here is a good place to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Ohio later on is going to get into a better frame of mind toward his colleague from Wisconsin and he will laugh about it.

Mr. KEARNS. But these men who are interested will not laugh about the action that this House takes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to see the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Kansas uphold the law without being condemned by their side of the House. I am with them. It is a good law. An officer of this Government has no right to be drawing two salaries, and that is why I supported the proposition of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], to keep the big general who retired last December on $9,000 per year and who is going to head one of the biggest corporations in the country, from drawing the retired pay of a general in the Army and at the same time heading a private corporation with another big salary. That is why I supported it.

Mr. KEARNS. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I could not resist yielding to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman from Texas explain to the House why he thinks a retired enlisted man is an officer of the Government of the United States? What office does he hold?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Ohio—I know without asking him the question, because I know what he stands for usually—does the gentleman from Ohio believe in subterfuges?

Mr. KEARNS. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course he does not. Here is what is being done now with respect to these 12 noncommissioned officers: There is a subterfuge to get around the law. Their salaries have been reduced down from the sum they are now getting to $2,499 a year so that they can draw two salaries. I will state to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that that is a subterfuge which he will not indorse.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEARNS. Please answer my question: What office under the Government of the United States do these enlisted men hold, and what are their duties as such officers?

Mr. BLANTON. Our affable employee in charge of that desk there is an officer of the Government. This telegraph page here is an officer of the Government.

Mr. KEARNS. I will admit that, but I am asking about these retired enlisted men.

Mr. BLANTON. Every man who is employed on the pay roll of the Government is an officer of the Government.

Mr. KEARNS. But as retired men they are not employed.

Mr. BLANTON. They are on the pay roll and draw monthly salaries. The trouble is that the House is now in a mood. It is a mood dangerous for the people of this country. Do you think that the Senate in the kind of a mood it is in—and the House in a similar mood—can pass legislation that benefits the people? I submit that to my colleagues. It pays us to proceed more deliberately than we can under the present circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recede.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the motion to recede.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] to recede and concur with an amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment as follows: "Strike out the first sentence in said amendment."

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. This is the first half of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, to recede and concur?

The SPEAKER. No; the House has already voted to recede. The question now comes on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] to concur with an amendment. If that be voted down, then the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] would be in order.

Mr. KEARNS. Then the vote of those who believe these men are not officers should be "no"?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must decide that for himself. The question is on concurring with an amendment to strike out the first sentence of the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KEARNS and Mr. FIELDS) there were—ayes 69, noes 32.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 36: On page 22, at the top of the page, insert the following:

"Nothing contained in any existing laws, or regulations or orders promulgated in pursuance of law, shall be construed to authorize on or after July 1, 1922, the issue of heat or light in kind to any person in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service while such person is receiving an allowance for rental of quarters under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service,' approved June 10, 1922."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment. The amendment corrects a grammatical error.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "be construed to."

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 38: Page 23 of the bill, after line 16, strike out the following: "None of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for payment of any officer of the Army on the active or retired list while such officer is engaged in the business of selling supplies or services to the United States, or is employed by any individual, partnership, or corporation which engages in such business."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"None of the money appropriated in this or any other act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, or Public Health Service who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association as a sales or contract agent or as the manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department, the Navy, Marine Corps, or the Navy Department, the Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, or Public Health Service any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. And none of the money appropriated in this or any other act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of any of the services hereinbefore enumerated who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the particular service hereinbefore enumerated from which such officer was retired. The proviso in the act of June 10, 1896, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, reading as follows: 'That hereafter no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date,' is hereby repealed."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment that it brings in new matter that was not in conference at all. It brings in new legislation, matters that neither the House nor the Senate have passed upon and that neither the House nor the Senate submitted to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether it is germane or not.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not germane. I call the attention of the Chair to the last clause which seeks to repeal the present law. It was not passed upon in the bill and has no relation whatever to the bill and was not in conference.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Subject to the point of order, I move to recede and concur.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, if the point of order was made to the joint pay bill last year, the point would be well taken, but, as the House knows, it was a joint pay bill of the Army and the Navy and the Coast Guard and the Public Health Service. This refers to the pay of retired officers provided for in that bill. It is our contention that legislation referring to that would be in order in shape of a limitation.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not a limitation, it is an enlargement; it seeks to repeal the present law that now limits it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. When the recent omnibus naval bill was before the House I offered an amendment which related to the retired men of the Navy, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union held that to be out of order, and he held it not to be germane to the subject matter then at issue. The point was raised that the pay bill did not relate to the retired men in this service.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that certainly the last provision repealing the law which applies to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps can not be germane when this bill applies only to the Army. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I offer it again with the proviso left out.

The SPEAKER. It will be unnecessary for the Clerk to report it again, as it is the former amendment with the proviso omitted.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May we have it reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 38: Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"None of the money appropriated in this or any other act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, or Public Health Service, who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association as a sales or contract agent or as the manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department, the Navy, Marine Corps, or the Navy Department, the Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, or Public Health Service, any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. And none of the money appropriated in this or any other act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of any of the services hereinbefore enumerated who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the particular service hereinbefore enumerated from which such officer was retired."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Senate amendment is an amendment striking out the language of the House bill. The amendment to the Senate amendment undertakes to substitute new material in lieu of what the Senate struck out, and is not an amendment to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that any amendment that is germane is in order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Senate struck out the House amendment.

The SPEAKER. The difference between the two Houses is the House amendment that was stricken out by the Senate, so the House amendment is before the House.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The motion is to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. And the Senate amendment is to strike out the House provision which brings the subject before the House. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment as originally drawn has not been changed in the slightest by the striking out of the last few lines. The purpose of this amendment is to amend the existing law in so far as it applies to the naval officers and certain other services. This bill deals only with the officers of the Army, and surely it is not germane to this bill to include the officers of other services. The mere fact that there was a joint pay bill, as stated by the gentleman from Kansas, in no way liberalizes the rule worked in support of the point of order, because the general pay bill did not deal with this particular matter. The effect of this amendment would be to repeal by indirection the very statute that the Speaker has ruled could not be repealed directly.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that that point of order is good.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer the amendment again striking out the reference to other services and apply it only to the Army.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 38: Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"None of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association as a sales or contract agent or as the manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department, any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. And none of the money appropriated shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of any of the services hereinbefore enumerated who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the particular service hereinbefore enumerated from which such officer was retired."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, so that the House may know just exactly what the modified language will do, it is the intention of the amendment to cover only the retired officers of the Army, according to the draft that the Clerk has just read, and the effect of the first sentence would prohibit the payment of any retired officer of the Army of retired pay who is employed as a sales or contract agent or as manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions to the service, and would prohibit also the payment of retired pay to any retired officer who is employed in any capacity by any individual, copartnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the service from which the officer was retired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. As I heard the amendment, I got the understanding that a retired officer might be employed in some capacity other than as sales manager or sales director and not be subject to the limitations of this amendment. If I am correct in my understanding, a concern might employ a retired officer in some capacity other than as sales director or manager and have the benefit of his influence. I know the intention of the gentleman and that he does not want that to happen. If this amendment is not broad enough to apply to any position, I think it should be further modified.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the bill left the House it would undoubtedly prevent the employment of any retired officer in any capacity with any firm, copartnership, or corporation that sold anything to the Army, but as the bill comes back from the Senate it prohibits the employment of a retired officer in the capacity of a sales agent who is engaged in the business of making direct sales or who is employed by a firm or corporation as managing head or director of such sales.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Or is employed by any company that from time to time sells.

Mr. HICKS. Hearing the amendment read and the gentleman's explanation, I want to ask him this question: Would it preclude a retired Army officer from going into the railroad business?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would not. It says "making direct sales."

Mr. HICKS. A railroad company sells transportation.

Mr. ANTHONY. But that is not a direct sale. It is a service.

Mr. HICKS. But is not a railroad company selling transportation?

Mr. ANTHONY. We considered that and we thought that it would be an improbable thing to consider as coming under the proposed amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Under this would a retired Army officer be able to work for a telephone company?

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TILSON. A telephone company is undoubtedly selling service to the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea of the conferees was to broaden the House amendment and make it possible for an officer to accept employment with a business firm, except as a sales agent or as a managing head or director of sales frequently made by the company which employs him.

Mr. TILSON. As the bill left the House an officer could not work for hardly any concern, because there is none of the large concerns but occasionally does some business and in some way comes in contact with the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. FIELDS. I understand by the gentleman's amendment that a retired officer could not receive his retired pay if employed in the capacity of a sales manager or as a director of sales, but he might be employed as the head of the credit division, or in the purchasing division, or as president, or in a great many other responsible positions where his influence would be just as great as it would be at the head of the sales department; and does not the gentleman think his amendment should be so drawn as to prevent his employment by a concern selling supplies to the Government?

Mr. ANTHONY. The intent of the language is a compromise made with the idea of modifying the original harshness of the House amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. The amendment goes much further than that. The amendment applies to any official, no matter in what capacity employed by any corporation, provided that corporation customarily makes sales to the Government.

Mr. FIELDS. It refers first to the sales division, and, of course, later on speaks of employment by any company, but I infer that that implies to the positions first referred to in the amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. In the case of sales manager or sales agent, it applies only to corporations that incidentally and only incidentally make sales to the Government.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the amendment as it is now before the House provide that it shall apply only to retired officers in the Army?

Mr ANTHONY. It does.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is not the purpose, however, of the gentleman from Kansas to further modify that amendment so that an Army officer would be confined in his activities to the Army? As I understood the amendment when it was read, it provided that they should not be permitted to sell to the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Geodetic Survey, or the Public Health Service.

Mr. ANTHONY. The original idea was that they should not be permitted to sell to the branch of the service from which they are retired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-eight Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I present a corrected copy of the motion to recede and concur, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the parliamentary situation is that the gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment, and the gentleman from New Jersey moves to recede and concur. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur with an amendment as follows: "Restore the matter stricken out of said amendment and amend it to read as follows: None of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association as a sales or contract agent, or as a manager or directing head of sales or contracts for the purpose of selling, contracting for the sale of, negotiating for the sale of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions. And none of the money appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by an individual, partnership, corporation, or association regularly or frequently engaged in making direct sales of any merchandise or material to the War Department or the Army."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment has been redrawn with the hope that we are not imposing a hardship upon anyone. It was the purpose of the amendment as first presented to make it applicable to four services of the Government, but by reason of the point of order it is now limited to the service in the Army. The first part of the amendment is for no other purpose than if any man becomes a sales agent or salesman of merchandise for some company selling to the Government, we prohibit him from using his influence in the matter of making such sales to the department from which he is retired. The second part of this amendment, and I want to call attention to the fact it is divided, the last part is separated and distinct from the first part, and says that this appropriation shall not be used to pay the retired pay of an officer who is employed by anyone engaged in selling merchandise or material to the department of the Government from which he retired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. For instance, would the last amendment cover a case like this, a perfectly innocent transaction, where some officer of junior rank, retired by reason of disability, holds the position of a bookkeeper in some big corporation and incidentally some part of that corporation is making sales to that part of the Army from which this man came? He has no relation to the transaction—would it prevent that man having that employment?

Mr. DICKINSON. If the company was regularly engaged and was a regular customer of the Government and made regular sales to the Government I think it would prevent his employment, but you can not have a rule excepting every case.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand, but we ought to make it broader than the three or four people we have in mind.

Mr. DICKINSON. This is for the purpose of protecting the Government——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand.

Mr. DICKINSON. In every limitation of this kind there is always an individual case, and the gentleman is looking at an individual——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have nobody in mind, but I am thinking of the fact that the greater number of retired officers are comparatively junior in service and not men so distinguished that they are likely to come into these important positions in industrial concerns of the country. A man who is retired for disability has not completed his 62 years, and he is employed perhaps in some minor capacity if he gets work outside. These younger men would be likely to have subordinate positions in which they have no influence whatsoever with the policy and affairs of the concern, and possibly would not know that they were doing business with the Government in that particular service from which they came.

Mr. DICKINSON. We are only restricting him from making sales to the department from which he is retired. Now, it is true you can not hit the big fellow without hitting some little fellows. Why, there may be some people engaged in the organization of making sales to the Government and they are employing the men for their influence in making the sales. I think it is proper to restrict it——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. DICKINSON. And when we restrict that possibility it seems to me we must impose some hardship on some fellow who might be employed further down the line who has not that influence, but the rule must be broad enough to cover both and we are only restricting it to one service of the Government.

I do not think that a man out here ought to be restricted as a retired officer from selling his wheat to a milling concern that happens to sell flour to the Government for the soldiers, and for that reason we are trying to draw this as liberally along that line as we possibly can, and we have restricted this part of the amendment still more by providing that it shall apply to any individual, partnership, or corporation employed regularly or frequently engaged in making contract sales of merchandise or material to the branch of the Government from which he is retired.

Mr. HUSTED. Is this not the situation? The first part of your amendment applies even in the case of incidental sales, where the concern sells incidentally only to the Government. In that case it says the retired officer may not be a sales manager or a sales agent. That applies in every case, even where there is only one sale to the Government. It says that the retired officer may not be a sales manager or a sales agent. In other words, he shall not be directly connected with a single sale to the Government. The second amendment applies only to retired officers who are employed by individuals, corporations, or partnerships that regularly and as a part of their usual where the concern sells incidentally only to the Government. from which the officer was retired. Any retired officer connected in any way with such a concern can not draw retired pay.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for the purpose of offering his substitute amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. Then I offer the substitute which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: "None of the money appropriated in this or any other act shall be used to pay any officer on the retired list of the Army who is employed by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association contracting for the sales of, negotiating for the sales of, or furnishing to the Army or the War Department or any other branch of the Government any supplies, materials, equipment, lands, buildings, plants, vessels, or munitions."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. It is an amendment to strike out the last sentence.

Mr. FIELDS. I desire to discuss my substitute.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from California wants to offer a perfecting amendment to my amendment.

Mr. FIELDS. I think we should act upon the substitute first, and if the substitute is rejected, then the perfecting amendment would be in order. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. The perfecting amendment should be offered first.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the interest of orderly procedure I ask that the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] be allowed to offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, my amendment is to strike out the last sentence of the Anthony amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers a perfecting amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWING to the amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Strike out the last sentence of the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this entire matter has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs for some time, and that committee has given it considerable thought, and my reason for injecting a naval point of view into this discussion at this time is that the same regulation should obtain in both the Army and Navy.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. In fact the naval provision is more severe than this one, is it not?

Mr. SWING. Yes. Some years ago there was a scandal, because at that time there was no limitation at all, and under the whip and spur of public opinion arising out of that scandal Congress prohibited retired naval officers from engaging in employment in any capacity with any company selling anything to the Government. But I say, as a matter of public policy, we do not want to establish a policy which will deprive men from engaging in productive activity who still have years of good service left in them. Men who have been educated by the Government in technical lines and who are highly skilled should not be required to live in enforced idleness. We do not want to uphold the policy of maintaining drones in this country. [Applause.] Organized society wants to see every man continue, as long as he has years of service left in him and is physically and mentally fit, to exercise his talents in some creative capacity.

There is a possible danger, of course, from the unrestrained employment of retired officers, and that is from the exercise of undue influence, and that is a species of fraud. We want to safeguard the Government against the bringing of retired officers into direct contact and communication with their former associates, because it might result in some cases in the use of undue influence.

Now, the first sentence in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas absolutely safeguards the Government. It prohibits any retired officer from coming into contact with the department from which he has been retired or with his former associates for the purpose of soliciting an order, making a sale, or advocating a claim. But the second sentence goes too far. It prohibits a man's employment in any capacity. Why, he could not even be a janitor with a firm making regular sales to the Government. He could not be a draftsman or apply himself in any technical line where it would be absolutely proper for him to work.

I believe the important thing is to safeguard the Government from undue influence, as the first sentence does, but we should allow these men to be employed in proper capacities where they are not brought into direct or indirect contact with the Government or any of their former associates in any capacity whatever. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. Try to make it three. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I want to refer briefly to two points in the substitute I have offered. First it prohibits——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, before the discussion begins I want to make a point of order.

Mr. FIELDS. The discussion has already begun.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late to make a point of order, as the discussion has already begun.

Mr. FIELDS. My substitute would prevent the employment of a retired officer in any capacity by any individual, firm, association, or corporation who is engaged in furnishing supplies to the War Department or to the Government. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] confines the limitation to those furnishing supplies to the War Department. As far as the Government is concerned, what is the difference between furnishing supplies to the War Department, or to the Navy Department, or the Public Health Service, or the Coast and Geodetic Survey? There is no difference. If it is vicious or undesirable for a retired officer of the Army to be in the employ of a concern furnishing supplies to the War Department while drawing his retired pay, it is equally objectionable for him to be in the employ of a concern furnishing supplies to the Navy Department or to any other branch of the Government.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it not true that his acquaintance and his influence would be largely confined to the department with which he was connected?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. The gentleman does not know much about the Army and Navy Club down here if he thinks that.

Mr. FIELDS. No; the gentleman must not overlook the fact that gentlemen of the Army are popular and influential with gentlemen of the Navy.

Mr. BLANTON. And vice versa.

Mr. FIELDS. And vice versa, as the gentleman from Texas suggests

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KINCHELOE. What is the difference between the gentleman's substitute and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]?

Mr. FIELDS. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], as I understand it, is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas; but my amendment applies the limitations to the sale of supplies to every branch of the Government instead of to the War Department; and, as I said just a moment ago, if it is undesirable for an officer to be employed by a concern furnishing supplies to the War Department, it is equally objectionable for him to be employed by a concern furnishing material to the Navy Department, to the Public Health Service, or to any other branch of the Federal Government, and that is the only difference between my substitute and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas except one other point. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas withholds retired pay from an officer employed in the sales division of a concern furnishing supplies to the War Department; my substitute would withhold the retired pay from an officer employed in any division of, or any capacity by, a concern furnishing supplies to the War Department or any other branch of the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be some time given to the other side. Not all the time should be yielded to those who are on one side of the argument.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the only objection that I have to the provision agreed upon in conference is that I do not think it is quite as strong as it ought to be. I am utterly amazed at the attitude of some gentlemen who are willing that a man in the Army or Navy shall retire and then accept a place with a corporation whose principal business is to sell to the Government. Now, human nature is practically the same all over the world. These men who get these splendid salaries, who leave the Army and Navy and go with concerns with which they have had no sort of previous connection, go to those concerns because of the mental attitude of the men doing business. They believe when they employ that man that he will be more serviceable to them than somebody not connected with the Government.

I am utterly unwilling to deprive a retired Army officer of an opportunity to make the best he can of the remainder of his life, but I am utterly opposed to a man retiring from the Army and being employed by either a corporation, firm, or individual that sells constantly to the Government. Some gentlemen have said that if one of these men was employed by a street car company, and that company should carry an Army officer, it would be a violation of the law. Of course, that is absurd. The street car company is not selling merchandise; nor is the railroad company selling merchandise. Those things are absurd. I do not know that they need to have us take care of them. I believe the combined influence of the Army and Navy officers can command more votes in this House on 30 minutes' notice than any other combined influences in America.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. They do not seem to be able to do it now.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman says they do not seem to be able to do it now. I do not know whether they have taken any interest in this matter. I want to say to you that they are a splendid lot of fellows. Here is a man, a graduate of the mechanical college down in my State. He is my intimate friend. He calls me up over the phone and explains a matter to me and gives me his version of it. The result is it is a very natural thing for me to yield to the solicitation of my friend. The same thing would apply if an Army officer or Navy officer who was justly very popular, a man of great ability, should retire from the service of the Government only when he realized that he could get a magnificent position with some company doing business with the Government. I think, gentlemen, you are standing in the way of the best interests of the Government. How can we say we are going to permit these men, educated and trained by the Government, to retire before they reach the retirement age to go and accept employment with an institution that is doing business with the Government? I can not understand it. Now, let us indulge for a moment in the idea that that will not have any influence on human beings. It does have influence, and these business men who employ them know what they do. Let us avoid the very appearance of evil. The English Government would not tolerate it for a second. The English Government and the English people have always been noted for being the most practical people in the world. A man in the civil service in England is not permitted to vote. In other words, a man who is not elected by the votes of the people, but appointed to the civil service in England, is not permitted to vote, because they believe he is liable to vote for his own interests.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it will be recalled that the House by a large vote adopted the amendment as it appears on page 23. There was no real opposition to it. After this action of the House the newspapers reported that the Secretary of War was making caustic criticism of Congress because of the action taken. Two Members of the House on the majority side took occasion to reply to that criticism, namely, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], and you will recall that they were liberally applauded on both sides of the aisle in making their replies. Why? Because they stated that the House in adopting the amendment on page 23 did nothing more than apply to officers of the Army the law which has applied to officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps since 1897, and the action of the House could not be construed as singling out any particular Army officer, but was so drawn as to apply alike to all officers of the Army. So long as the law remains unchanged as to officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps, certainly no sound objection can be offered why it should not apply with equal force to the retired officers of the Army.

The House should further insist on its amendment and refuse to recede. It may be that the law applying to the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps and which this amendment extends to the officers of the Army should be modified, but this is not a legislative bill, and we should not here undertake to legislate for these three services in reference to this matter. It is now unwise to undertake to liberalize the former action of the House only recently taken, since no one denies but that the action of the House was primarily intended and has had the effect of placing retired officers of the Army on the same basis as retired officers of the Navy and Marine Corps.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It occurred to me in the course of the debate that there is a difference between the Army and the Navy. The Navy officer is apt to go into the ordnance or armor-plate work where the amounts run into large sums.

Mr. OLIVER. I can not yield further in the limit of time allotted. The law in reference to naval officers has been enforced for many years and forbids any officer, active or retired, of the Navy or Marine Corps from accepting employment with any company, corporation, or individual engaged in the business of selling military supplies either to the Navy or to the Army. You will note that it prohibits employment with any company selling military supplies to either Navy or Army.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No matter whether it is a matter of minor importance or what kind of an article.

Mr. OLIVER. So long as it partakes of a military character, it makes no difference whether it is an article of minor importance or not. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Kansas properly took the position when the amendment was originally offered and adopted that there was no reason why retired officers of the Army should not be placed on the same basis as the retired officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, and the House seemed to concede with remarkable unanimity the correctness of that position. Congress may decide to modify the law, but it should be done after the matter has been given careful consideration by the proper legislative committee, and if modified it should apply to the officers of the several services alike.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the clause that was struck out ought never to have been on an appropriation bill. It was a change of law. It is no justification that a like clause and change of law applying to the Navy was put on another appropriation bill. It was also a change of law, and no change of law can be properly perfected here in the House as an amendment to an appropriation so as to do what is wanted and not to do more. The House can see the difficulty we are under. Instead of referring this provision to a committee and having it perfected and brought in as a change of law we are asked to do all this here, with limited debate and time for consideration.

Now, the provision that the House put in has already done very much harm, and the amendment now offered to that provision will not help it. A very deserving man was lately made president of a great company that does not as its business sell to the Government. It sells to the people all over the Union, and meanwhile the Government needs some of its goods and takes a little from time to time, and that is all. But under this clause and this proposed amendment (of Mr. ANTHONY), inasmuch as that man is president, and therefore in charge of all the contractors and selling agents of his company, he would be barred by the first part of this substitute, and as he is in this company, although it does not do business with the Government as its main business, and because that company is occasionally making sales he is barred by the second part of the amendment. The result is that the country at large will lose the benefit of this man's abilities in carrying on this splendid business for the benefit of all the people. He will have to be turned out as president or else he will be dropped from the retired list of the Army.

There is not time now to perfect an amendment that would do what we want to do and nothing else, and which would say that a retired officer personally shall not act or exercise his influence with others in making or negotiating sales to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, this matter is historical. During the war with Spain a Member of Congress was president and chief owner of the only factory in the United States that could furnish gauntlet gloves to the Army. The law makes it a penal offense for any Member of Congress to contract with the Government, and the question arose as to whether the Government could buy directly and cheaper from the factory or must be sent to a middleman, who would make another profit. It was determined after careful consideration that being president and owner did not make the sale the man's own contract and that the United States could buy direct from the company.

This is also one of the difficulties that existed all through the Great War. Necessarily we had experts in all of the trades and manufactures employed as officers in the Quartermaster Department. They immediately gave up any direct action for their manufactory firms in supplying iron, machinery, linen, socks, cloths, or whatever it may be, in dealing with the Government. They acted for the Government only, letting other people represent the factories where they had been employed; but it was impossible for the Government to do good work unless it was free to take the right men who knew the business and trust to their honor that they would do what was right, and we have to do that now. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, most of the changes of law applicable to the Army and the Navy are riders on appropriation bills. This is a simple proposition we have here, although there has been an effort to complicate it. What is the proposition? General Harbord on December 29 last, retired. I am informed that he will be under 64 years of age next April.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, my understanding is that General Harbord would have had about eight years to serve before he would go to the retirement age of 64.

Mr. BLANTON. Then he is now only 56, and that only emphasizes my argument the more. Since December 29 last he, a vigorous, able-bodied man of 56 years of age, has been retired and has been drawing from the people of this Nation $9,000 a year as retirement pay, which is $1,500 more than a Member of Congress draws, and he has not done one single service for the Government since that time, and will not the rest of his life. He will continue to draw $9,000, a vigorous young man 56 years old, for life, and not do a single service for the Government. What, then, happened? The International Radio Corporation employed him. It had made arrangements to employ him before he retired, I am informed. It has made him its president. What is the International Radio Corporation? It is an adjunct of and an affiliated subsidiary of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., one of the biggest monopolies in the United States. Why have they got this young 56-year-old retired American general employed down there? Not only to sell their radio stuff to the Government but to manipulate and influence the passage of laws that will help this monopoly continue to be a monopoly in the United States.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] sought to amend this proposition. He offered a good amendment. The House adopted it. We ought to stand by his amendment.

I am for his amendment, and what is the amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]? Do you know what has to be done before you could reach General Harbord? You have to change both of these clauses in the Anthony amendment. If you pass the Anthony amendment, it will still permit General Harbord, a young man 56 years old, to continue to draw retirement pay of $9,000 a year from the Government without rendering us any service and at the same time on another big salary serve a big monopoly corporation. I say he is a young man, and he is young when we consider the services of our distinguished colleague [Mr. CANNON], who is still serving valiantly in this House now, though in his eighty-seventh year. Under the first clause of the Anthony amendment, in order to reach General Harbord, he would have to be a sales or contracting agent. He is not; he is the president. He would have to be the manager. He is not the manager; he is the president. He does not come within this definition. The first paragraph of the Anthony amendment does not reach him. Let us look at the second paragraph. The second paragraph provides that his corporation must make sales regularly and frequently to the Government in order to reach him. His corporation might not do that, and yet might effect the very purpose for which he was employed. It must regularly and frequently make sales. The Anthony amendment lets him out. It does not reach him. I am for the Fields amendment next to the Dickinson one the House adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the motion, the amendment and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is not the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas divisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, but the first vote will come upon the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey to recede and concur.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of that question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that can be done now, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. That does not keep this matter from being divided.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the motion has already been divided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair does not see what will be accomplished by it, but the question will be divided. The question is on the motion to recede.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has divided the question and put it on the motion to recede.

Mr. BLANTON. I asked for a division of the motion to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has divided the question and has put the question.

Mr. BLANTON. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand a rising vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede, and the gentleman from Texas demands a division upon that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 51.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand tellers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 126, not voting 143, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. COUGHLIN. I desire simply to be recorded "present."

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 49: Page 38, line 1, insert: "Hereafter the cost of transportation of civilian employees and of material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Signal Corps, Air Service, Medical Department, Engineer Department, and the Coast Artillery Corps, and in connection with the construction and installation of fire-control projects at seacoast fortifications by the Coast Artillery Corps may be charged to the appropriations for the work in connection with which such transportation charges are required."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in Senate amendment 49 with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment 49, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"On and after July 1, 1923, the cost of transportation of material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Signal Corps, Ordnance Department, Chemical Warfare Service, Air Service, Medical Department, Engineer Department, and the Coast Artillery Corps, and in connection with the construction and installation of fire-control projects at seacoast fortifications by the Coast Artillery Corps may be charged to the appropriations for the work in connection with which such transportation charges are required, and the Budget estimates for each of such appropriations shall hereafter carry separately the amounts required for such transportation costs."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, this permits the transportation cost of material to be charged to the specific appropriation which Congress makes for the work.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the House recede and concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 101: Page 86, line 5, insert: "Provided, That the present incumbent, upon the completion of his service, shall be entitled to be placed upon the retired list of the United States Army (with the rank of lieutenant colonel) under the same conditions as are prescribed by law for other officers of the Army."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment 101 and concur in the same.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the motion which I offer permits the retirement of the present master of the sword at the Military Academy, Colonel Keeler. A previous act of Congress, enacted many years ago, was intended to give him this right, but the Judge Advocate General has recently intimated that there is some doubt about the language passed at that time; so this is offered in order to clear that up and, as this officer is nearing the retirement age, it will permit him to retire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 106: Page 100, after line 4, insert: "That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 106 with an amendment as follows: "In line 9 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "work," change the semicolon to a period, and strike out the remainder of the amendment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion to recede and concur.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement first. As the bill left the House it contained nothing in regard to the prohibition of the use of the stop watch or in regard to the payment of bonuses to arsenal and governmental employees. The Senate inserted the language which has heretofore been carried in the House bill for several years past. In conference the House yielded to the language which prohibits the use of the stop watch or any other time-measuring device, and we have agreed to reinstate that in the bill, and the amendment which I propose would eliminate that part of the prohibition against the payment of a bonus for efficiency to employees should the War Department decide that it desired to do so.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion to recede and concur.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks for a division of the question.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I will not take up very much time, but I will be unable to yield. This is an old question. The use of the stop watch in industry is the most inhuman thing that has been devised to drive a man beyond his capacity to produce. The history of it is 15 years old. No industry at the present time is using it. It has been abandoned by the man that proposed it, and they admit that instead of efficiency it is an expense. I can read you an article in the Scientific American along that line, published in October, 1921.

I want to call attention to this, that when they failed in private industry they tried to put it into the arsenals and the navy yards of this country. It failed there; and two committees after investigating it reported adversely, saying that it would increase the cost in the arsenals and navy yards. They proposed a bill to put a stop to it. At that time they found they could get a limitation on an appropriation bill, and they did so, and that stopped the use of the stop watch in the arsenals and navy yards.

The language they propose is the same that we propose in this bill, the same language that has been carried in the House bill for the last eight years, and was carried in the bill——

Mr. FIELDS. The same language that has been carried in every House bill for the last 10 years and was carried in this bill and went out on a point of order.

Mr. HULL. No; the gentleman is all right up to his last statement. But you in this House went on record—all of you, except six, voted on December 21 in favor of the Senate language. You are on record. In what shape are you to-day to reverse that and say that you made a mistake at that time? That was on the naval bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Was not that clause put in and was it not defeated on a roll call?

Mr. HULL. No; it was on a point of order that was sustained. You have always sustained the language that is proposed at this time, the language that is in the Senate bill. We want the same language continued, and therefore it is necessary to defeat the motion to recede and concur with an amendment. What we want to do is to recede and concur, and then you will have the prohibition that you have had on all the bills for the last 10 or 12 years. It is the same amendment that you placed on the naval bill. I hope the House will make it emphatic, so that they will understand that the House of Representatives is opposed to this inhuman method of trying to drive men beyond their capacity. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is what is known as the Hull-Brookhart proposition. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] tried to get it into the House bill, and he failed, and then the distinguished Senator of Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] put it on for him in the Senate. If we pass it, it will show that the union demand on Congress is greater than the people's demand. This is not merely a stop-watch proposition. The Hull-Brookhart proposition provides that in the arsenals, where thousands of employees are paid by the people's money in salaries, the Government can not even have an observation of their movements. Show me the private business that would last five minutes where the supervision or observation of the movements of the employees are denied. Are the business men of this Nation going to approve of your action if you vote to prevent the Government from supervising the employees in arsenals?

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not; I have only 5 minutes, and this important debate is limited to 10 minutes. Every other employee of the Government has supervision over him. It is no disgrace. We Congressmen have supervision over us and it is no disgrace. The American people sit in the galleries and watch our attitude and our vote, and it is no disgrace. Show me the man who does not court supervision, show me the man who is afraid of supervision, and I will show you a man whose work it not up to the standard.

The distinguished Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, came before one of your committees and testified that since this provision had been carried in the law it has been the means of not getting more than 67 per cent of efficiency in the men who were working for the Government. That means a loss to this Government of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money. I want to see it stopped. I am for the American people and I am not under union domination, thank God. I am appealing to you in behalf of the American people who are tax burdened. It produces millions of dollars of waste. Are we not ever going to get back where we can use sound business sense and business judgment? Our colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], was brave enough and strong enough when this question was put up to him while he was presiding over the House to decide it in favor of the people, and he said a question was never settled until it was settled right. He proceeded to settle it right, and you followed his action by striking out the Hull amendment. It went to the Senate and the distinguished Senator from Iowa had it put back. Now, our friend here, who has the Rock Island Arsenal in his district, wants to put this waste on the American people again. I am not going to vote for it. We ought to vote not to recede, and vote no, and thus vote down both amendments, the one offered by the gentleman from Kansas and the one offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and send it back to the Senate with our further disagreement.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and two Members, not a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not see why the stop-watch proposition should be discussed at this time, because the House has receded on the stop-watch provision. The subcommittee that brought this bill into the House brought it in with that provision in the bill. It went out on a point of order. The bill went over to the Senate, and the Senate put back the provision. In conference the House conferees and the Senate conferees agreed on the stop-watch provision. The only thing in controversy under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is the last clause of the amendment, which provides that business concerns may offer or give a bonus to any of the Government employees who make an extraordinarily good record. In other words, it enables them to reward efficiency and good service, and that is all there is in the proposition.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. And if that is all there is in the proposition, why not confine the discussion to that? Why should gentlemen erect a big straw man and then come in and knock him down with an air of "Oh, I am the man who killed Cock Robin; I am the man who put the stop-watch provision on the map"? They discuss it as if it were something that had just been discovered, as if the conferees had not already agreed to it. I now yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman wants to permit a bonus beyond the regular wages that are paid, and that permits the very thing that we are trying to prohibit, and the gentleman knows it very well.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman attributes to me some knowledge that I think I do not have, but we all have our limitations. I must confess I do not see that that is involved in the stop-watch proposition. I know that if I were engaged in a factory and I did some good work, some efficient work, I would not object at all to their giving me an extra pair of shoes or giving me an extra dollar or two. I do not understand why organized labor should make a fight against anything which tends to bring about efficiency, provided that efficiency is rewarded by extra pay or otherwise. Of course I may be wrong about this matter, but I think the prosperity of this world, our own happiness, our contentment, and the conduct of this Government depends upon the efficiency of every man in every line of labor; and every good man belonging to labor organizations—and many of them are my warm friends—every man who thinks right believes in efficiency; and if this provision, as the conferees have agreed to it, simply brings about efficiency, I do not see why there should be such an enormous controversy about the matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on all the pending motions.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Promotions" and insert "Congress), promotions."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I could not understand from the reading what this was.

Mr. ANTHONY. This strikes out the period which was interposed between two words in a sentence.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; in this bill. There ought to be a comma but it is a period, which is set right in the middle of two words which should constitute one sentence.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 124: That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 and, in accordance with the authority granted by House Concurrent Resolution 84, passed at the present session, agree to the amendment of the Senate with the following amendment: In lines 6 and 7 of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment, strike out the words "at the Virginia end of the Key Bridge."

And the Senate agree to the same.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
ROBERT E. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.
LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
L. HEISLER BALL,
W. L. JONES,
CARTER GLASS,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On No. 124: Modifies the paragraph with respect to a bathing beach and bathhouse for the colored population of the District so as to prescribe no particular place for the location of such bathing beach and bathhouse.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
ROBERT E. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, in the District appropriation bill the Senate inserted an amendment reappropriating certain money to establish a colored bathing beach and fixed its location at the south end of the Key Bridge. Some disagreement resulted as to the locating of the beach at that point, and when the matter was before the House the other day the House authorized the conferees to amend the Senate amendment by striking out the location, leaving the location open. Adoption of this report will bring the House and Senate into complete agreement and finally dispose of the bill.

My own investigation shows that not only are many white people in Virginia opposed to the proposed location but the colored persons for whose benefit this beach is being proposed object to the location also, and hence there seemed no reason for the House to further insist on that location.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under a standing order of the Senate, agreed to January 24, 1901, it is provided that Washington's Farewell Address shall be read in the Senate on this day immediately following the approval of the Journal. The Senate this morning meets in recess, and there is no Journal to be approved. In pursuance of the order, however, the Vice President, January 9, 1923, designated the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to read the address. The Chair now recognizes the junior Senator from Virginia for that purpose.

Mr. GLASS read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to be proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common danger, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to reply for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the dangers of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding of them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and it is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissention, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruptions, which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundations of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favored nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views it in the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported favorably Senate bill 4478. The purpose of the bill is to stabilize the price of wheat. It provides for a corporation with a capital stock of $300,000,000 and a board of three members. The Secretary of Agriculture is made chairman of the board, and the other two members of the board are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The bill fixes the price of No. 1 northern spring wheat for the crop of 1923 at $1.75 a bushel at the primary markets of the country and authorizes the board on the 1st of July of 1923 to fix the price for the crop of 1924, and on the 1st of July of 1924 to fix the price for the crop of 1925, and directs the board to prescribe rules and regulations for the administration of the act.

An embargo upon wheat and flour is declared until July 1, 1926. Exception to the embargo is made on wheat to be used for seed purposes, and an exception is also made on in-transit shipments of wheat and flour; also on wheat imported in compliance with the tariff act of 1922, which is used in manufacturing flour for reexport.

The bill authorizes the board to charge 5 cents a bushel for handling charges, so that if the bill becomes a law the farmer will receive $1.70 a bushel for his wheat, less the freight rate and the handling charges at his local elevator.

Mr. President, it is not hard to understand how some Senators shy at this bill or any other bill that has for its purpose the stabilization of the prices of farm products by the Government.

It is unfortunate that the condition of the wheat growers is such as to make it necessary to consider such a measure as this, and I am sure, if I had not been a member of the Agricultural Committee and heard the stories of the hardships and privations that the farmers of this country have suffered in the last three years, I should not be in favor of price fixing by the Government. Nor should I be in favor of this measure if I believed that there was any possible chance for the wheat growers of this country to work out of their present financial condition without aid from the Government.

Or, if the farmers were in any way to blame for their present financial condition, I should not be asking the Government to assist them, but everywhere the farmer in the last three years has worked harder to make both ends meet than at any time for more than a half century. Everywhere he has practiced thrift and economy only to find, when the harvest was over, that he has not received enough from his year's labor to meet his obligations, and, as I see it, unless the Government does something to stabilize the price of wheat there is grave danger of that branch of agriculture breaking down and becoming demoralized.

Mr. President, the distressing condition of the wheat grower has been brought about by the farmer answering his country's call for more farm products during the war, and by legislation made necessary by the World War, and I shall have no trouble in proving that this Government is responsible, in a large measure, for the losses the farmers have met in the last three years.

I am sure we all remember how the Government demanded that the farmer produce more farm products. He was told that bread would win the war; that we must not only feed our own armies in Europe but the armies of our allies and the citizens of those countries as well. Wheat was thought to be such a mighty factor in the World War that the Food Administrator prescribed a lower grade of flour than the country had been accustomed to use.

The American farmer has never failed to answer his country's call, either in peace or in war, and he answered his country's call for more farm products during the war by increasing the acreage production in this country something over 26,000,000 acres. This, together with the surplus of agricultural products that existed at the time we entered the war, made an overproduction of 40,000,000 acres of crop production more than our consumption. It is this overproduction, together with the unfair, unjust, and unreasonable, and, I am going to say, criminal administration of legislation that Congress passed during the war that has brought about the hardships and privations the country has witnessed upon the American farm in the last three years.

For more than two years now the Agricultural Committee has held extended hearings on different bills that the committee has had under consideration for the relief of agriculture. Numerous witnesses have told of the distressing condition of agriculture in different parts of the country, and all have agreed that unless the Government came to the assistance of the wheat growers and gave Government aid it would be impossible for that branch of agriculture to continue to grow wheat at the present high cost of production.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that if all the Senators could have listened to the stories of the hardships and privations that the farmers have suffered in the last three years they would agree with the Agricultural Committee that the Government owes a debt to the farmers of the country, and especially to the wheat growers, which it can only pay by stabilizing the one great agricultural crop for the next three years, so as to enable the farmers to meet their obligations and continue the production of wheat, which is so essential to the life of the Nation.

One of the saddest stories related to the Agricultural Committee was by Mr. John F. Sinclair, who gave his residence as Minneapolis, Minn., and his business as that of a banker and investor.

The question, "Can the farmers work out of their present financial difficulties?" was submitted by Mr. Sinclair to a number of banks in Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana, and 291 answers were received. All with the exception of 5 stated that it was impossible for the farmers to work out of their present financial condition with the high cost of production unless something was done by the Government to stabilize the price of wheat.

The saddest part of Mr. Sinclair's story was of the suicides that have taken place upon the farm. He stated that last year there were 30 suicides on the farms in Minnesota, 87 in North Dakota, 32 in South Dakota, and 15 in Montana, making 168 suicides that have taken place on the farms in those four States in the last 12 months.

From all over the country come stories of the hardships and privations upon the farm. Everywhere the story is told of the young men leaving the farm. In one county in Idaho 1,500 young men were reported as leaving the farms last year.

The story was told of children in some parts of the country being forced to go barefooted in winter and being denied the benefits of school because there was so little left from the harvest after freight and expenses were paid that in some cases charity had to be extended to some of the farmers in States where the soil was rich and the harvest abundant. This condition was shown to exist to some extent in most all of the Western States.

R. W. Frazier, testifying as to the condition in North Dakota, said that in Divide County last year there were 18 suicides. All of them were farmers with the exception of one. Mr. Frazier exhibited newspapers showing that in some of the counties in North Dakota more than 75 per cent of all the farms were advertised for delinquent taxes. He said that the farmers in some parts of North Dakota were in such distressing circumstances that when there was a death in the family some member of the family was compelled to make a rough wooden box for burial because there was no money to pay funeral expenses.

Mr. President, a representative of organized labor appeared before the committee in favor of the bill. He stated that organized labor recognized the deplorable condition of agriculture to-day. While the bill might increase the cost of bread to some extent, he said organized labor understood that the farmer had not been given a square deal during the war, because the increased cost of labor and freight rates had of necessity increased the cost of production to the farmer far beyond the price fixed by the Government.

Mr. President, I have listened to many sad stories in my life, but, with the exception of the stories I have listened to that came from Russia, I have never heard anything to compare with the distressing conditions that exist on the farms in some parts of our own country to-day.

Of course, I understand that a great many people look upon legislation of this kind as socialistic, and I know just how they feel about it, because I do not have to go back far in my life—not as far back as when I first took my oath of office as a Senator, a little more than two years ago—to understand how they look upon legislation for stabilizing the price of farm products, and I am sure that I should agree with them if I did not feel that this was an emergency matter to meet a condition that was forced upon the country by the great World War.

Mr. President, after all, when we come to look at legislation that Congress has passed we find that Congress has stabilized about everything, with the exception of the price of farm products, or has sat idly by and permitted great industrial institutions to stabilize the price of their own products, until to-day the cost of production for the wheat grower is so great that he is not able to meet his obligations or to buy the comforts and in many cases the necessities of life.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to a few things of which Congress has stabilized the price through legislation, without any consideration of its effect upon agriculture.

Congress stabilized the price of the labor of 1,700,000 men working upon the railroads by enacting legislation that increased the price of labor on the railroads 106 per cent, and when Congress stabilized the price of 1,700,000 men working on the railroads they stabilized the price of labor in every other industry in the country, and upon the farm as well. In 1918, 1919, and 1920 the farmers in some parts of the country were forced to pay as high as $10 a day for labor to harvest their crops.

Mr. President, the greatest mistake this Government ever made in its history—and I call it a crime—was made when, through the Federal control act and the Esch-Cummins Act, horizontal increases of 65 per cent were made in all freight rates, regardless of how long the haul or how short the haul, or how high or how low the rate was originally, and without any investigation or consideration as to what the farmer's products would bear to carry them to market.

Ever since railroads have been a factor in the commerce of this country freight rates have been made somewhere near what the products would bear to carry them to market. More has always been charged for the high-priced products than for the low-priced products, and more has always been charged on a mileage basis for the short haul than for the long haul. But when the horizontal increase of 65 per cent was made under the Federal control act and the Esch-Cummins Act, the increase on the low-priced products, with one or two exceptions, was the same as the increase on the higher-priced products, and the increase on the long haul was the same as the increase on the short haul. No thought or investigation or consideration was given as to how high the rate was originally or what the low-priced products would bear to carry them to market.

In making these horizontal increases every principle ever used by railroads in the past in making freight rates was ignored.

As a result of these horizontal increases the farmer is forced to pay a very much larger percentage of the market price of his products to carry them to market than the manufactured article is forced to pay under the present system of rate making.

For instance, the farmers of my State pay a freight rate to Chicago of 97 per cent of the market price on their potatoes, 52 per cent of the market price on onions, 36 per cent of the market price on wheat, 15 per cent of the market price on hogs, and 13.2 per cent of the market price on beans. They pay 53 per cent of the market price on hay to Kansas City and a freight rate of 9.3 per cent of the market price on wool to Boston.

For comparison, I find that men's shoes pay a freight rate of 2½ per cent of the wholesale price from Chicago to Idaho and women's shoes 2 per cent. Men's suitings pay 1½ per cent, and cotton goods pay a freight rate of 4 per cent of the wholesale price from New York to Idaho; and ginghams pay a rate of 2½ per cent. On some of the higher-class articles the freight rate is so small that it can only be measured in decimals and has no influence on the selling price of the article.

Mr. President, to-day the farmer is paying vastly more than his share on the upkeep and operation of our railroads. To-day, under these horizontal increases, the farmer is paying 1,500 per cent higher freight rates on the market value of his products than is paid on the manufactured articles I have mentioned.

These horizontal increases are best shown by a comparison of what the farmers paid in dollars and cents on carload lots in 1913 to carry their products to market and what they paid after the horizontal increases of 65 per cent were made.

In describing the rates I am using Idaho merely because I am more familiar with our freight rates there than in other Western States, but there is very little difference in the freight rates in all of the Western States; so what I say about the increases in my State applies to all the Western States and generally to the whole country.

On an 80,000-pound carload of wheat from Idaho to Chicago the freight rate in 1914 was $400; in 1921 it was $596, or an increase of 49 per cent.

On a 24,000-pound carload of hay to Chicago the freight rate in 1914 was $132.50; in 1921 it was $240, an increase of 81 per cent.

On a 24,000-pound carload of fruit to New York the freight rate in 1914 was $300; in 1921 it was $500, an increase of 67 per cent.

On a 26,000-pound carload of cattle to Chicago the freight rate in 1914 was $203.80; in 1921 the rate was $295.10, an increase of 45 per cent.

On a 24,000-pound carload of sacked wool to Boston the freight rate in 1914 was $475.20; in 1921 it was $831.60, an increase of 74 per cent.

On a 32,000-pound car of baled wool to Boston the freight rate in 1914 was $547.20; in 1921 it was $960, an increase of 75 per cent.

On the 1st of January, 1922, there was a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent in freight rates, with the exception of wheat. On wheat the reduction was 13 per cent, but the reduction was so small that it has not given the West any relief.

Mr. President, these excessive freight rates have had a most disastrous effect upon the business interests of my State. Out of 191 banks, we have had 40 failures in the last two years. Within the last 30 days three national banks and one State bank have closed their doors.

On one of our irrigation projects that is rated by the Government as one of the best irrigation projects in the West, 10 out of 11 banks have closed their doors in the last 18 months. These bank failures in Idaho are not due to crop failures or to the exhaustion of the soil, for the average yield of farm products per acre in Idaho is as large, if not larger, than in any other State in the Union. It is a common thing to see a yield of 40 or 50 bushels of wheat to the acre on our irrigated farms, from 60 to 70 bushels of oats or barley, and from 4 to 8 tons of hay. On our irrigated farms we never have a crop failure. When we sow, we always reap a full harvest; but in some cases the greater the yield the less the farmer has when the harvest is over, for at times some of his farm products will not pay the cost of the freight rate to carry them to market.

The President, in his message of December 8, 1922, in speaking of the problems of transportation, recognized very fully the serious condition that existed from the increase of freight rates on low-priced commodities and he had this to say:

> This transportation problem can not be waived aside. The demand for lowered costs on farm products and basic materials can not be ignored. Rates horizontally increased to meet increased wage outlays during the war inflation are not easily reduced. When some very moderate wage reductions were effected last summer there was a 10 per cent horizontal reduction in rates. I sought at that time, in a very informal way, to have railway managers go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and agree to a heavier reduction on farm products and coal and other basic commodities and leave unchanged the freight tariffs which a very large portion of the traffic was able to bear.
> Neither the managers nor the commission saw fit to adopt the suggestion, so we have the horizontal reduction too slight to be felt by the higher-class cargoes and too little to benefit the heavy tonnage calling most loudly for relief.

If the President was unable to get the railroad managers and the Interstate Commerce Commission to agree to a more liberal reduction on agricultural products than the higher-priced products of the country, in which the freight rates are so small a factor in comparison with their value, it does not seem to me that there is much hope for a reduction in freight rates on wheat and other farm products.

Mr. President, the farmers of this country believed, when the price-fixing committee was called to Washington for the purpose of fixing the price of wheat at the primary markets of the country, that the price fixed at $2.20 by the committee was to be the minimum and not the maximum price as afterwards fixed by the Grain Corporation.

When the Grain Corporation fixed $2.20 a bushel as the maximum price, the farmer was selling his No. 1 northern spring wheat in Minneapolis for $2.72 a bushel. The next day the farmers were selling their wheat in Minneapolis for $2.20 a bushel.

I made an effort to find out from those in charge of the affairs of the Grain Corporation here in Washington just how much profit the Government made out of handling the farmers' wheat during the war. Those in charge seemed to be able to give but very little information on the subject. I have been advised from other sources, however, that the profit of the Government for handling the farmers' wheat was somewhere between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000.

Mr. President, no other country during the war became a speculator and a profiteer in handling the farmers' products.

While the Canadian Government fixed the price of $2.15 at the primary markets, that Government remitted to the Canadian farmer everything that was received above $2.15 a bushel that his wheat brought upon the market, and in 1919 the Canadian farmer received an average of $2.62 for his wheat, while the farmers on this side had to be satisfied with $2.20 a bushel in 1918 and $2.26 a bushel in 1919.

The English Government fixed a minimum price on wheat, but permitted their farmers to sell their wheat for the full market price and besides paid a bonus to her grain growers of something between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000, and for the year of 1921 paid a bonus equivalent to $14 an acre to her grain growers, which was a return greater than was received by the farmers in some of the States that year per acre for their crop.

The Australian Government fixed a minimum price, but permitted the grain growers of that Commonwealth to receive the full market price, and assisted materially in marketing the grain by carrying much of it to market in ships owned by the Government at a very low freight rate. New South Wales paid to her wheat growers a bonus of something over $4,000,000 over the full market price.

Mr. President, the Governments of Great Britain, Canada, and Australia evidently gave some thought and consideration to the increased cost of production that was forced upon the farmers by the great World War. But our own Government seemed to have been afraid that the farmers would enjoy some prosperity. Through legislation we increased labor upon the railroads 106 per cent and freight rates 65 per cent, and then bound the wheat grower down to $2.20 a bushel, the price first fixed by the Grain Corporation in 1919.

Mr. President, through information furnished me by the Agricultural Department, I find that the actual cost of producing a bushel of wheat on the farm in 1918 was $1.53; in 1919, $2.26; and in 1920, $2.56. This was the actual cost to the farmer without any profits, and before the Government paid the $2.26 for the wheat he had to pay the local charge at his elevator and the freight rate to the primary market.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. What price did the farmers obtain after the deflation drive was on in 1920?

Mr. GOODING. I have not those prices before me; but at the time the Government ceased buying wheat it was worth $3.07 a bushel, while in November, 1920, the price had been driven down to $1.75 a bushel. Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. The Senator, I believe, stated that the cost that year to produce wheat was $2.50 a bushel?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; $2.56.

Mr. HEFLIN. And it sold for about $1.75?

Mr. GOODING. About 25 per cent of our wheat is classed as No. 1 Northern; the remainder is No. 2 and No. 3; so it is safe to say that 75 per cent of the wheat, even when the Government paid $2.26 a bushel at the primary markets, brought the farmer at least 20 cents a bushel less than No. 1 Northern wheat.

So it is not strange that millions of our farmers are in a deplorable condition financially. The farmers of America have a right to feel outraged over being forced to sell their products at less than the cost of production and being forced to pay more for their share of the upkeep and operation of our railroads. The burdens are entirely too great. The wheat growers of this country can not go on under the high cost of production with the present price of wheat.

Some branches of agriculture have been materially benefited through a protective tariff. The emergency tariff bill was a godsend to them; it was a life-saver. The permanent tariff bill has also been a mighty factor in helping some branches of agriculture. Even the wheat grower has been materially benefited, for he has received anywhere from 20 to 30 cents a bushel more for his wheat since the emergency tariff bill was passed than the Canadian farmer has received.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GOODING. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Over how long a period of time has there been that disparity in the prices of wheat as between this country and Canada?

Mr. GOODING. When the emergency tariff bill was passed No. 1 northern wheat was selling in Canada 5 cents higher than at Minneapolis; but immediately after the passage of the emergency tariff act our farmers received anywhere from 20 to 30 cents a bushel more than the Canadian farmers. For some reason No. 1 northern wheat in Canada—I presume it was because they had newer lands over there and the wheat produced is perhaps of a little higher quality—brings normally anywhere from 5 to 6 cents a bushel more than our No. 1 northern.

Mr. WATSON. How are the prices now?

Mr. GOODING. I have not received the prices in the last few days, but they have been ranging anywhere from 20 to 30 cents a bushel more for the American wheat than the Canadian farmer has been receiving for his wheat.

Mr. President, I think we will all agree that it is impossible to bring about a reduction in freight rates on farm products at this time; and even a liberal reduction in freight rates on wheat will not save the wheat growers from a most appalling disaster. Nothing less, in my judgment, than the stabilization of the price of wheat by the Government at a fair price will give the wheat grower of this country an opportunity to meet his obligations and continue in the production of this most important agricultural crop, that is a vital necessity not only to our own people but to the whole world.

Mr. President, we have never thought in the past that the farmer of this country needed any consideration, and he has had but very little consideration. In fact, it has not been fashionable to stabilize anything that the farmer produces.

If this were the first stabilizing act ever considered by Congress I might feel that I was on dangerous ground, but I find that on April 23, 1918, Congress stabilized the price of silver at $1 an ounce. It was written in the law that the Government should only purchase silver when it was selling at $1 or below a dollar an ounce. When the Pittman Act was passed silver was selling on the markets of this country for 99¼ cents an ounce. It increased steadily in price until November 25, 1919, when it was selling in the markets of this country for $1.37½ an ounce. Silver did not drop to $1 an ounce again until May, 1920.

Under the law the Government protected the miner, and he was permitted to go out into the markets and receive the full benefit of the market price of silver. So the Government did not become a wrecker and a speculator and a profiteer and break down the price of silver, as the Grain Corporation did in the price of wheat.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. I should like to ask the Senator at this point whether or not he has information to show the cost to the Government of stabilizing the price of silver?

Mr. GOODING. No; I have not that information.

Mr. KENDRICK. The Senator has no information that it cost the Government any considerable sum?

Mr. GOODING. I do not understand that it cost the Government any considerable sum. I understand that the Treasury was instructed through the law not to buy it unless it was below a dollar an ounce. I have not looked up that part of it.

The Pittman Act provided that the Government should purchase 208,000,000 ounces of silver. Up to the present time the Government has purchased 152,000,000 ounces of silver, and there are still 56,000,000 ounces to purchase under that act, which is something more than the annual output of our silver mines.

So the Pittman Act will continue to stabilize the price of silver until some time next year. By that time the Pittman Act will have been in force for something over six years. To-day silver is selling on the markets of the country at 66 cents an ounce, but the Government is paying $1 an ounce for domestic silver. So besides stabilizing labor on the railroads and freight rates we have stabilized the price of silver in this country.

Mr. President, I know something about silver mining, and am satisfied that if the Government had not stabilized the price of silver the silver miners of this country would be in the same condition that the wheat growers are to-day, with the only difference that the silver miners can close down their mines but the wheat grower is forced to go on. He can not stop. The lower the price of wheat the more he must try to grow to meet his obligations and to keep the wolf from the door; but some day, unless this Government treats him with more of a spirit of fairness as far as freight rates are concerned, he may conclude to limit his production and let the wolf wait at the other man's door.

Then I find that we are subsidizing the great newspapers and magazines of this country. Every year the Government is forced to pay out of the Treasury $72,000,000 more than it receives for carrying second-class mail.

This Government pays $150,000 every week for carrying an issue of the Saturday Evening Post to its readers, and, in round numbers, it costs the Government $7,800,000 more annually to distribute that magazine than the owners pay to the Government for its transportation. All of the great newspapers and magazines receive the benefit of our postal laws to the extent of $72,000,000 a year, and yet I anticipate that the great newspapers will be the first to charge that this bill is socialistc and dangerous legislation in the extreme.

Every week the Saturday Evening Post receives something over $1,000,000 for advertising. Beyond a doubt it is one of the best pieces of property in America or in the whole world, and yet the Government is subsidizing this one publication to the extent of $7,800,000 a year. Of course, that is not socialistic; and I anticipate, Mr. President, that any Senators or Congressmen who undertake to change our postal laws will be threatened with political destruction by these guardians of the selfish interests of America.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GOODING. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that they not only will be, but they have been. A short time ago some of these publications issued a statement attacking the Joint Postal Commission because of its efforts to determine the cost to the Government of carrying different classes of mail. We had proceeded with that quite successfully to the extent of determining upon a plan, and it would require an appropriation for additional help for a few months to compile the facts after they had been disclosed. These articles came out with an attack upon the commission, saying that the commission had asked for $800,000, when it had not asked for a dollar, not a cent, and had done only what the Congress had directed it to do, namely, to take steps for the purpose of finding out the facts concerning the Post Office Department. So the Senator is absolutely right in his prophecy, because during the late campaign questions came to candidates—they did to me—asking if I would vote to reduce, not to increase but to reduce, the rate already in existence on second-class mail matter, and that it was important that I give my decision in that matter before election day.

Mr. GOODING. I am very thankful to the Senator for contributing that information.

Mr. President, I am not unmindful that we have just passed an appropriation of $56,000,000 for river and harbor improvement. I voted for that appropriation, because I believe in river and harbor improvement; and if we are going to continue to be a factor in the trade of the world, with the overhigh freight rates on our railroads, then our rivers must play a greater part in the commerce of this country.

Then, again, Mr. President, I find we have stabilized our banks. Congress passed the Federal reserve act, and in that act it destroyed the farmer's credit to a large extent with the banks, for his note was not subject to rediscount with the Federal reserve bank for a length of time that was of any benefit to him.

To-day our Federal reserve banks are rediscounting paper at 4½ per cent. All through the West this money is being loaned back to the farmer at from 8 to 12 per cent. If we are not subsidizing our banks in America to-day through the Federal reserve act, then I do not know what you would call a subsidy.

Then, Mr. President, I am not unmindful that what we have before us at this time is a ship subsidy bill. I anticipate that some of the Senators who will shy at the wheat stabilization bill will vote for a ship subsidy bill. They are quite willing to stabilize freight rates on the ocean and freight rates on railroads, but in a bill that stabilizes the price of wheat they see the horns of socialism.

Mr. President, it will not be any new departure on the part of this Government if this bill should pass stabilizing the price of wheat; but, after all, the light in which the country looks upon legislation of this kind seems to depend upon whose ox is being gored.

Mr. President, we hear much to-day about extending our foreign trade. I quite agree that every effort should be made to extend our trade in the world; but the trouble with continental Europe to-day is that they have been buying too much from this country as a result of the World War, and any extension of our foreign trade, as far as continental Europe is concerned, only means ruin and disaster for those countries.

Mr. President, for 122 years, beginning with 1790, down to and including 1912, the balance of trade in our favor with the world was about $7,000,000,000, and for the last 10 years the balance of trade with the world has been $21,149,097,144. The balance of trade in our favor last year was $1,091,858,054.

Twenty years ago we were happy when the balance of trade in our favor was from one hundred to two hundred million dollars. Now we are not satisfied when the balance of trade is more than a billion dollars a year in our favor.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is going to be possible for this country to maintain the present balance of trade with continental Europe or with the world. It is an unbalanced condition and only means the pauperizing of many of the countries of Europe. If Europe is going to be prosperous, as I see it, our foreign trade is going to grow very much smaller when Europe finally settles down and the war clouds pass away.

Most of this propaganda about extending our foreign trade comes from the importers who want to break down the bars of protection. We are told that we can not sell to Europe unless we permit Europe to sell us.

In the morning paper I see that the imports broke the record yesterday. We collected on imports $2,107,836 on a total valuation of imports of $8,000,000; and this is in New York City alone, I am advised.

Mr. President, speaking of Europe, I do not know of anything they can sell to us in a greater volume than they are at the present time without closing down some of our industries and throwing thousands out of employment, for all of our great industries are overdeveloped.

Take iron and steel. With our present facilities for the production of iron and steel, we can produce in six months, running full force and full time, all the iron and steel we can consume in a year.

Wonderful strides have been made in the production of iron and steel. In 1850 the average annual production of pig iron was 25 tons per man. The average production to-day in some of our mills is from twelve to fourteen hundred tons per man; so we do not need any importations of iron and steel from Europe.

We are vastly overdeveloped in the boot and shoe business. We have something over 1,400 establishments manufacturing boots and shoes. It is said that 25 per cent of our boot and shoe factories, running full time at full capacity, can produce all the boots and shoes needed in the United States in a year, and that the boot and shoe factories of the United States, taken as a whole, operating full time, can produce five pairs of shoes a year for every man, woman, and child in the world who wears our type of shoes.

The window-glass industry has entered into a contract with its employees for continuous operation for 26 weeks each year, leaving the men free to seek other employment for the balance of the year, so our glass factories are also overdeveloped.

The installed capacity of the sawmills of the United States is 117,500,000,000 feet annually, while the maximum production does not exceed 46,000,000,000—an overproduction of 160 per cent in our sawmills.

We have an overproduction also in the meat-packing industry, in the copper industry, in our flour mills, and in the production of automobiles.

The people of the United States to-day are buying about 36,000,000 automobile tires every year. The plants producing automobile tires are equipped to manufacture 60,000,000 tires a year.

We also have an overproduction in the manufacture of woolen and cotton goods.

It is stated on good authority that 25 per cent of our bituminous coal mines, operating with 60 per cent of the men now employed on full time, could meet all our requirements for coal. The same authority says that there are working in the bituminous coal mines from 240,000 to 300,000 men more than are required for an economic production.

If there is any great industry in America that is not overdeveloped, I have not been able to find it.

Mr. President, with all the great over-development of our industries, strange as it may seem, the prices of many of the products of the industries I have mentioned are increasing to-day. To say that there is any competition in many of our great industries is but irony and sarcasm.

If there is a chance for any reduction in the costs of production on the American farm I am unable to find it. Some of our farm products are much higher than pre-war prices. That is especially true of cotton and wool.

The average price of farm products is 112 per cent of the 1913 prices; the average price of all other commodities in the United States is 169 per cent of the 1913 prices. With freight rates 149 per cent of the pre-war prices, and the farmer's dollar with a purchasing power of only 65 per cent of its pre-war value, nothing but Government aid, in my judgment, can save the wheat growers of this country.

Our 10 years pre-war average export of wheat, including flour, was 109,000,000 bushels a year. Our average export of wheat, including flour, for the years 1921 and 1922 was 322,742,107 bushels.

I sometimes wonder what would have happened to the wheat growers of this country if Russia were still as great a factor in the world's production as in pre-war days, when her wheat crop averaged something over 500,000,000 bushels a year.

Russia's pre-war average of exports for 10 years was 136,000,000 bushels of wheat, 124,000,000 bushels of barley, and 65,000,000 bushels of rye, most of which was used for bread. To-day we are sending wheat and corn to Russia to save her children from starvation.

It is said that Russia is again turning her attention to production, but just how long before she will become a factor in the world's market in wheat no man can tell.

Mr. President, if this bill passes it will repay the farmers only in a small way for the losses this Government has forced upon them.

Taking the value of farm products in this country for the year of 1919 as a basis, in the last three years the farm products have suffered a shrinkage of over $16,000,000,000—more than enough to build all the railroads in America and equip them in better conditions than they are to-day.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. How would the passage of the bill which the Senator is discussing bring about any compensation to the farmers who do not grow wheat? It pertains only to wheat farmers and stabilizes the price of that one farm product; but, of course, other farmers are corn growers, and those who grow corn as well as other crops exclusively would hardly be benefited by it, and yet they, as well as the wheat growers, were the victims of deflation and curtailment of credit by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GOODING. I will say to the Senator that a protective tariff has helped the corn growers very considerably. The livestock industry of the country is in a prosperous condition and cattle prices are somewhat better. Corn has very materially increased in price. There is no question but what the protection goes far enough to help practically all the farmers in the country, and to help the wheat growers to some extent, but not enough, with the increased cost of production which the Government has forced upon him by increased freight rates, to make it anywhere near what it should be. It is safe to say that the wheat growers last year lost $750,000,000 in producing wheat.

Mr. STERLING. Of course, the wheat grower, as well as the corn grower, is protected by a tariff, but the corn grower pays as much in freight rates as the wheat grower pays.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will allow me——

Mr. GOODING. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. For the information of the Senator from South Dakota I will say that, while the wheat grower to-day is receiving pre-war prices for his product and everything that he purchases is very much more expensive, the corn grower and those who use the corn in fattening hogs and cattle are receiving very much above the pre-war price for their products, and therefore the only class that is suffering very seriously from what the Senator from South Dakota calls deflation, but what I say is a lack of demand for the product, is the raiser of small cereals—wheat, oats, barley, and rye. Those products are to-day in price even below the pre-war basis.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from North Dakota raises a question of fact about which I am not quite certain. It was my impression that the pre-war price of corn was higher than it has been in the last two or three years, and higher than it is now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to my good friend from North Dakota that, so far as cattle are concerned, they should be grouped with wheat, because, while it is true that other grains, or some of them, are better in price than wheat, cattle have been lower at various times than before the war and are to-day.

Mr. GOODING. I want to remind the Senator that the Government did not bind down with iron bands the price of cattle during the war, but it did bind down the wheat growers until they lost billions of dollars. It became a profiteer on the wheat growers' labor while every country on earth protected the wheat growers and they enjoyed the full market price and even paid them a bonus. That is the difference between the wheat grower and the cattle grower. God knows I would like to see the cattle grower receive a better price. He has had a hard struggle for a number of years to produce cattle at a price that has been paid in the markets of this country.

Mr. WARREN. What the Senator said of wheat is true and largely brought about, I fear, by those who undertook to befriend wheat. It is true that the Government took no part in the marketing of cattle, and the cattlemen did not ask to have it done. That was the difference between wheat and cattle. Wheat suffered the most, and, as I said, I do not know how much of it, but certainly some part of it, may be chargeable to the mistaken idea of soliciting the Government in fixing the price.

Mr. GOODING. I think it was a wise act on the part of the Government to call a committee here for the purpose of fixing the price of wheat. I think that was all right, but the trouble was that the Grain Corporation was composed of men who had been speculating in wheat for a lifetime, men who had grown rich in handling wheat. Nobody was on the board who had any sympathy with the wheat grower. It is now claimed that they took advantage of the situation and fixed the price of wheat as a maximum price and not a minimum price, as the farmers had the right to believe was the intention of the price-fixing committee that was called to Washington for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not only had the farmer the right to assume that it would be but the law declares that it should be the minimum price, leaving to the demand whatever the maximum price might be, but in the operation of the law those in control made the minimum price the maximum price and prohibited the farmer from the benefit of a rising market.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. LADD. It has been stated that the interests representing the farmers demanded price fixation during the war. I think that is not correct. I know of no farmers who asked for price fixing of wheat during the war, but I did receive many, many protests, and when I reached North Dakota after the price fixing was established I found an assembly of 3,000 people who were gathered together as the representatives of the farmers of the State for the purpose of protesting against the fixing of the price of wheat. But instead of protesting they accepted it and passed resolutions, and said if the price of wheat was to be fixed they therefore asked that the price of the products which the farmer purchased should be treated in the same manner.

Mr. GOODING. I would like to have the RECORD show that the Senator from North Dakota was a member of the price-fixing committee.

Mr. LADD. Yes; that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am quite certain that my colleague will remember that all Congress attempted to do was to assure that there would be a good price during the war, and in order to assure that they determined upon a minimum price, so that the farmer would plant his crop, as the war might end at any time. Then, instead of making a minimum price, in the operation it was made the maximum price, and the miller who paid more than that price had his license to do business taken away from him, and then the elevator man or speculator who paid a higher price than that would be deprived of his license to do business. So the operation of the law was entirely different from what was intended and what the law declared it should be.

Mr. GOODING. I am grateful to the Senator for contributing that information.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. In connection with the question raised by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] as to the necessity of acting in regard to other farm products, I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not believe that the effect of establishing a price on wheat that would return to the grower of wheat the cost of production at least would be to bring a more satisfactory and stable price to other farm products?

Mr. GOODING. There is no doubt about that at all. I think if any Senator would take the cost of production and study the question at all he would realize that the wheat grower is losing money every year. He lost fully three-quarters of a billion dollars last year and over two billion in the last four years in the production of wheat because of the high cost of production and freight rates. He can not go on with it. The end is coming. He must stop, and there is no question about that. He can not go on year after year producing at a price that is less than the cost of production. Unless something is done he will have to grow something else. He can not leave the farm.

Not long ago, when we had a case before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for a reduction of the rates on farm products, one of the commissioners asked why the farmer continued to produce wheat below the cost of production. The farmer can not help himself. There is no other place for him to go. There is no other crop he can grow in some parts of the country. All of his machinery is for wheat growing, and he must of necessity continue in that line of agriculture, and it is well that he should go on. Some day we will not produce enough for our own needs if we continue the policy we have been pursuing. By stabilizing the price of wheat we help every farmer in America. It is one thing, to my mind, that is needed to bring back prosperity to the country. With the farmer's dollar worth only 65 per cent of the pre-war price, when he gets through buying the necessities of life his money is all gone, and he has not been able to buy farming machinery for the last four years. That is the condition that we find among the farmers who have been growing wheat for less than cost for a number of years.

Mr. KENDRICK. May I ask the Senator another question? We have heard a good deal recently about a return to better business conditions and increased prosperity. I want to ask the Senator if he believes that anything like general prosperity can come to the country while the agricultural interests are in such a deplorable condition?

Mr. GOODING. In reply to the Senator I will say that I am not sure. Only one reason for the prosperity in America to-day is on account of our tremendous exports, that have given us a balance of trade in the last 10 years of $21,149,097,144 of exports over imports, as compared with $7,000,000,000 in 122 years. That can not go on. It is impossible to go on. Unless the farmers of the country are given the opportunity to make ends meet and be able to purchase again, there is, in my opinion, no hope for prosperity in America to continue very long.

Mr. President, Senators need not be alarmed about any great overproduction of wheat in this country, for we have passed the peak of production. The farmers have been driven so hard to make a living that they have not been able to give their lands any rest and but very little fertilizer. Everywhere in the wheat-growing section of America the soil is becoming exhausted, and the yield is growing smaller per acre each year in most of the wheat-producing States. Even the war, that brought about an increase of 26,000,000 acres of farm products, failed to bring about any great increase over the average prewar production.

For the information of Senators, I want to read the wheat production in the United States for the past 10 years:

	Bushels.
1913	763, 380, 000
1914	891, 017, 000
1915	1, 025, 801, 000
1916	636, 318, 000
1917	636, 655, 000
1918	921, 438, 000
1919	934, 265, 000
1920	787, 128, 000
1921	814, 905, 000
1922	856, 211, 000

It will be noted that the peak of all, and I doubt if it will ever be reached in America again until we change our method of farming and the farmers are able to buy more fertilizer and have more intensive farming, was in 1915, when the production was 1,025,801,000 bushels.

Unless something is done to assist the wheat growers in the country there is great danger of our soil becoming exhausted and our yield of wheat being reduced until the country will not produce enough for its own needs.

In discussing the bill with a Senator not long ago, he said that the last thing that Rome did before it went down to destruction was to fix farm prices. I reminded him that it was not the fixing of farm prices that destroyed Rome, but the exhaustion of her soil, for in the last years of the Roman Empire the average production of wheat was only 4 bushels to the acre, and all other farm products in proportion.

Mr. President, this country is going to be just as rich as our soil, for, after all, it is from the soil that comes practically all of our new wealth.

There is an old saying, and I think a very true one, that sometimes great public calamities bring a country to a realization of truths that it will learn in no other way. So if out of the great crisis that has overwhelmed agriculture in the last three years the American people learn that agriculture is the basic industry of our Nation, or, as Henry Clay called it, the soul of the Nation, and that upon agriculture rests the prosperity and the future greatness of this Nation; if out of it all, in the future, this Government will give to agriculture the same careful consideration that has been given to other great industries in the past, then the hardships and privations that agriculture has suffered in the last three years will not have been in vain.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram transmitting a resolution adopted by a delegation of over 300 business men and wheat growers of eight counties of Idaho and Washington indorsing the bill (S. 4478) to promote agriculture by stabilizing the price of wheat.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEWISTON, IDAHO, February 20, 1922.

Hon. FRANK GOODING,
Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was adopted by the delegation of over 800 business men and wheat growers of eight counties of Idaho and Washington, consisting of Asotin, Garfield, and Whitman, in Washington, and Nez Perce, Lewis, Idaho, Clearwater, and Latah Counties in Idaho, called together by the Lewiston Commercial Club at Lewiston, Idaho, this 20th day of February:

"Resolved, That we indorse Senate bill 4478, introduced by Senator GOODING in the Senate of the United States and unanimously passed on by the Agricultural Committee, and that we ask our representatives in Congress to use every means at their command to bring about the passage of this bill at the present session. We further express a view that this bill will do more to bring about the general prosperity of the country than any other piece of legislation offered in the past, and as the emergency exists we offer every assistance at our command to help in bringing about the speedy passage of this measure."

REMOVALS FROM BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there are several matters I desire to discuss this morning. One of them is the investigation of the discharge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing employees. Another is the so-called filibuster. A third is the ship subsidy bill itself. A fourth is the filled milk bill. I do not know whether I shall have time to discuss all of these to-day, but I am going to take them up in their order and discuss them as rapidly as I can.

BUREAU OF PRINTING AND ENGRAVING EMPLOYEES.

Sometime ago, to be accurate, on February 5, 1923, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] introduced the following resolution (S. Res. 432) on the subject of the discharged employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing:

"Whereas pursuant to an Executive order of the President of the United States, issued March 31, 1922, and immediately effective, the director and 27 other officials of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing were summarily removed from their positions and stricken from the rolls of the civil service; and

"Whereas it would appear from subsequent investigation that this removal was without just cause; and

"Whereas said removal reflects upon the honor and integrity of the officials so discharged; and

"Whereas those who were given the places from which said employees were removed have been publicly charged as being instrumental in having issued said Executive order; and

"Whereas it would be for the best interest of the service that the whole matter should be made public; and

"Whereas it would be helpful to know the character, reputation, and fitness of those removed and those appointed to succeed them: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into the cause or causes of the removal of said employees; the right of the President to have made the order; the character, reputation, and fitness of the men and women so removed; the power of the President to name their successors; the character, reputation, and fitness of the men and women so designated as their successors, and all other facts and circumstances with reference to the matter, and to report to the Senate its findings and such recommendations as it may see fit before the 1st day of March, 1923.

"The committee is hereby empowered to send for books and papers, to require the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, and do all things necessary to carry out the purpose of this resolution.

"That the discharged employees, if they shall desire, may be represented by counsel of their own choosing and by them to be paid. The same privilege, under the same condition, is extended to the director of the bureau and those with him appointed to the places vacated by the said Executive order.

"All expenses not otherwise herein provided for shall be paid out of the contingent expenses of the Senate, such expenses to include a stenographer to be paid not exceeding $1.25 per printed page of said testimony."

Mr. President, whenever an investigation is proposed by a resolution such resolution is referred to the committee of the Senate which is known as the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The purpose of such a resolution being referred to that committee is to ascertain whether or not there is in the contingent fund of the Senate sufficient money to pay for the investigation. In this instance, the resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas was very properly referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for that purpose. The Civil Service Committee would have jurisdiction over the investigation if it should be ordered, and if an appropriation were not required from the contingent fund of the Senate there would be no point whatsoever in sending the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, the only function of that committee being, as I have stated, to determine whether or not the Senate has sufficient money at its command to pay for the investigation.

Mr. President, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is presently constituted of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], as its chairman, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and myself. This resolution was sent to that committee and was kept there for quite a while with no action. Some two weeks ago I went before the committee, of which, I repeat, I am a member, and asked that the resolution be reported out favorably. The chairman of the committee stated that he did not think the resolution should be reported; that he did not think there should be an investigation; that the resolution provided, in effect, for an investigation of the President of the United States, and, therefore, our committee should not furnish the money with which to conduct it.

Later on the chairman of the committee called a meeting of the committee and suggested that the special representative of the Department of Justice, who had conducted the investigation, both before and after the discharges, a man by the name of Charles B. Brewer, should be summoned before the committee. Well, I said, that was all right, but I thought it was nothing but fair and just that some representative of the discharged employees—just one such representative, if there was going to be only one called for the department—should also be summoned, in order that both sides might be heard, if our committee was going to take the unusual course of investigating into the merits of the case.

That request of mine was denied and Mr. Brewer only was called before the committee.

About that time it was reported in the public prints that Mr. Brewer represented the administration, and would give the committee all the facts upon which the discharges had been made. Since that time a statement has appeared in the Washington Evening Star of day before yesterday which I shall now read. The headlines of the article are as follows:

"Ousted bureau officials will be denied old jobs—President Harding feels no regret over changes and feels matter now closed incident."

The article is as follows:

"President Harding feels no regret over the changes made at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, has 'laid all his cards' before the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses, and probably will make no further statement in the matter.

"In making this known at the White House to-day, it was said that the President feels that restoration of the civil-service status of the dismissed employees was sufficient to satisfy their claims, in the absence of any specific charges against them.

"The President was also represented as feeling that it was 'neither possible nor desirable' to restore any of the dismissed chiefs to their positions in the bureau.

"Whether the Senate committee before which the President laid his facts, according to the statement to-day at the White House, will ever make public further details was problematical. It was thought, however, in view of developments to-day, that no more official statement may be expected on the dismissals of March 31, last year.

"Chairman CALDER, of the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses, following a conference with President Harding at the White House to-day, indicated that the committee might make no report of any kind on the Caraway resolution to investigate the Bureau of Engraving and Printing dismissals.

"Hearings have been concluded, Senator CALDER said, the committee calling in only one witness, Charles B. Brewer, special investigator of the Department of Justice. No witnesses were called to represent the dismissed employees, the Senator said. His committee was sitting in the nature of a 'grand jury,' it was explained, and although having concluded its hearings, had not definitely decided what to do about it.

NO REPORT LIKELY.

"The probability is, however, the Senator intimated, that there will be no report at all. 'It would be a serious thing,' he said, 'to investigate the President.'

"Wide difference of opinion exists in the Senate committee, Senator CALDER admitted, over the value of Brewer's testimony. Senator MCKELLAR, Democrat, Tennessee, member of the committee, has stated that Brewer failed utterly to substantiate the charges upon which it is alleged President Harding based his action.

"Senator MCKELLAR was understood to-day to be still intent on doing further justice to the dismissed employees, and meant to try to get through the committee a proposed bill to pay the dismissed persons all back pay for the time since March 31, when they were let out, and, further, to replace them in positions similar to those from which they were dismissed.

"Whether Senator CALDER conferred with the President over this phase of the situation it was not learned to-day.

"Brewer's testimony impressed members of the committee in various ways, Senator CALDER indicated. The chairman himself had entered the 'grand jury' hearings on the Caraway resolution with an open mind, he said, and had learned from Brewer many valuable things, but added that his mind was still open on the question.

"From confidential sources close to the committee it was learned further to-day that Brewer was not only asked to present his case, but that he was severely cross-examined by members of the committee as to the reasons why he had gathered the charges which were presented to President Harding, and upon which the President acted, without the knowledge and advice of Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

"Brewer was an early caller at the White House to-day. He refused to discuss his mission there or to make any statement on the Bureau of Engraving matter. Upon leaving the White House he was photographed for the first time since his implication in the bureau matter."

Mr. President, as to what occurred before the committee there seems to be some difference of opinion. I believe it was stated that the deliberations of the committee were to be considered as "executive." As to just what that means I have some doubt; but, inasmuch as other members of the committee have seen fit to discuss the matter and to say that the President had "laid his cards upon the table" before the committee, making the implication very strong that this special investigator, the representative of the Department of Justice, had facts that implicated in some way directly or remotely these employees, I believe that it is my duty to submit, not a statement as to the deliberations of the committee but to submit the outstanding facts in reference thereto.

I am delighted that the chairman of the committee, my good friend the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], is present, and I want to say to him now that if I misstate any facts, if I go beyond the bounds in the slightest degree, I want him to correct me.

Mr. President, Mr. Brewer came before the committee and was examined for several hours on two or three different occasions. The members of the committee present were Senators CALDER, KEYES, and myself. There was no charge and not one scintilla of evidence offered by Mr. Brewer against a single one of these discharged employees. Upon cross-examination by me he admitted not only that he had no charge now to make against the dismissed employees or any of them, but that he never had any charge against any one of them, and that if they had been removed, as he knew they had been removed, they had not been removed upon his recommendation. He made the further statement that he did not have a scintilla of evidence to connect any one of the 27 discharged employees with any wrongful transaction.

It is fair to say that Mr. Brewer did present a number of bonds which he said were duplicated and which had been issued, and I believe that the Government had paid both the good bond and the bad bond, if one was bad. However, for my part, I do not believe that Mr. Brewer knows whether the so-called duplicated bonds were wrongfully issued or whether the Government was wronged because of their issuance.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through my statement, because I do not want to go beyond it. If the Senator will wait for just a few moments, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. Brewer did present one bond especially that seemed to me to be an absolute duplicate of another bond both as to the number of the bond and numbers of the coupons attached. The two bonds bore precisely the same numbers on their face and the coupons also bore exactly the same numbers. What explanation there may be in reference to that, I do not know. Mr. Brewer did not know. He thought the very fact that there were two bonds bearing the same number and that the same numbers appeared on the attached coupons made one fraudulent and the other good, and he may be right about it. I can not say whether he is right or wrong. I have been informed that because these bonds have the same numbers that fact does not necessarily mean that either of the bonds is fraudulent. As to the particular bond which we examined, he said it had come through a perfectly responsible source; that it had been sold by a splendid brokerage firm that stands second to none in this country, a brokerage firm whose word is perfectly good, whose members are Republicans and close to the administration. If they sold a stolen bond they are liable to the Government under the law; and yet no steps have been taken either to collect on the bond if it was fraudulently issued or to ascertain whether the bond was a duplicate other than in number. So that if the particular bond is fraudulent, it could be ascertained by this special examiner of the Department of Justice almost instantly. I suggested that this be ascertained, but not a word or an intimation that any one of these 27 employees had anything whatever to do with that matter.

Then the question very naturally arises, Mr. President, What connection has any one of these 27 employees that were discharged with the duplication of any of such bonds? None that Mr. Brewer knew—not the slightest connection. He made no charges when he was asked the question directly by me. When asked what connection there was between these duplicated bonds, as he called them, and the discharged employees, or any of them, he reiterated the statement that he had no proof against the discharged employees and had no charges to make against them, and had preferred none.

Mr. President, what is the meaning of these dismissals. The meaning, in my judgment, is that some one or more persons with some ax to grind have imposed upon the President of the United States and had him discharge these employees, when, according to the very investigator who investigated it from the beginning and had investigated it before they were discharged, there was not a particle of ground for their discharge.

I served with the President of the United States when he was a Member of this body. I have the highest opinion of his honor and integrity. I believe he is an absolutely honest man. I do not believe that he would knowingly agree that any wrong should be perpetrated upon any official of the Government, however lowly that official might be. I can not find it in my heart to think that merely for the purpose of putting friends in office Warren G. Harding would stoop to take away the character, the good name of his fellow citizens, which good name the Good Book tells us is more to be desired than great riches. I do not believe that the President would do it unless he had been grossly, outrageously imposed upon by men who were seeking to serve their own selfish interests, and I think that is what there is in this contest, Mr. President—that certain gentlemen, desiring the places that these employees had, deliberately put up a job on the President of the United States, and I believe the President was misled into making these discharges.

Mr. President, that is absolutely and conclusively proved by the one single fact that President Harding, in a recent order, restored to the civil service 26 of the 27 discharged employees; and I believe that if he had known that the other one, Mr. Wilmeth, was under civil service, he would have been included in the lot. It shows that the President, when he issued the order restoring these men, did not believe that there was any evidence against them. No man can tell me, from what I know and saw of Mr. Harding when he was a Member of this body, that he would restore to the civil service men and women who were implicated directly or indirectly, nearly or remotely, in the stealing of bonds from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I think the President has been imposed upon, and I not only think he has been imposed upon in the past, but I think he is being imposed upon right now by men who are trying to keep positions that they know they ought not to have. I want to give my reasons for this statement.

The public prints of Washington in the latter part of December, I think, stated that there was a conference on a Sunday between this same Mr. Brewer, the investigator, and the President of the United States, and, if my recollection serves me aright, it was stated that the President called Mr. Brewer before him to inquire about these employees; and I believe that Mr. Brewer stated to the President then "I have no proof now, but if you will give me more time I shall yet be able to connect some one or more of these employees with the bond trouble," or the alleged bond trouble; and the President, in the goodness of his heart, gave him the additional time. He was unable to make good, and therefore recently the President issued that order.

To the extent that it did justice, that order was most commendable to the President of the United States. To the extent that it was done, it should have been done; but, Mr. President, the President of the United States should not have stopped where he did. Those 27 employees of the Government in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are either guilty or they are not guilty. If they are guilty, they never ought to have been restored, any one of them. If they are not guilty, they ought all to have been restored, and restored to the fullest extent. They should first have had their characters, their good names, restored to them. Then they should have had the offices restored to them. And then they should have had all back pay.

[At this point interruptions by Mr. WILLIS and Mr. REED of Missouri took place, which appear later in Mr. MCKELLAR'S speech.]

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am much obliged to the Senator from Missouri for his contribution.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] was asking my advice about certain bills in which he was interested, other than the ship subsidy bill. I do not know that my advice is worth very much to the Senator, but if I had a number of bills in which I was interested, I believe I would get the ship subsidy bill withdrawn pretty soon if I wanted to get any of those other bills passed at this session.

Now, I was interrupted in the midst of my discussion of an entirely different subject, and I have got to unbuckle my mind long enough to return to it and finish what I desired to say about it. Then I shall come to both the filibuster and the ship subsidy.

When I was interrupted I was speaking of President Harding's dismissal of these 27 employees and his partial restitution. That restitution should be made complete. It should not be partial. Not only is it due to the 27 discharged employees that an investigation be had, but it is due to the good name of the President of the United States that such an investigation be had. The President of the United States is in the peculiar attitude of having been misled by certain friends into issuing an order that never should have been issued. I believe he has been imposed upon, but he must know the facts now, and the responsibility is his. He is in the further attitude of having implied that he discharged 26 of the 27 men in a way that was wholly unwarranted and unjustified, because he never would restore them by Executive order to their civil service status if he believed his action in dismissing them had been justified.

So that I want to say to my distinguished and my very much beloved friend, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], that whatever action is taken at this session by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, the investigation can, at best, only be postponed. This great Government of ours is unwilling to do a wrong to its employees.

We are not going to permit it. This Government will not permit it to be done. These men and women have done no wrong. They are honorable men and women. They were discharged without cause, with not a scintilla of proof against them. Discharged between suns, humiliated, disgraced, dishonored without cause. Of course it is just a matter of time when every restitution will be made that can be made by an honorable Government. It ought to be made now. It ought to be cleared up now. If the President, as I believe, was imposed upon by designing or corrupt men to issue the order, it ought to be cleared up at the earliest possible moment. And it is going to be cleared up, as we all know.

One of these 27 men, Doctor Beach, was from my State. A man of higher character and a more honest man or better man perhaps never lived than Doctor Beach—honest as the day is long. His discharge after nearly 30 years of service in the Government broke his heart. He died, and he is in a premature grave to-day because of the injustice that was done to him.

I want to speak of another man who was discharged, Mr. Wilmeth, who was born in my State, but is now a resident of the State of Arkansas, a State represented in part by the Senator who introduced a resolution calling for an investigation, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. Wilmeth started in the employ of the Government at $60 a month as a boy, and by his honesty, efficiency, integrity, and upstanding character, he went up through all the gradations of the civil service, step by step, throughout the years until he became the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, at a salary of $6,000 per year. He was one of the best and most efficient chiefs of the bureau that ever occupied the place. There was not a scintilla of proof against him, not a discreditable thing about him, and yet he was discharged and turned out and dishonored, and charged with thievery of bonds without a scintilla of evidence to connect him directly or indirectly with it. Will the Congress of the United States stand for that kind of action toward its employees? Will the great Government of the United States stand for that kind of action against its employees? We all know that it will not. Why not do justice and do it now, before some other of these poor employees, like my friend Doctor Beach, may pass into the Great Beyond? Of course, Mr. Wilmeth and all the rest of them should be restored. I want to take another man on the list. By the way, a most remarkable thing happened in reference to the action of the Executive as to this gentleman, Mr. E. H. Ashworth, from Nashville, Tenn., a clean man, a pure man, an efficient man, an upright man. He is a brother-in-law of one of the most distinguished men that Tennessee ever produced, one of the ablest, the late Col. B. A. Enloe. Colonel Ashworth had been in the civil service in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for 29 years, as I remember. On March 31, last, an examination of his office was completed by a committee of the Treasury Department appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, consisting of T. H. Braden, S. L'Hommedieu, and John F. Green. His office was found to be absolutely straight, without any fault at all, but worthy of the highest commendation.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon a copy of the letter prepared by the committee investigating his office, involving all the rolls, dies, and plates, was handed to him, and that splendid gentleman felt that he had been greatly honored by the letter. He felt that life meant a great deal to him on that day when he left his office at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. His step was proud, his head was high, because of his consciousness of duty well done and appreciated by his superiors. But he had hardly reached home and his family when the Executive order was issued and served on him separating him in the nighttime from his office. Mr. President, in justice to this faithful employee, this splendid and honest employee, I want to read a copy of the letter which the investigating committee gave him that afternoon just three hours before he was dismissed by the President for alleged implication in the stealing of bonds.

Listen to this, Mr. President:

"MARCH 31, 1922.

"The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

"SIR: Pursuant to, and in compliance with the instructions of department letter dated the 6th day of January, 1922, your committee consisting of Messrs. T. H. Braden, Samuel L'Hommedieu and John F. Green, appointed by said letter to examine the stock contained in the vault of the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing"—

That was Mr. Ashworths office—

"have the honor to report that the said stock has been examined and checked and your committee submits its report in triplicate herewith.

"Each and every piece of stock, both engraved and otherwise, has been examined and checked by your committee and found to correspond to the records of the custodian of dies, rolls, and plates.

"All the stock which had been canceled in the year of 1921 was destroyed by your committee by causing the same to be melted in the furnaces at the navy yard, with the exception of 25 photonegatives, which, because of their nature, were destroyed at the bureau. The destroyed material consisted of 16,214 pieces and weighed 147,330 pounds. The total stock examined and accounted for was 98,224 pieces.

"Your committee regrets that it found several discrepancies in the records of the comptroller's office"—

In the records of the comptroller's office—

"which were corrected in accordance with the actual plates found in the vault, and made to conform to the records of the custodian.

"Your committee is grateful to both the officials and employees of the bureau alike for the many courtesies shown it and for the splendid cooperation and aid rendered it while engaged in its duties.

"Respectfully,

"T. H. BRADEN.
"S. L'HOMMEDIEU.
"JOHN F. GREEN."

Mr. President, after having received that kind of a letter, certifying that everything within Colonel Ashworth's office had been examined and accounted for, and everything found in exact accord with the records, such little discrepancies as were discovered being entirely in the comptroller's office, in another building, with which Mr. Ashworth had nothing to do, and which were corrected by reference to Mr. Ashworth's books, think of his pride in going home to his family and showing, as he proudly did, that letter approving and commending the management of his office; and then think of what must have been his feelings when, like a bolt out of a clear sky, here came an Executive order, in the nighttime, which order has since been shown to be without the slightest foundation, without a scintilla of evidence to support it, without a charge against the man. Think of what must have been his feelings when he read that order and had to let his family know about it. No wonder when he was talking to me about it a few days ago that the tears welled in his eyes at the great injustice that the greatest Government on earth had done to him, an humble but honest and respected employee of the Government.

Oh, Mr. President, this Congress ought to act in behalf of these men; this committee ought to act on this resolution. It ought to restore not only Colonel Ashworth to his position, but to restore every one of the other 26 employees to their positions. We ought also to pass a bill appropriating the money to pay them their salaries from the time they were discharged to the present. We ought in justice to restore them to their original places in the Government service. If we do less, we shall not only dishonor them with false charges, but we shall dishonor ourselves. If the President, with the proof in the hands of this examiner, does not take that position, he will do much less than I believe he ought to do and much less than I believe he will do. He owes it to himself, he owes it to these employees, he owes it to this Congress, he owes it to the American people to do justice to these men and women who have been wronged. The committee, by a vote of two Republicans to one Democrat, refused to report Senator CARAWAY'S resolution out. I voted to report it out. Senators CALDER and KEYES voted "no."

Mr. President, I should add three fine splendid women, as I have been informed—I do not have the pleasure of knowing any of them, but some of them had been long in the service of the bureau—were dismissed, and several months afterwards were restored, not to their old places but merely to such positions as they could get. They had to work for their living, and they had to take what they could get. They were discharged under circumstances which accused them of theft of bonds, and surely their salaries ought to be restored, and there ought to be made up to them every dollar that they have lost.

I do not know what the women of this country are going to do about it. I was one of those who have believed in the right of women to vote. I voted for woman suffrage in the other House when I was a Member of that body, and I voted for it time and again here. Unless I am very greatly mistaken in the ability and courage of the women, they will demand as a body the restoration of these women who have been injured by this Executive order to their former places, and payment to them all losses in salary. This is as little as can be done. I believe that as to all these employees the Congress should by appropriate legislation express its regret over the injustice done them and take such action as may be necessary to make them whole.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. There has been an interruption, and if the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is willing I shall be delighted to yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator has the floor. I desire to ask the Senator a question about another branch of the subject. I am asking permission to interrupt him only because I am compelled to leave the Chamber.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no disposition to take the Senator off the floor, I should say.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Washington has very kindly, in that usually pleasant manner of his, indicated that he does not wish to take me off the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that the Senator announced that he expected in the course of his remarks to discuss the filibuster that is now going on, and has been going on for some time. Did I correctly understand the Senator in that respect?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the Senator did not correctly understand me in that respect. If there is a filibuster going on, it seems to be going on upon both sides. It looks as if everybody is taking part in it. It is getting so very popular that Senators on both sides are participating in it. For instance, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], all took part in it yesterday. This morning the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and several other Senators on the other side of the Chamber seem to be taking part in it. I will say to the Senator that I have been trying for several days to get an opportunity to discuss the discharge of Bureau of Printing and Engraving employees first, and then to discuss the ship subsidy bill in connection with the so-called filibuster, and I have not been able to get the opportunity. I have been crowded out for two or three days, but I have the floor now, and I hope to discuss it, and I am sorry the Senator is going to leave the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIS. I am not leaving because the Senator is going to make a speech. I am compelled to go, otherwise I should remain.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to have that assurance; but, anyhow, I am sorry the Senator is going to leave the Chamber, because it has been charged that no one has offered a substitute measure of relief for our shipping that is as good as, or better than, the so-called cash subsidy shipping bill. I am going to discuss the substitute that I offered some time ago, and I believe I can prove to the Senator from Ohio that my substitute is infinitely better than the cash subsidy plan that has been proposed by the committee. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me further about it?

Mr. WILLIS. If I may, I should like to.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the understanding that I am not to be taken off my feet, I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I wanted to be sure I understood the Senator. I am not seeking now to fix the responsibility for the filibuster. The Senator admits that there is a filibuster going on; or, at any rate, I will put it in this way: It is stated in the press of the country everywhere, and the people believe, that there is a filibuster. Does the Senator deny that there is a filibuster against the shipping bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I will put it in this way: Of course what is the definition of a filibuster is rather problematical. A filibuster is a filibuster to those Senators who want to put over certain legislation that they are in favor of, but a filibuster is not a filibuster to those Senators who are opposed to legislation that they do not want passed. [Laughter.] Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. WILLIS. No; that does not answer me. I accept the Senator's definition, though, for the purpose of this inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I can cut short what the Senator wants to know, and I will tell him right now——

Mr. WILLIS. What I want to ask the Senator is this——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment; I think I can tell the Senator without his asking the question. The ship subsidy bill is not going to pass at this session of Congress.

Mr. WILLIS. That is precisely what I wanted to know.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right. I knew it, and I wanted to give that information to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. It has been rumored, and the press has stated, that there is an understanding among a number of Senators, not only that they will vote against the ship subsidy bill but that they will exhaust every parliamentary resource to prevent the ship subsidy bill from coming to a vote. Does the Senator know whether that is a fact?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not speak for the rest of them, but I want to speak for myself. In my campaign last year in Tennessee I told the people of Tennessee that my opponent was in favor of this ship subsidy bill and that I was against it, and that I was not only going to speak against it, I was not only going to work against it, but I was going to use every means in the power of a Senator to defeat this bill. I am going to carry out that pledge, and I believe the bill is going to be defeated.

Mr. WILLIS. Then the Senator himself admits that whether there may be any others or not, he is one of those who will exhaust every parliamentary resource—and he is a master of those things—to prevent this bill coming to a vote?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have already stated my position to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. One other question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say this to the Senator: There are at least six members of the Senator's own party who have told me that the bill would not pass if the Democrats did not have anything at all to do with it.

Mr. WILLIS. Can the Senator name the six Senators?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not care to name them.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it is necessary to name them. The Senator knows them as well as I do. All you have to do is to make a poll over on your side and you will find them.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROOKHART in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to be taken off my feet. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Missouri if it does not take me off my feet.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will not invoke the rule unless I feel at the time that the interruption is being made just to consume time.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is very, very courteous of the Senator from Washington, and I hope he will indicate just before he begins to invoke it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I certainly will.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be complied with, of course. I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator permit just one more interruption?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Missouri excuse me a moment while I yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I am accepting the Senator's statement that there are six Republicans who are prepared to exhaust every parliamentary resource to prevent this bill coming to a vote.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator know whether there are any Senators on the other side besides himself who are expecting to take that position?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I just want to say this: There are six Members on the other side and nearly all of the Members on this side who think that this bill is so vicious, so inconsistent with the American doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," that they are determined individually and collectively to use every honest and fair means to defeat this bill; and, in my judgment, I will say to the Senator, the bill will be defeated.

Mr. STANLEY and Mr. REED of Missouri addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio, and then I will yield to both of the other Senators.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator's opinion proves to be well grounded, it seems to me that the statement he has made is a very important one, first, because of the effect that it ought to have, and in my judgment will have, on the course of business in the Senate.

The Senator knows that I am for this bill, but I am for some other bills, too; and if there is such an organization as to prevent this bill coming to a vote I think that fact ought to have some influence upon the conduct of the business of the Senate; and, secondly, it ought to have some bearing upon the question as to whether or not in the next Congress we shall change the rules of the Senate so as to enable the Senate to become a legislative instead of a debating society. I am in favor of such a change of rules.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator has finished, I beg to say that I do not know anything further than that in the opinion of a very large number of Senators—I do not know how many—this question was settled at the polls last November, and we do not propose to permit a violation of the result of the election last November. The subsidy bill might as well be withdrawn.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri. I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky in a moment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of obtaining some light myself. I was wondering whether the Senator from Ohio really asked these questions for information or whether he has sat here all this time in ignorance of what is going on. [Laughter.] I was about to make the remark which the Senator has just made: If there is a filibuster in progress, it was begun at the polls last November by the American people, when they shortened the majorities in these two bodies. We all know that the reason this bill is now being forced with such tenacity is because the administration well knows that it can not put over this bill in the next Congress; that the representatives of the people elected since the issue was presented to the American people can not be mustered into a majority for it.

Will the Senator yield——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just one moment. I just want to add to what the Senator from Missouri has said that I do not think there is any more chance of the bill being put into law at this session of Congress than that it will be put into law at the next session.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Will the Senator permit me? I am asking permission to make these interruptions because it will be the only opportunity I shall have to say just a word about this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield so long as my good friend from Washington does not interfere.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If we trace the history of the ship subsidy bill in this Congress, we find that it was brought forward as one of the first measures to be passed by this Congress. We know that it was put aside, and that it was finally postponed until after election because there were many Members of Congress who said they did not dare vote for it and go to their people on their votes. Hence it was delayed until after the election in order to permit some of those gentlemen to slip back here without having committed themselves in advance of the vote by the people.

We are told that if we pass the bill, if we turn these ships over to private interests, and if we pay a certain subsidy, then our flag will fly above the waters of every sea and the ships will do a thriving and prosperous business. If that is true, then the trouble is not with the sea and not with the ships and not with commerce but with the management of the fleet. If subsidized parties can run the ships at a profit to themselves, then the Government of the United States, with an equally efficient management, could run the ships without a loss of any more money than the subsidy would amount to. When the plea is made that by turning the ships over to private parties and giving them a subsidy, they can run them and make money, the present governmental management is indicted for inefficiency.

The right remedy would be to appoint men to the board who know something about ships and maritime commerce, instead of having at the head of our great merchant marine a former advertising man, and for members, gentlemen who would not know starboard from larboard unless it was pointed out to them by a deck hand.

Everybody knows there is an advantage in monopoly. Everybody knows that while there are disadvantages which have relation to the rights of people, yet a common management of a great enterprise has certain economic advantages. Here, then, is this fleet of vessels. Here are the markets of the world. Here is the open sea. When we are told that a number of private parties can operate these boats and make money with them if we give them this subsidy, then the question arises why can not the Government of the United States do the same with no greater loss than the amount of the subsidy? When it is said that they can not run at all even with that much loss, but that the ships must be junked, then it is admitted that our business is in the hands of incompetents. The case is then admittedly out of court. The admission is then made that we have a lot of incompetents for the business. Some one has gone out and picked up an advertising man and started him to running our ships. That is as idiotic as it would be to take an old salt who had sailed before the mast all his life and make him advertising manager for an advertising business. What should have been done was to find the finest talent and experience there is on the American Continent, talent and experience that has grown up out of the actual management of ships upon the sea, business ability that has to do with trade and commerce on the ocean, and then give them a free hand to manage the matter as they would a business enterprise.

But has that been done? Why, away back yonder when we enacted this law under President Wilson's administration—and I do not say it to criticize him—how many weeks or how many months elapsed between the enactment of the law and the appointment of the first board? Then we had the ships for a long time under a distinguished admiral of the Navy. That man had been trained to run fighting ships and to fight, not to trade. One has to know something about trade if he is to enter the markets in competition with the world. We put him in, a good man if he had been commanding a war fleet, but we were not engaged in war. We were engaged in trade. Then we went out and found some other absolutely inexperienced men and put them in charge of those great ships. If the worst enemy of American shipping under Government management who ever lived had been placed in charge, he could not have taken a better course to bring this great plan to wreckage. What we need to-day is a board of men who know how to run ships.

I could not run a ship. I would be as worthless in running a shipping business as I would be in trying to sail a ship. If I tried to sail a ship I would run it on the rocks and destroy it, because I would not be competent. We might as well appoint a lot of old sea dogs to run the mining business or the farming business or to run the great steel plants as to appoint an advertising agent or a man of that kind to conduct a business that has to reach all of the parts of the world, and that requires a knowledge of commerce and foreign trade conditions everywhere.

Let us have a little sense about this business. I say that when the administration stands before the American people declaring that ships can be run, that our flag can be kept afloat, and that money can be made by our fleet if we will just pay a subsidy, which they say is very small, then they have to answer the question why they have not run the ships that way, and why they have been so utterly incompetent as to bring about a condition which they say means the destruction of a fleet that cost us thousands of millions of dollars.

Let us kill the bill. Then if the administration does not know enough to select a board composed of men who can run ships, let us enact a law that will demand and require the right kind of board.

The absolute bad faith of this entire performance is clearly demonstrated by the fact that the very men who stand here clamoring that we shall appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayer's money and deliver it as a subsidy to certain favored operators of our ships are the very men who voted to place an embargo on all commerce and who destroyed American shipping when they enacted the present tariff law. That law as applied to shipping can be summed up in this language: We expect American ships to make money by going from the United States ports to the ports of the world loaded with American products but we absolutely insist that they shall come back with empty bottoms. Everybody with the slightest amount of sense knows that the only way ships can make money is by being freighted with goods on return voyages as well as outbound sailings. The real advantage which British merchant vessels have over American ships is found in the fact that they can not only carry a full cargo of English goods to any part of the far-flung British Empire but they can also come back to Great Britain loaded with the products of the countries with which they trade. The absurdity of the present administration's position is that it first destroys shipping by its absurd tariff law, and then proposes to make shipping profitable by taxing the people of America. The vicious tariff law was repudiated by the people at the last election. This blundering and incompetent administration will be repudiated in 1924.

THE FILIBUSTER.

Mr. McKELLAR. I next come to the question of the filibuster. I defined filibustering a while ago, and I think my definition is exactly right. A filibuster is a filibuster to those who want to pass a bill which is very strongly opposed, but it is not a filibuster to those who are attempting to defeat that bill. In that position I find that I am sustained by a very great authority.

As I understand—and if I am mistaken I want to be corrected—the real official organ of the present administration is the Washington Post, a perfectly splendid newspaper, ably edited, vigorous, standing for what it believes is right, at any rate, at times. I read with a great deal of interest, in view of its past record, an editorial in the Post of yesterday.

I take it that that editorial is an expression of the administration's position about the filibuster. It is generally understood that the Washington Post more particularly represents the present administration than any other newspaper in the country. It is on the inside, so to speak, and I can readily understand how it gained the reputation to which I have referred, because it is a great newspaper; it is a powerful newspaper; it is an influential newspaper. I am not here to say aught against it, but I desire to call the attention of the country to the remarkable change that has come about in the expressions of that paper within the last few years on the subject of filibustering. In order that it may be fully understood, I now propose to read the editorial appearing in the Washington Post of the issue of Wednesday, February 21, 1923. The editorial is entitled "Reform of the Senate," and reads as follows:

"The opponents of the shipping bill in the Senate have entered upon a course which may have unexpected and historic results. The filibuster, organized by a minority presumably made up entirely of Democrats, has developed full strength and undisguised character."

I digress here long enough to wonder if the Post is reading anybody out of the Republican Party, for everyone knows that quite a large minority of Republican Senators are fighting this bill very vigorously, and that the majority of them in their hearts are not in favor of this bill; and if there is any filibuster, I presume Republicans opposing it are doing as much of it as or more of it than anybody else.

"Against the advice of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the able and experienced leader of their party in the Senate, the Democrats who oppose the bill are resorting to a parliamentary trick to defeat the will of the majority. It is intended by the filibustering minority to deny to the Senate and the country the right to have a decision upon the shipping bill.

"The reason why the minority resort to a filibuster is because the bill would pass if brought to a vote. If the opponents of the bill were in the majority they would not shrink from a vote, because they could kill the bill outright. Not having the votes, the minority seize upon the rule of the Senate which gives to each Senator the right of unlimited debate, and by violation of the spirit of this rule they hope to kill the shipping bill.

"The vice of this action is so obvious, and its effects are so damaging to the good name of the Senate, that the people of the United States can not fail to direct their attention to the situation that has arisen.

"President Harding foresaw the filibuster, apparently, when he asked the Senate to bring the shipping bill to a vote. He asserted that the country had a right to expect a vote, and he added that the Executive was entitled to know the will of Congress on the subject of the merchant marine. The Executive can not discharge his duties satisfactorily in the absence of a decision by Congress. The mere failure of Congress to decide, as a result of a filibuster, will not throw any light whatever upon national policy with regard to the merchant marine. The President will still be in the dark concerning the wishes of Congress, and the Treasury will still be paying out $50,000,000 a year as a net loss under the existing provisional arrangement.

"The filibuster, if successful, will therefore continue for another year the present arrangement, with an additional loss of $50,000,000, most of which might have been saved if the shipping bill had passed.

"The opposition to the shipping bill offers no alternative plan for the regulation of the merchant marine."

By the way, I will stop reading here long enough to say that I greatly regret that I have not sent my proposed substitute for the pending bill to my good friend the editor of this newspaper. I will send him a copy to-morrow. My substitute shows a very complete plan, which I hope the editor will carefully consider. It has been offered for several months, as I recall; certainly for several weeks.

"The defeat of the shipping bill would save nothing, but on the contrary would insure continued loss. Therefore the opposition, in conducting the filibuster in the Senate, is virtually conducting a raid upon the Treasury. The rambling filibuster speeches seem to cost nothing but the physical vigor and self-respect of the speakers, but actually they are costing the people of the United States millions of dollars.

"The money cost of the filibuster, however, is as nothing compared to the loss of prestige of the Senate."

I call special attention to this portion of the editorial, in view of the position which this newspaper has taken in the past, as I will call attention to in a moment.

"In a country noted for its love of directness and promptness, there is afforded a spectacle which turns the great Senate into a mockery, and which exhibits its members in a contemptible light to the people. Dignity naturally surrounds a chamber from which issues the law governing a mighty nation. The people's reverence for the institutions created by their fathers, in travail and martyrdom, would keep the Senate in high esteem, and the honor of serving in that body would be eagerly sought and dearly prized by any citizen, however nobly gifted. But a scene such as that now being enacted, when one Senator after another speaks to exhaustion on subjects alien to the bill, with the avowed object of misusing the Senate's own rules in order to violate the right of the majority to have its will—a scene like this shocks the public sense of decency and wounds its sense of reverence. Senators become mere tricksters, resorting to methods which would be frowned upon in a police court; and the Senate itself becomes a hissing and a jest.

"So the present filibuster may have results quite unexpected to the gentlemen who are widening the breach between the people and the Senate. The shipping bill may pass or may be defeated by the filibuster—its fate may become subordinate to another question transcending all others until it is settled, and settled right. This question, made acute by the filibuster, will be:

"Will the Senate reform its rules and proceed to fulfill its proper functions, or will the people reform the Senate?

"Superficially, it appears most difficult for the people to reform the Senate, because constitutional amendments must be passed upon by the Senate itself. Actually, however, nothing is easier than the reformation of the Senate by the people, once they are aroused and determined to put an end to the abuse that is making the Senate unpopular. Let the Senate make itself unpopular enough by failing to perform its duty and the people will do the rest. They will not resort to a constitutional amendment, but will act directly, by eliminating the unfit and electing men pledged beforehand to reform the Senate rules. Every filibuster, successful or unsuccessful, hastens the day when the reform of the Senate will be a burning issue."

The date of that editorial is February 21, 1923. I now read an editorial from the same newspaper on the subject of filibustering. I think that this is a matter of very great importance, in view of the function that the Washington Post performs, at least in the city of Washington, as an administration organ. It is virtually the administration organ, and therefore what it says is of vast importance to the people of this country.

On Saturday, January 23, 1915, when another shipping bill was before this body—a Democratic shipping bill—and, depending on what you call a filibuster, a Republican filibuster was on, this editorial appeared in the same paper. Whether or not it was written by the same editor I do not know, but I imagine so. I want to read it. It is on page 6 of the Washington Post of January 23, 1915. It is headed "The filibuster." By the way, I want to say before I start that it indorses my definition of a filibuster, heretofore given, exactly.

Says the editorial:

"It is a rather narrow line that is drawn between honest discussion of the defects of a bill and a filibuster. If a man is against a measure, a three-day speech would naturally be regarded by him as fair discussion in the public interest. If he were in favor of the bill, it would be a filibuster.

"There is a serious question as to whether an actual filibuster may not be more worthy of praise than attempts to jam through a measure by use of the party whip or by physical punishment of those who oppose the measure. If the Democrats themselves were united in favor of the ship purchase bill, there would be some excuse for their present tactics. The fact is, however, that few of the Democrats believe in it, and few of them know what shape the bill will finally take.

"How can the supporters of the bill blame the opponents for their determination to discuss every phase of the measure? Considering their own disagreements and lack of harmony, it is hardly good taste for them to absent themselves from the Senate when the bill is under discussion.

"Questions which are being asked by the opponents of the bill—questions designed to bring out information as to whether or not the measure will work to the public interest—are going unanswered simply because those who have been brought into line for the unperfected measure intend to ignore the merits of the matter.

"Are the Democrats willing to say to the country that they can not make any defense of the ship purchase bill? Are they willing to say that they have abandoned arguments and intend henceforth to resort to technical means of 'gagging' the opponents of the bill? Are they willing to say that they had to resort to night sessions to tire out their opponents, thus establishing merely the fact that human endurance has its limitations?

"Some exceptionally able arguments were made with reference to the ship purchase bill by Secretary McAdoo in his Chicago address. It would be worth while for the advocates of the bill to follow his lead, and at least give full information to the public as to what may be said in favor of the measure. Free discussion can not hurt any meritorious project. Surely the Democrats in the Senate do not want to plead guilty by their silence in the face of the Republican assaults on the bill."

Mr. President, lest we forget, I will stop here long enough to say that in 1915 the Democrats were in control of this body, and they brought forward what was known as the ship purchase bill. It was a bill which afterwards substantially passed, and upon which our merchant marine as it now stands was built. Our Republican friends, at a short session of Congress, just as this is, then said that the bill ought not to pass, and that every honorable means ought to be resorted to to prevent the passage of the bill. I do not see here now the distinguished chairman of the committee, in charge of this bill, but my good friend the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] made a little argument—a very fine one, too—of 14 hours against that bill. Of course, that was not filibustering then, because he was on the other side of the question.

My good friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I think spoke even longer than that, and various other Senators who were opposed to that bill talked not for hours, not for weeks, but for months in order to prevent the passage of that bill; and they were upheld, as I shall show in a few moments, all along the line by the Washington Post, the same paper that tells us now that we are making the Senate unpopular, and we are going to be legislated out of office by the people, because we demand a free discussion of this bill, and a vote upon it by those who were chosen by the people to vote upon it.

Mr. President, they can not scare us in that way. Both our Republican friends on the other side and their official spokesman, the Washington Post, must have a better record on filibustering before they can scare us off by saying that they are going to legislate us out of office if we talk too long and if we discuss this bill. But our friends on the other side say: "Oh, we have a majority for the shipping bill now, including the 10 Senators who will not come back. We do not know whether we will have that majority next year or not, and we want to jam it through now." In the words of the Post editorial: "We know that the people have turned us down at the polls, and we want to put through this subsidy bill regardless of the people, regardless of their expressed will. We have the physical power; we have the physical number of votes."

President Harding comes to the Congress and pleads that this bill shall be voted upon by these men who have been repudiated by the people of their States. I mean no disrespect to them. They are as fine a lot of Republicans as I ever saw. I have nothing but the kindest feelings toward them; but, however that may be, they have been politically repudiated by the people of their several States with the ship subsidy bill as an issue; and yet the President asks us to submit this question to the votes of these men who have been repudiated by the people at the polls, because without their votes there would not be a chance on earth for this bill to pass.

Let me call attention to this very editorial, taking an entirely different course, several years ago.

The editorial says:

"There is a serious question as to whether an actual filibuster may not be more worthy of praise than attempts to jam through a measure by use of the party whip or by physical punishment of those who oppose the measure."

Ah, how pertinent to this question! Here is a political party undertaking to jam through a measure without debate, without argument. I think only two or three Senators on the other side have spoken for this measure. My distinguished and highly esteemed and much-beloved friend, the chairman of this committee, has spoken out in meeting, as he always does; but what others on the other side of the Chamber have given the public the reasons why this bill, which is a departure from every principle that the American people hold dear, should be passed? Who has spoken in favor of it? And yet, by virtue of a physical majority that has been repudiated at the polls, it is sought here, in the closing days of this Congress, at the behest of a political organization, to jam through—in the words of the distinguished editor of the Washington Post—this bill that has been repudiated by the American people!

Oh, how truly did the editor of this paper speak at that time!

I read again:

"If the Democrats themselves were united in favor of the ship purchase bill there would be some excuse for their present tactics."

Mr. President, just strike out the word "Democrats" and insert the word "Republicans," and read it:

"If the Republicans themselves were united in favor of the ship purchase bill there would be some excuse for their present tactics."

And it would fit this situation like a glove.

Mr. President, this editorial says, "United in favor of it." Why, there never was such a difference of opinion on a question of this kind in the Republican Party or any other party. As I remember, when the ship purchase bill was up in 1915 three Democrats objected to it, but with the exception of those three the party was united.

Mr. JONES of Washington rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Were there more?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there were seven.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for the correction, because I want to be absolutely accurate. There were seven, and there are more than that in the Republican Party to-day. When this matter comes to a show-down there will be more than seven Republicans against it, and they are really against it; they are fighting against it; they are determined that it shall not pass at this session, that it shall not pass without being properly debated, that it shall not pass without being considered in its every aspect, this great departure from everything that Americans have been taught in the past to believe was a true policy in reference to such matters.

Mr. President, let us see for a moment how the Republicans are divided. They have a majority here of 22. I saw two or three days ago in the Washington Post—which everybody assumes is an official organ—that the Senate, if it voted at this time, would be 50 votes for it and 46 votes against it. Since that time one Senator who was then counted for it has openly and boldly announced in this body, as he did on yesterday, that he was going to vote against this bill, so that will make it 49 to 47. It is getting very close. It shows what arguments will do. It shows what discussion will do. It shows what careful thought and consideration will do.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not yield unless my good friend from Washington permits.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I told the Senator awhile ago that I would notify him before invoking the rule.

Mr. McKELLAR. That still holds good?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Florida, then.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to put my suggestion in the form of a question, but, if it is agreeable, I will state it the other way. As I figure it, out of this alleged majority, small as it is, as claimed even by the proponents of the bill, at least seven of our Republican friends who would vote for the bill will not be here after the 4th of March. They were defeated in the last election.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; as I stated a little while ago, the bill could not possibly pass without the votes of those Senators who will not be here in the ensuing Congress; and especially is that important here when nearly all of those who were defeated, unfortunately for them—I say, "unfortunately" because I love them all—were largely defeated upon the issue of the ship subsidy bill. It played an important part in the campaign in every State in this Union, and these gentlemen were defeated on it; and yet the President wants to have this bill—which has been repudiated at the polls—passed by votes that will not be with us after March 4.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to another statement in this editorial:

"How can the supporters of the bill blame the opponents for their determination to discuss every phase of the measure?"

Why, of course we are going to discuss it. We feel greatly encouraged at the result of our discussion of it. We know of one convert that has come over already. He has announced it. It has been growing ever since this bill came before the Senate. It was introduced, I think, about a year ago. The Republican Party could have brought it up before the Senate long ago, but they chose to bring it up here at this special session, and I do not believe they actually took it up until this short session. They were afraid to bring it up before the last election—afraid that if passed it would defeat them. But by introducing it, they were committed to it, and could not avoid the issue, and on that issue largely they were defeated. After defeat, they now want to pass it anyway.

Mr. President, how can they blame us? They have not discussed it themselves. They have not given us any real reasons why we should depart from our historic policy of not giving special subsidies to shipping interests. They have given no good reasons to the country or to the Senate itself. Why should they undertake to pass, and how can they blame us for being opposed to, a bill that they themselves will not discuss, and that has been repudiated by the people of the United States?

Mr. President, I suppose that every Senator who was elected in this last race not only made the statement that he was opposed to the ship subsidy bill, but made the statement that he would take every honorable means to defeat it, including seeing that there was a fair and a full and a frank discussion of the merits of the bill.

Now I come to another suggestion:

"Considering their own disagreements and lack of harmony, it is hardly good taste for them to absent themselves from the Senate when the bill is under discussion."

How that applies to the other side of the Chamber at this time, and not to this! It applies absolutely to the other side of the Chamber. When a Senator on the Democratic side or on the Republican side announces that he is going to discuss the ship subsidy bill, all of the chairs on the other side are vacated immediately. Republican Senators will not listen. They do not want to hear the arguments about it. They have made up their minds under an executive whip that they are going to swallow the bill, and I want to say that while perhaps there are only 10 or 12 Republicans who will vote against this bill, you all know down in your hearts that nearly all of you are opposed to it. You know that you have not any interest in it. You will not deny it. You would give anything in the world, just as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] indicated a while ago, if you did not have to vote for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. There are only two Republicans in their seats now.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; there are three, and there walks in the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], too. We will count him. I was just talking about the Senators on the other side who are so greatly interested in this bill that they will not come near when it is being discussed by anybody, it does not make any difference who it is. Even the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday did not have the audience of Senators that he ought to have had, eloquent, splendid speaker that he is.

Mr. President, as I was saying, we all know that in their hearts the majority as well as the minority over there—I mean, the minority of that party as well as the majority of that party—are opposed to this bill. They do not want it to pass. It will not grieve them if it does not pass, but they do not want to fall out with the Executive. They do not want to come to the parting of the ways with him, of course; but we know here, we who negotiate with them daily, that they have no interest in this bill. We know that they do not want this bill passed. They know that we know that they would be delighted if the bill should fail, as of course it will fail; and they all know that, too.

I do not think there is a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who does not know that the bill is not going to pass at this session, and I doubt if there are a dozen over there who in their hearts believe it ought to pass.

Questions are being asked about the bill by the opponents and there is nobody here to answer those questions.

So it is to-day. But I want to say that I am not confined in any way to just one editorial of the Washington Post standing by the filibuster against the shipping bill of 1915. There are many others. The record is complete. It was the habit in those days for the Washington Post to defend the filibuster. It wrote a beautiful editorial about my friend, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], when he was filibustering against the shipping bill in 1915.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. That shipping bill was a bill which was intended to equip us to engage in the World War which we knew we must shortly enter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but that did not cut any figure in those days. It was presented by the Democratic Party and it was filibustered against, with the hearty approval of the Post. But, oh, what a change! I stop here to digress just a moment to discuss the suggestion of my friend from Arkansas. What a change would have been brought about and what an advantage it would have been to America in the World War if the shipping bill of 1915 had been passed instead of being defeated—defeated by the eloquence of Republican Senators, 14 hours of it by my distinguished and splendid friend, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and about an equal amount by my good friend, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. That is a very startling statement which the Senator has made. Does he mean that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator in charge of the pending shipping bill, spoke for 14 hours filibustering against the ship purchase bill a few years ago?

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean exactly that, and I mean further to say that he made a very fine speech. I am going to quote from it directly. I indorse much of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator will let me know when he reaches it, because I want to go out. I do not want to listen to a filibuster.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am coming to it directly. Yes, the Senator from Washington made a splendid argument. It will be remembered that he had much to say about this point—and, by the way, if I make a mistake about it I hope the Senator from Washington will correct me. He said the people from the "amen corner" had not been heard from. I think I have an editorial here praising the Senator from Washington for referring the shipping bill of 1915 to the people in the "amen corners" in the various parts of the United States. He made a splendid speech in favor of the filibuster. He was just as frank about it then as I am to-day. He stated it openly. The Senator from Washington does not conceal things. He is as straight from the shoulder as any man I ever knew. He did not conceal at all. He said the bill was not going to pass, and it did not. The Washington Post, which is now the official organ of the administration, upheld him in every particular.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask what explanation the Senator from Washington now makes for his attitude at that time?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know that he makes any explanation of it. He has just changed his mind, that is all there is to it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. One of the objects of the debate was to have an interesting, open, free, and fair discussion, led by the Senator from Washington. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and others on the other side of the Chamber made speeches at that time upholding the filibuster. Let me suggest here that some explanation is due why it is a high and splendid and patriotic service to filibuster against a shipping bill under those conditions, and yet it is wrong when it comes to a bill which changes the whole course of our merchant-marine policy, when it takes at least $30,000,000 annually out of the pockets of the American people and gives it to the owners of a few fast passenger vessels which really do not need it, because they are doing a good business anyway. We want to know why the Senator from Washington has changed his mind and his attitude, and I know that he will take the time at the proper opportunity to tell us. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator wants to know if I have any explanation about my change of mind. I do not understand what he means. I have not changed my mind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think, perhaps, I did an injustice to the Senator. I do not believe the Senator has complained at all that Senators on this side of the Chamber or the other side of the Chamber have talked about the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator can not point to anything I have said at any time in criticism of the course Senators are taking.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for the correction. I think he is entirely right about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I assume that every Senator takes the course on this floor which he conscientiously believes to be right. I have followed that course, and I give every Senator credit for doing the same thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the Senator from Washington feels just that way and believes just that way. I am glad to hear him say it. I want to say that since I have been in the Senate I have never known a fairer man, a more honest man, a more patriotic man, than the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, it may be that the reason why the Senator has said nothing is because he has not detected as yet that a filibuster is on.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, I think I know a filibuster when I see it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that manifestations of approval or disapproval are contrary to the rules of the Senate, and if persisted in the Chair will be compelled to order the galleries cleared.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Chair will pardon the occupants of the gallery, because this is a dry matter we are discussing. Let us have a little humor in it occasionally.

While the Senator from Washington is correct in his statement that he has not changed and is not criticizing the filibuster, yet what a change there has been in the official organ of the administration, the Washington Post, giving the views of the administration first-hand. Let me read an editorial from the Washington Post of February 7, 1915:

"The Post is an opponent of Government ownership in all fields of action in which private enterprise and private capital can secure fair and reasonable returns upon such enterprise and capital by rendering efficient, honest, and faithful service to the people at fair and reasonable cost to them.

"But here is a field in which private capital has failed for 50 years to provide such service for the American people."

It now wants to turn all these ships over to private interests—ships that cost the American people three or four billion dollars. It changes its views and now thinks that we are going to abolish the Senate if we do not have a discussion of the matter.

I continue reading:

"Here is a field that American private capital has left open to foreigners for half a century, and now, when it is proposed that its own Government shall become the creator of such a marine, private capital enters a vigorous protest."

I next read from another editorial in the Washington Post. I want to call the especial attention of our Republican friends to this—that is, the three Republicans who are now present in the Chamber. The editorial reads:

A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT.

"If the majority of the Senate, solely because of its numerical strength, were to adopt a cloture rule to shut off debate on the shipping bill, a precedent would be established that would hamper the Democratic Party in all its future actions."

They were talking about a cloture rule then to stop the flight of oratory on the other side of the Chamber, and the Washington Post came out for discussion—open discussion, frank discussion, full discussion, unlimited discussion. The editorial went on to say:

"Apparently the proposal that a cloture amendment be added to the Senate rules on February 19 is made seriously. Perhaps it has been forgotten that the Democratic Party made much capital out of the Cannon rules in the House in the campaign of 1910, and later in the campaign of 1912.

"In all fairness, it must be admitted that there was a great deal of buncombe in the fight against the Cannon rules, as has been shown by the drastic rules brought in by the Democratic Party under the present régime. Nevertheless, the Democrats did make capital out of the supposed arbitrary character of the House rules and went on record in favor of more liberality.

"The advantages of maintaining a consistent record may not appeal to the party in power, but the mere fact that it is put to the necessity of proposing a cloture rule is likely to weaken support for the shipping bill. Something more than expediency is involved. Freedom of discussion has always been the principal instrument of good government, and that freedom is now assailed in the Senate."

Let me read that again:

"The advantages of maintaining a consistent record may not appeal to the party in power, but the mere fact that it is put to the necessity of proposing a cloture rule is likely to weaken support for the shipping bill. Something more than expediency is involved. Freedom of discussion has always been the principal instrument of good government, and that freedom is now assailed in the Senate."

That editorial was published on February 11, 1915.

That was on February 11, 1915. Eight years have gone by, and the same paper which then complained that freedom of speech and debate was about to be shut off in the United States Senate when it ought not to be shut off, when it would ruin the Senate if it were shut off, on yesterday came out with an editorial stating that unless the bill is brought to a vote the Senate is likely to destroy itself by not letting it come to a vote. Which are we going to believe? Are we going to take the advice of the Washington Post given eight years ago, or are we going to take the advice that it gives to-day? The two pieces of advice are diametrically opposed to each other. The Washington Post of 1915 is absolutely denied by the Washington Post of 1923. They said it was a dangerous precedent then. They attempt to frighten us to-day by saying that if the very thing which they then defended is continued by the Senate it will destroy the Senate and defeat the various Members who are following the advice which it gave in 1915.

I read further:

"Proponents of the cloture program should not lose sight of the fact that the Senate of the United States, which had been assailed as a superfluous legislative Chamber a few years ago, has lately been restored completely to popular control. Comment is frequently made that every piece of legislation that has been sent to the Senate in recent years has been materially improved."

Oh, what a splendid thing a filibuster was then in the eyes of the Post, the official organ of the present administration, and what a bad thing it is to-day when there is a piece of legislation before us that the Post and the Executive desire to jam through by the votes of men who have been defeated for reelection. Then a Republican filibuster would restore the Senate to popular confidence. Now a Democratic filibuster on a like bill will destroy the Senate in the popular mind. Consistency, thou art indeed a jewel. Ah, we know that it is true that discussion in this body and careful deliberation in this body has improved the legislation which has been before the Congress, just as the Post then so well stated.

I continue to read:

"Bills passed by the House in two or three days, important bills like the tariff, currency, and antitrust measures, have been debated intelligently in the Senate, with a view to the best interests of the Nation. Can anyone argue that the discussion on these measures was not useful? Senators who now want to cut off debate would have protested vigorously if their own right to discuss measures had been taken from them.

"It is doubtful whether even the advocates of the ship purchase bill will vote for cloture. It would mean the end of free discussion in the Senate for all time. It would tend to destroy the Senate as a useful legislative body."

Mr. President, I put in juxtaposition, if I may so express it, with the expression of the Post to-day that last sentence, indicating its attitude in 1915:

"It would mean the end of free discussion in the Senate for all time. It would tend to destroy the Senate as a useful legislative body."

When it was advocating a filibuster in 1915, when it was defending filibusterers in 1915, that is what the Washington Post had to say—that the Senate was going to destroy itself as a legislative body if the filibuster did not go on—but, eight years afterwards, when it has another ax to grind, when it wants to have passed this bill which has been repudiated by the people, when it wants to have passed this bill by the strength of numbers of men who will not be here after March 4, this year, this is what it has to say:

"Superficially, it appears most difficult for the people to reform the Senate, because constitutional amendments must be passed upon by the Senate itself. Actually, however, nothing is easier than the reformation of the Senate by the people, once they are aroused and determined to put an end to the abuse that is making the Senate unpopular. Let the Senate make itself unpopular enough by failing to perform its duty, and the people will do the rest. They will not resort to a constitutional amendment, but will act directly, by eliminating the unfit and electing men pledged beforehand to reform the Senate rules. Every filibuster, successful or unsuccessful, hastens the day when the reform of the Senate will be a burning issue."

Oh, yes, when it was in favor of a filibuster the statement was made that the Senate was going to destroy itself by interfering with free discussion, but to-day, when it is against a filibuster, the Washington Post, with equal or greater emphasis, says that the Senate is going to destroy itself because it permits free speech!

Mr. President, that was not all. The official organ of the Republican Party in Washington did not stop at that. I now come to the most pleasing part of my task. It is reading the editorial indorsing the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] for conducting the filibuster in 1915. I read an editorial from the Washington Post of date February 14, 1915, which is entitled "The amen corner":

"When Senator JONES, in the course of his 14-hour speech on the shipping bill, announced that his observations were directed primarily to the 'amen corners' of the country, he not only chose a felicitous title, but also indulged in a degree of candor not always expressed by statesmen, who, whatever their avowed disinterestedness, never fail to have those particular gatherings in mind."

Politically speaking, the amen corner has long been known. Its most famous example was found in an earlier storm period, when there was a custom to congregate around the late Thomas C. Platt a group of tried and true followers in a particular corner of a room in the old Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York City. When that rendezvous had mustered a quorum things followed as pertinently and effectively as any that have later emanated from modern conclaves, regarding which the question as to whether they constitute a "conference" or a "secret caucus" still forms the subject matter of earnest and sometimes heated debate.

"The original amen corner belongs, no doubt, to the country meetin' houses of a gone and better era. Yet the spirit has in no wise changed. In religion then, as in politics now, the words of the speakers, whether presidin' elder or newly licensed 'exhorter,' were spoken with a thought to the reception they would be granted at that tribunal of last resort. Were the delivery followed by a solemn silence in that quarter, the exponent of the message properly felt the occasion a failure. Evidences of animation, however, betokened promise of success and led to more vigorous efforts. And when the heights were reached and perfervid pulpit oratory brought forth the sonorous and spontaneous 'amen,' then the speaker and the audience knew that the truth had gone home, nor needed to await the later pronunciamento that the sermon was 'sarchin', powerful 'sarchin'.

"The land is filled with amen corners. Around the blacksmiths' shops, down at the grocery store, in back rooms where sawdust sprinkles the floor, in the neighborhood of the 'cou't-house,' out at the old sawmill, where groups gather on 'stock-sale day,' there still linger the amen corners, listening, analyzing, reflecting. For their delectation, in expectation of their approval, Senators speak, filibusters are carried on, even wars are fought. And until they are heard from the last word on any subject remains to be said."

Mr. President, that statement is very appropriate to the present situation, except that the people from the "amen corners" have already spoken. They were asked their views last November. Advocates of ship subsidy went on every stump in every "amen corner" in the land. They went, as the editorial states, to the blacksmith shops, to the back rooms of stores, to the cross-road meetings, to the "amen corners," throughout the United States. The people spoke from those "amen corners," and with one accord they spoke against the ship subsidy bill. That bill was an issue in every State in the Union, perhaps, where there was a senatorial election, and in every instance the advocates of ship subsidy were repudiated by almost unprecedented majorities. Yet in face of the record, in face of the votes from the "amen corners," throughout the Nation and in every State, the President comes before us and in substance says, "Yes; I know the bill has been repudiated by the people. I know that we can not pass it when the representatives who were elected last November take their seats in Congress, but I want the old Congress to pass it." Let me ask some Senator exactly the ratio of Republicans to Democrats in the present House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. The Republicans have a majority of about 160.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Mississippi informs me that the present Republican majority in the House is about 160. That is an overwhelming majority, the greatest majority the Republican Party ever had in that body.

Mr. HARRISON. And the greatest majority they ever will have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the greatest majority they ever will have. Yet under the whip and spur of the Executive, answering his prayer, delivered in person, I believe twice, to pass it, a majority of only 24 in the House of Representatives voted for the bill, and here on this floor we all know that there will be no effort to pass this discredited measure in the new Congress.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have the exact figures here.

The PRESIDING OFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The composition of the present House is Republicans 298, Democrats 130, Socialist 1, vacancies 6; so that the majority at present is 167.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is 167, and still there could not be found but a paltry majority of 24 to pass the shipping bill; and, by the way, my recollection is that of those constituting the number who voted for the bill, sixty-odd of them were defeated in the very election in which this great question was submitted to the people; but they were forced in one way or another, through Executive influence, direct or implied, to vote for a measure in which they did not believe. We all know that the great majority of the present House of Representatives, Republican as it is, are overwhelmingly opposed to the passage of this bill and only voted for it because they were asked to do so by the Executive.

So it is in the Senate. In this body there is a Republican majority of 22; but if the recorded judgment of every Senator could be had, just as it is in his heart, the pending bill would be overwhelmingly defeated, for there are few Senators here who are heart and soul in favor of the bill. Under those circumstances such a bill ought not to be foisted upon the American people, for the reason that a majority of the present representatives of the people are at heart opposed to it, and the people have spoken and spoken against it in no uncertain terms.

But, Mr. President, I had not finished my quotation from this great newspaper, one which I read every morning, whether I agree with it or not, because it gives the news; it has able and distinguished writers on its staff, both editorial and reportorial, who write with spirit and ability and whose articles it is a pleasure to read, whether one agrees with them or not. I have no desire to say anything to the discredit of that newspaper or its representatives in any way, but quite to the contrary. It is, I repeat, a great newspaper, and because it is a great newspaper and because it is the official organ of the administration, I am using the material which its files afford. I now wish to read an editorial published in the Washington Post on February 18, 1915, entitled "The steam roller." Mr. President, I will digress here long enough to ask unanimous consent that all of the quotations from newspapers and books which I have read may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, which is very much easier to read than the smaller type. I have reached that point in life where I can read matter printed in 8-point type a great deal better than in the smaller type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. The editorial in the Washington Post on February 18, 1915, entitled "The steam roller," reads as follows:

"The manner in which the steam roller was used in the House for the passage of the ship purchase bill simply illustrates how power can be used without efficiency.

"Once there was an outcry in the House against what was called 'Cannonism.' It was argued that the Speaker had too much power. He could use this power, it is true, to keep down appropriations, but he could also use it to give preference to administration measures.

"The rules were changed to take such power away from the Speaker. Probably the principal result of this action has been in the way of unprecedented extravagance. Chairmen of committees not being responsible to the Speaker but owing their election to their popularity with the other Members of the House, have sought to increase their popularity by being liberal with appropriations.

"Whatever there was of evil in the old rules has returned with redoubled power. The Speaker of the House can not be held responsible for the 'gag' rule adopted by the House for the quick passage of the ship purchase bill. A measure which is unlike anything that has been previously discussed, and whose virtues and defects are virtually unknown, was rushed through to passage with scarcely any debate."

What an accurate description of the manner in which the pending ship subsidy bill was jammed through the House a short time ago, when it only got through by the extraordinarily narrow margin of 24 votes, and of the manner in which it is proposed to jam it through this House.

"If the sole effect of the change in rules is to transfer arbitrary power from the Speaker of the House, elected by the Members, to the administration, whose functions are not supposed to be legislative, wherein lies the improvement? The new authority can not restrict appropriations as the Speaker formerly did. It need not even hold itself responsible for any blunder the House may commit under its direction. Freedom of discussion has always been one of the greatest instruments for the making of honest and intelligent legislation. This was the very basis of the attack made on the old rules, all the evils of which and none of the overbalancing virtues of which are now restored.

"Moreover, under the old rules there was always the consciousness that the Senate would give more careful consideration to measures put through under a special rule; but now with debate eliminated almost entirely in the House the Senate calmly contemplates the removal of the final safeguard of representative government by adopting a cloture rule."

Ah, Mr. President, what a change has come over the administration and what a change has come over this organ of the administration. Then when a Republican filibuster was on, if we interfered with the freedom of debate it meant, according to the Post, "the removal of the final safeguard of representative government," but now, when we ask for freedom of debate, when we ask that this vicious measure be discussed in the light of reason before the American public, we are told that the Senate is likely to destroy itself because we demand the very freedom of discussion that the Post so eloquently declared was right on February 18, 1915.

Again, here is what it said on February 27, 1915, under the heading "Reviving the shipping bill":

"Attempts to revive the ship purchase bill in view of the failure of previous determined efforts to pass it can not be regarded in any other light than as a despairing effort to demonstrate the power of personal leadership.

"The ship purchase bill met a natural death. The act came, not as the result of a wound inflicted in the house of its friends, not as a result of the blows rained upon it by its enemies, but solely as a result of the failure of public opinion to rally to its support."

How accurate is that statement of the present measure! This bill is not going to be filibustered to death. This bill is not going to be talked to death. This bill is not going to be voted to death. This bill is already dead, because an outraged public opinion in America has decreed it so. We know that the people have already passed upon it, and that is why it is in the position that it is to-day.

I read:

"Talking the shipping bill to its natural death would not have been possible if there had been any real public sentiment in its favor."

And so we know that that is true to-day. If there were any real public sentiment in favor of this bill in America to-day it could not be talked to death, it could not be filibustered to death, nor could it be voted to death. We know that. Why attempt to fool ourselves? Why attempt to make ourselves believe something that our inner consciousness knows has already been settled and determined, and settled by the voice of the American people themselves? It was settled last November. It can not be undone by this Congress in its closing days. We know that it is impossible.

The Post spoke the truth then, and I commend this editorial to my friends on the other side.

I continue reading:

"There was no such fight against the administration currency bill, or even against the tariff bill, both of which the Democrats were pledged to enact. There was serious complaint against the kind of bills that were enacted, but it was realized that the Democratic Party had to make some sort of revision to comply with its platform.

"There was no such justification, however, for the ship-purchase bill. No one knew where the proposal came from originally."

I stop here long enough to ask the chairman of the committee where this proposal came from originally. I looked over the chairman's splendid speech 15 years ago. I have read other speeches of his on our merchant marine. He has been a consistent, ardent advocate of an American merchant marine, just as I have been. Heretofore he has never believed in cash subsidy, and I am wondering whether or not this bill originated in the mind of my distinguished friend. I know he introduced it, but I am wondering whether he put it forward as his measure for the correction of evils that he thought existed in regard to our merchant marine.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be very glad to answer the Senator's question if he desires. I stated in my opening speech on this bill the origin of the bill. I can state it briefly again, if the Senator wishes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose, because I overlooked that portion of his speech.

Mr. JONES of Washington. After the administration got in I think everybody recognized the situation that confronted us with reference to the shipping that we had bought during the war. After the Shipping Board was appointed and had gotten to work and gotten things in shape, and it was found that certain provisions of the act of 1920 would not be carried out, the board felt that some steps should be taken to meet the situation that confronted us with reference to our shipping, it being the desire and the expressed purpose of the act of 1920 that our ships should be gotten into private hands as soon as possible under ordinary good business methods, it being the policy, as declared in the act of 1920, that we did not intend to carry on permanent Government ownership and operation of these ships. So the Shipping Board began to study the question, and finally, my recollection is, they appointed a committee composed of representatives of business men, representatives of the shipping interests, representatives of financial interests, representatives of labor interets, and representatives of the farming interests, to study the problem and see if they could work out legislation under which we would build up an American merchant marine.

I met that committee at some of its hearings as chairman of the Commerce Committee, and representatives of the House committee also met with them, and we discussed there, you might say, general principles, general policies. Finally, the Shipping Board, in conference with these representatives, worked out this plan, and I understand that a resolution was passed by the Shipping Board unanimously, Democrats and Republicans approving this proposition—that is, approving the general policies and general principles that were to be incorporated in the bill—and then these policies and principles were put into the hands of experts, and the bill was drafted in the Shipping Board.

I will say also that it was submitted to a conference of the Republican members of the Commerce Committee and the Merchant Marine Committee of the House, and the general principles and policies were discussed, some suggestions were eliminated, some other suggestions were adopted, and then the bill was drafted in the Shipping Board and presented to Congress.

That is a brief outline of the drafting of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am greatly obliged to the Senator. Now may I ask him if the cash subsidy was suggested by him?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; it was not suggested by me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I felt quite sure that was the case.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But I have stated several times that I have reached the point where I will support any proposition that gives a reasonable promise of developing and maintaining a permanent American merchant marine, because I consider it of such tremendous importance to the people; and as I had no hope of enforcing the provisions of the act of 1920, which I believed in and still believe in, so far as that is concerned, I was willing to accept this as the conclusion of these experts and of these experienced men as the only other proposal that offered any hope of accomplishing what I so much desired. So I accepted it as an alternative, and I say frankly that is the ground upon which I support it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then it is not a proposal of the Senator from Washington, the chairman of the committee, but it is a proposal of the best minds in the Shipping Board and in the shipping interests generally and in financial circles?

Mr. JONES of Washington. And the labor interests were represented, too, as they are represented on the board.

Mr. McKELLAR. And also a representative of the labor interests?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, frankly——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is always frank.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should say that the representatives of the American Federation of Labor appeared before the joint committee and opposed it; but, as the Senator knows, one of the members of the Shipping Board is a representative of labor. I forget now; I think he is a representative of the Longshoremen's Union.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I recall that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But a very prominent labor leader and labor representatives were on this committee to which I have referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. Were there any other labor representatives there except the representative on the Shipping Board?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand so. I think so; but I could not name them now.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the Senator, his proposal in 1920 of a differential on goods coming in in American ships was a proposal that he thought exceedingly wise if it had been put into practice.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. And that—to use a slang expression—it would have "turned the trick" if it had not been vetoed by the President; first by President Wilson and afterwards by President Harding.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator knows, in the substitute bill which I have offered I have proposed exactly the same thing in substance. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that an American merchant marine has been a hobby of mine for many, many years. Long before I came to either branch of Congress I made speeches on the subject. I have always been in favor of it. There is no man in this Chamber or elsewhere who is more in favor of building up a merchant marine than I am, and I want to say to the Senator that a great many of the provisions of his bill meet my entire approval. I am inclined to think I would vote for them all if the cash-subsidy provision could be taken out, as I shall explain in a few moments. The reason why I stopped and asked the Senator the question I did about his own views on the merchant marine was that I did not believe that the idea of a cash subsidy originated with the Senator. I felt that it came from other sources, just as the Senator has said, and I am glad to know that it is not his proposal. I want to say to him that it would be a great deal harder for me to vote against it if I knew that it was what the Senator himself proposed originally as a cure for the situation that now confronts our merchant marine, and that is why I stopped to ask that question of the Senator.

I want to finish this editorial. It is short. I must hurry on, for I have a great deal more to say. I have taken up more time now than I ought to have taken. I should welcome the withdrawal of the bill at any time, so that we may not take up more time.

The Post continued, in this editorial of February 27:

"There was no such justification, however, for the ship purchase bill. No one knew where the proposal came from originally. They knew that the President sponsored it, and it proved that his influence was sufficient to rush it through the House under high speed toward the close of the session. But it was indicated at that time that action by the House would be considered sufficient vindication for the principal backer of the measure.

"It is idle for the administration to think that the bill can be pushed through the Senate at this late day in view of the demonstration of the opposition. The word that comes from the White House to make a last attempt can hardly be complied with, even by the most devoted followers of the administration.

"Reports that legislative 'strong arm' methods will be used to obtain a final vote need not be taken seriously. There is not only a strong minority to protest, but there is an actual majority against the bill as it stands. Any further efforts in the measure's behalf will simply demonstrate the weakness of its support."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield; yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was that this bill that they were talking about?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, no; it was not this bill. That was an editorial when the Post was on the other side of the question. They said that no bill brought in at this late date, just about this ime in the session, could be pushed through.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator astonishes me. Has the Post been on two sides of a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite so. I have attempted to demonstrate that that is so from the official organ of the administration.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am honestly pained.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure that the Senator is as I am.

Mr. President, I have had handed to me an editorial from the World which I have not read with care; I have just glanced over it, but it is on this very subject. If it says any harsh things I am not going to subscribe to them, because I am not going to say anything harsh about anybody to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator whether that is the editorial in this morning's World?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. That does not accuse the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] of filibustering against the ship subsidy bill, does it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not read it with care, but I will read it now to the Senate and let the Senator form his own conclusions. It does not say that the Senator from Washington is engaged in a filibuster, though it did look yesterday and this morning a little as if there was some help from his side of the Chamber, but it does call the filibuster by a different name. It calls it "Mr. Harding's filibuster." That is the title of the editorial.

"Mr. Harding alone is responsible for the Senate filibuster and for all the legislative consequences of it. The blame rests wholly with the President, because the President is trying to nullify the verdict of a national election.

"Mr. Harding is determined that a great question of public policy shall be settled by a discredited Congress. He insists that Senators and Representatives who have been defeated by their constituents shall have the deciding voice in controlling Treasury expenditures over a period of 15 years. Going over the heads of the voters, he has appealed to the sheer brute power of party organization plus the patronage that the Executive can use to reward his followers. No more shocking spectacle of downright political immorality has ever been seen in Washington than that which is now presented under the auspices of the President of the United States.

"Like most weak men, Mr. Harding is capable of extreme exhibitions of sheer obstinacy. For reasons that are not clear either to the Republican leaders in Congress or to members of his Cabinet, he has set his heart on a particular piece of ship subsidy legislation to the exclusion of everything else. There is no popular sentiment in support of this bill. For nearly a year eminent Republicans in Congress have been telling him that the country was against it, and the elections last fall confirmed everything they said to him. Nothing, however, has changed the President's personal opinion. Hypnotized by Lasker and Laskerism, he has given himself over to this reckless raid on the Treasury.

"Knowing that he can never obtain his subsidy legislation from the Congress that was elected in November, he is using all his influence to obtain it from the Congress that was repudiated in November. By the votes of 66 defeated Representatives he managed to get it through the House with a majority of only 24. He has now mobilized the defeated Republican Senators, and with plenty of Federal jobs to reward them he thinks that he can get it through the Senate before March 4 if he can bring it to a vote.

"There have been times when a filibuster was a denial of the principle of representative government, but this is a case in which it is a vindication of that principle. The Senators who are blocking a vote in the Senate are the exponents of majority rule. They are fighting for the rights of a newly elected Congress to represent the people of the United States on an important issue of public policy.

"This is no ordinary piece of legislation. It is not a bill that carries an appropriation for a single year, which the next Congress could discontinue; nor is it an act that the next Congress would feel free to repeal if it saw fit. Mr. Harding is trying to establish by law a legal obligation on the part of the United States Government to pay out hundreds of millions of dollars to private interests over a period of 15 years. He is trying to enact a contract. He is trying to tie the hands of eight succeeding Congresses and four succeeding administrations.

"That is something that no President should be permitted to do without a mandate from the people themselves. It is something that no President has a moral or a political right to undertake except in consequence of a definite party pledge which has been ratified at the polls. Mr. Harding is asking a verdict from a packed jury before whose eyes he is dangling the emoluments of Federal office, and a filibuster is the only answer to the methods that the President has adopted."

Mr. President, the President of the United States made a mistake in endeavoring to jam through this legislation at the short session of Congress. It is legislation that ought to be given most careful consideration. It ought to be debated. Senators should stay in their places in the Chamber and consider the measure before they vote. I look over at the other side of the Chamber, and there are now three Republican Senators there; and yet when Senators come in to vote many of them will vote without having examined the bill and without having even read it or even thought about it. I wonder how many Republican Senators have read it at all? I wonder how many have considered it? I wonder how many of them have spoken on it? So far as I recall, only two or three Republican Senators, maybe only one, have spoken in the debate on the ship subsidy bill. If it is a good measure, why are they not willing to come out and fight for it? If it is a good measure, why are they not willing to submit it to any body of men? If it is a good measure, why are they not willing to submit it to a Congress that was elected on that issue?

Oh, Mr. President, Senators on the other side of the Chamber are taking it like a child takes a dose of castor oil. They are holding their noses while they take it. They do not want to vote for it, but most of them could not be pleased better than by getting it out of the way in some manner. They have not examined it, because they are not interested in it. They do not believe in it. Any Senator who believes in a measure and who thinks it is for the best interests of his country and his constituents is delighted to get up and speak for it. If it is a measure that is helpful for the best interests of the Republic, instead of having empty benches on the other side of the Chamber we would find Republican Senators vying with each other to get recognition from the Chair in order to speak for it. They know it has been discredited. They know that the people have repudiated it. They know it ought not to be enacted into law.

THE BILL AND MY SUBSTITUTE.

Now, Mr. President, I next come to a consideration of the bill itself. As I said a little while ago, no person in the United States would more earnestly, more heartily, more sincerely be in favor of building up a great American merchant marine than I. I would go to any reasonable length to get it. I would go to any reasonable length to make our present merchant marine a success. If I honestly and sincerely thought that the way to build up the American merchant marine was to vote for a subsidy for it, I would even vote for the subsidy. But I do not believe that. I believe that the surest, the best, the most perfect way to destroy an American merchant marine is to pass the provision contained in this bill providing for a cash subsidy. Believing that, I would be dishonest if I voted for it. I would be dishonest if I did not use every honorable effort within my power to defeat it.

What is the proposed subsidy bill? Speaking briefly, the purpose of the proposed bill, first, is that it desires to take the Government out of the shipping business at the earliest possible moment by causing the Shipping Board to sell and dispose of our immense merchant marine fleet amounting to some 10,000,000 tons, the second largest in the world, largely now idle—no business for it; shipping lower than it has ever been in history—practically nothing in the way of demand. And yet at this time, with shipping at a lower ebb than it has ever been in the history of the world, with this immense merchant marine fleet that we have, it is deliberately proposed by the proponents of this bill to sell our vessels and get them into the hands of anybody, just so the Government can get rid of them. Sell them if we can, but give them away if necessary. That is virtually what is meant by the bill.

The bill next proposes to have the Shipping Board dismantle something like one-half of our American merchant marine, of the poorer ships; and the purpose of that is to dismantle the poorer ships. I suppose they mean to destroy when they say "dismantle," to sell as junk or sink if necessary. But why? Because they are not good cargo ships? Because they are not as excellent ships as there are on the seas? No; the reason for it is, as stated by Mr. Lasker in the hearings, that he wants to get rid of one half of the tonnage so that the other half which he puts in the hands of those who purchase it may not have the competition that the poorer ships will cause. We are to sell about half of them at a nominal price to private owners and then sink the rest of them, so the others may not be sold in the future and come in competition with those which are sold now.

I wonder what the American people would think if it should be brought to them that here, after years of trial, after years of trouble, after this enormous expense, it is deliberately proposed in the bill to sink one half of our tonnage in order that the other half may make more money in the hands of private owners. Yet that is what the bill proposes to do. Can it be said that any sane, reasonable man, not spurred on by the executive whip, is going to vote for that? That is one of the reasons why there is so little interest taken in the shipping bill by Senators on the other side of the Chamber. It does not meet their approval any more than it meets our approval, if the truth were known.

Next, it is proposed to give subsidies largely to fast ships, passenger ships, while the amounts paid to the freighters will be inconsequential. We all know that the lines between the United States and Germany and England are for the most part highly profitable lines. No other government gives a subsidy to its passenger lines between those points. Yet if this bill passes the principal beneficiary of the bounty or subsidy will be the two lines already established, the great passenger-ship lines now making money, certainly not losing any, running between New York and London and between New York and Bremen. The Bremen line, as I understand, made $700,000 last year under Government control, or quasi Government control, and the other line, by reason of the fact that it can get no cargoes on the return trip from Great Britain, lost about the same amount. But this is the worst year shipping has ever had. No one believes that the present condition is going to continue. It is not going to continue. It is going to get better.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. If we are going to give subsidies at all, would it not be better to give them to the freight lines?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator is right. The idea of building up a merchant marine by giving subsidies to the ship lines that need no subsidies and withholding them from the freighters is absolutely without merit in my judgment. Even if I believed in a subsidy I would not believe in giving it to the great passenger lines, these great floating palaces which afford rich people every accommodation at tremendous fares for taking them across the ocean. I do not believe those are the lines that ought to have subsidies, even if I believed in a subsidy at all, which I do not. But if we are to vote any subsidies, if a subsidy is to be paid, if the bill should be passed over my protest and the protest of others who do not believe in it, surely the subsidy should be given to the freight lines that would bring business to the American people and give us trade and commerce with all the world.

Mr. DIAL. As I understand the bill, there are not many of the freight ships that would receive a subsidy under it, not many of the ships owned by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think some of them would receive something like $10,000, which would mean nothing.

Mr. DIAL. A great number would receive practically nothing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a little gift, lagniappe, so to speak, as, I think, they call it down in Louisiana. It would not amount to anything. It is not enough to build up any freight lines.

Mr. DIAL. It would not even help to sell the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it would not help to sell the ships. We can not sell the ships at this time under any circumstances. The markets of the world are clogged with ships at this time. It is not a good time to sell our ships.

I understand that 65 per cent of the Italian ships are idle to-day and tied up; that 25 per cent of Great Britain's ships are idle to-day and tied up, and various percentages in all countries, running from 25 in Great Britain to 65 in Italy, are tied up. They are tied up all over the world for lack of business. To select a year like this for the sale of 10,000,000 tons of shipping is, to my mind, without any merit whatsoever. It is not a time to sell our ships. I doubt if we could give them away to-day. I doubt if we could sell them with double the subsidy.

I come now to the next thing in the bill itself. In the fourth place, it provides in substance that all of the people shall be taxed to pay a few shipping interests sufficient subsidies to keep their lines going. I think I am hardly accurate about that. I think the two great passenger lines which would get a large part of the subsidy do not need any subsidy to keep them going, but they will get it just the same. They will be the beneficiaries of it.

The great passenger lines that make money now will be the principal beneficiaries of the subsidy. Why should we tax all the American people—tax the farmers, the merchants, the lawyers, the doctors, and the rest of the American people—to pay the owners of these great lines running between New York and London and between New York and Bremen this enormous subsidy? Mr. President, others may take such course as they desire, but I am not going to give my consent to spending of the people's money for any such purpose.

The bill next proposes to devote practically all the proceeds from the sale of our entire merchant marine to constitute a revolving fund to be loaned to favored shipping interests at a very low rate of interest in order to build more ships in the future. If the bill passes, the American Government will never see another dollar of the enormous amount that is now invested in the American merchant marine. I doubt very much whether the fleet that cost the American Government over $3,000,000,000 could be sold for enough to create the $125,000,000 revolving fund that is to be loaned to the shipping interests in the future, as provided in the bill, after all expenses are paid. I doubt it very seriously. I would not be at all surprised, when it comes to a show-down, that after selling the ships, if we establish the revolving fund, we will have to make additions to it through appropriations by taxation upon the American people. Is there any excuse for it? It is absolutely inexcusable.

I next come to some of the vices in the bill. I think the chief vice in the bill is the cash subsidy. Why should we tax a portion of the American people for the benefit of the favored few? What justification can we find for it? What reason can be given for it? In my judgment it is bad in principle and worse in policy, because it will not do what is claimed for it.

I next call attention to the fact that this of all times is not the time to sell ships. The idea of dismantling, as the chairman of the Shipping Board suggests, one-half of the tonnage at this time is wrong. It is said that the ships are not exactly what they ought to be. They do not exactly suit the trade. Besides, if the Government sells half and keeps half, it might sell the other half to other shipowners in the future when the shipping business would get better and take away the profits that the favored few would otherwise receive. Is not that a remarkable proposition? I hope Senators who happen to be listening to me will get the full force of it. Here we have 10,000,000 tons of shipping, depending on how we count them, whether dead-weight tons or other tons. The Shipping Board proposes to sell one half of it and dismantle the other half. The fleet cost this Government over $3,000,000,000, and yet they are going to dismantle one-half so that we might now have too many ships for the favored interests to whom we are going to give the subsidy. Is that the principle? Any Senator who wants to uphold that proposition of course is at liberty to do so, but as for me I shall not vote for any such bill.

Mr. President, I next come to some of the good provisions in the bill, for it is not wholly bad. There are some good provisions in it. The provision providing cheaper insurance is a good one. British ships are insured at a slightly less rate than American rates. The American Government ought to see to it that we are put upon equality with Great Britain in the matter of insurance. A bill has already been passed along that line.

This bill contains provisions proposing to amend the present marine insurance law. I think those are excellent provisions; they are in the future interest of our shipping; I not only have no objection to them, but I think they ought to be enacted into law; and I have no doubt they will be enacted into law.

The next provision proposes that 50 per cent of immigrants coming to this country shall be brought here in American ships. That is a splendid provision. It might be made much better by providing that 100 per cent of the immigrants who come here from abroad, who come here as a privilege which is given to them by us, should be brought in American vessels. They ought to be examined before they reach here; and they ought to be brought here entirely in American vessels. Instead of 50 per cent of them being so brought, I should be in favor of bringing in American vessels all of the immigrants who come into this country. It would give our ships business to which our ships are entitled.

There are other reasons why immigrants ought to be brought here in American ships. Our officers and agents should examine them before they come to this country. As we all know, foreign ships now bring immigrants to Ellis Island in great numbers; great numbers are frequently turned back, and the American Government has to pay the foreign ships for taking them back. Why are they sent back? Because they have not been properly examined before they arrive here. Mr. President, why would it not be good business, and why would it not be a protection to the American people to have these examinations made by our own officers and agents before the immigrants leave the shores of Europe? We would save millions of dollars a year by pursuing that policy. By the way, it is estimated that if one-half of the immigrants who come to this country each year even under the present law were brought in our ships they would yield a revenue to them of something like $8,000,000. There is no reason why that can not be done.

I am very much in favor of that, because it would be giving not a subsidy to our shipping interests but it would be giving passengers to our ships, furnishing them with business. Our ships do not need, the ships of no nation need, subsidies. What they need is passengers and cargoes. Any ship that has passengers and cargoes does not need a bounty from the Government in order to run.

I will give an illustration of that. A large fleet of ships is owned by the Standard Oil Co., another large fleet of ships is owned by the United Fruit Co., another large fleet of American ships is owned by the United States Steel Co. Those ships do not need a subsidy, for they have business; they carry cargoes and they are making money. The only way we are ever going to build up a merchant marine is, so far as we can by law and by custom, to give our ships passengers and cargoes, to give them business. When we give them business, give them passengers and cargoes, they will need no cash subsidy from the Government. The granting of subsidies is wrong in principle and wrong in policy.

So I say, Mr. President, that this provision of the bill in reference to 50 per cent of immigrants coming to America being brought in American vessels, even though it does not go so far as I think it ought to go—for instead of providing that 50 per cent of those immigrants should be brought here in American ships the provision should be that all immigrants who come to this country should be brought in American vessels—is a good provision. We have a perfect right so to provide. It would not be a discrimination against foreign nations to have such a provision in our law, and I heartily join the Senator from Washington in the proposal which is contained in the pending bill.

I next come, Mr. President, to the provision of the bill which takes over the Army transport service. Of course that service ought to be under the Shipping Board. Such a transfer will mean additional cargoes for our ships; it will help build up business for the American merchant marine. That is a good provision, and I am heartily in favor of it. I am for any provision in the bill which will give to our merchant marine more business, more cargoes. Such provisions ought to be adopted. They ought not, however, to be connected with provisions of the bill for cash bounties and subsidies to a favored few.

I next come to the provision of the bill in reference to coordination between rail and water transportation. Of course that should be enacted. There is but one objection to it, and that is it is not strong enough. We ought to see to it that our railroads, instead of making contracts with foreign shipowners to transport across the water in foreign vessels freights which are carried to our seaboard, shall make contracts with American shipowners to carry those cargoes, when they are delivered at the seaboard, in American bottoms. That, of course, is a good provision. I am afraid that the proposed provision in the bill is not a workable one, but it ought to be made workable. We ought to make our shipping companies and our railroad transportation companies coordinate; we ought to make each of them useful to the other. We ought to see to it that our railroads are not permitted to make contracts with foreign shipowners for the carriage of freight across the ocean in foreign vessels to the detriment of American shipping. I am sorry the Senator from Washington has not made that provision stronger, but I indorse it so far as it goes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I may say that if there is any provision in the pending bill which originated with me it is the provision with reference to the coordination of rail and water transportation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to congratulate the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the provision does not go nearly so far as I desired that it should go.

Mr. McKELLAR. I again congratulate the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he is in favor of bringing about and enforcing, if possible, coordination between the railroads and the water lines; and I hope that we shall be able to amend the bill so that when it is passed it will have a stronger provision in it along that line. We ought to compel coordination between the railroads and the shipping lines.

I am not going to state here why the provision is not stronger; I may do so before we get through; but I will be glad to state to the Senator himself why it is not stronger. It is not the fault of the Shipping Board, however; I will say that much.

Mr. McKELLAR. I feel sure that there is no disagreement between the Senator from Washington and myself on that subject. Knowing the Senator as I do, and knowing what a great friend he is of the merchant marine of the United States, I know that if it were left to him to determine the kind of a bill that would most effectively build up and maintain the American merchant marine he would be for making that policy stronger. We would find him working for it at all times under any administration; and he would not be for the cash subsidy now if it had not been inflicted upon him by outsiders.

Mr. President, the Senator says that, so far as we may be able to do so, we ought to make the railroad carriers and the ocean carriers coordinate. We have absolute authority under the Constitution to do that; there can not be any question of the power of Congress over foreign and domestic commerce, and I have no doubt that all it is necessary to do is for a workable plan to be submitted to Congress, and then this matter can be handled in such a way as to make our merchant marine infinitely prosperous if it were adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me, I do not want to be understood as implying that we do not have the constitutional power to take such action. I think we have, and I believe that we could, merely by changing a word or two, make this provision much stronger than it now is and much more along the line the Senator and I both want.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure that in a subsequent session, when we have more time to perfect this bill, the Senator and I and others who are interested in building up the American merchant marine will perfect it in such a way as to give our ships cargoes and make those who own the ships and operate them prosperous, as they should be.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the next proposition, namely, the transportation on American vessels of the agents and representatives of the United States who travel abroad. It is a very remarkable thing that, despite all the ships the United States has, it is necessary to pass a law to require the agents and representatives of the American people who are compelled to go abroad to travel in American ships. Yet that is what we have got to do. It is provided for in this bill, and it is a very proper provision. I am heartily in favor of it. The Senator from Washington will remember that to every appropriation bill, I believe, considered during the present session—I do not know whether they were finally adopted in conference—I have sought to have attached amendments providing that our representatives who are compelled to go abroad shall sail on American vessels wherever that is possible. Under present conditions the Government pays millions of dollars to foreign ships for the transportation of our representatives to all parts of the world. Mr. President, Americans ought to have more patriotism, more love of country, than to be willing to sail at Government expense on foreign ships when there are good American ships to carry them; and yet we have got to enact into law a a provision forcing them to travel on American ships.

I recall a short time ago that our great ambassador to London when he was sent for to come home on a matter of business crossed the ocean to this country and returned to England, as I recall, on a British ship; an American ship was not good enough for him. I have not looked to ascertain, and I do not know whether it was finally adopted in conference or not, but on the diplomatic and consular appropriation I secured the adoption of an amendment requiring representatives of the State Department, great and small, to travel on American ships if they travel at Government expense. I hope that amendment was left in the bill. If so, our American ambassador to London and other ambassadors, representatives, and agents, high and low, will all have to travel upon American ships. That is as it ought to be. The amounts paid out by the Government for such purposes run into the millions of dollars a year, and our ships should receive the benefit of that expenditure. Of course, the provision in the bill on that subject is a good provision; I indorse it strongly; and if it were not for the cash subsidy that is provided for in the bill, the remainder of the bill, bad as some parts of it are, would have my approval beyond the shadow of a doubt.

I next come to the provision requiring the transportation of Government supplies on American vessels. Mr. President, it is a remarkable thing that Government supplies are shipped on foreign vessels and not in American vessels. We have nearly a thousand good steel vessels laid up all along the Atlantic seaboard and some on the Pacific coast; many of them are tied up at Jamaica Bay, near New York; others are tied up in the Delaware River and the Chesapeake Bay and in the James River—they are tied up by the hundreds—and yet the American Government is taxing the American people to pay for the transportation of Government supplies to various parts of the world in foreign vessels. I heartily indorse the provision of the bill on this subject.

I also indorse the provision in regard to tonnage dues. I think that is entirely proper.

Mr. President, I have pointed out, as well as I could, some of the faults and defects of the pending bill, and also some of the good provisions of the bill. I have offered a substitute, as the Senator from Washington knows, for the pending bill. By the way, I wish to digress long enough to say that the Washington Post states that no alternative proposal has been submitted for the ship subsidy bill. I am sorry that the Post has not looked into my substitute, which I think is a most excellent one, and I have no doubt that in the next session of Congress I will find that my distinguished friend from Washington will be actively aiding and supporting me in the adoption of some such measure. I do not mean to say the exact measure as proposed in my substitute, but something along similar lines.

I wish to explain exactly what my substitute proposes. It suggests several changes. My proposed substitute accepts all the good provisions of the pending bill to which I have just referred; they are all incorporated bodily, just as they appear in the bill advocated by the Senator from Washington. I do not even propose to change the transportation features, because I thought those provisions really ought to go to a committee and be improved in the way that the Senator has pointed out; but there are two essential differences between my proposal and the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. President, it is one of the most remarkable things in all American history that the only war which we did not win entirely and absolutely was the War of 1812. That was the war in which our Capitol was burned. Great Britain had the advantage. It will be recalled that we went to war because of the impressment of our seamen and the insistence upon the right of search of our vessels. It is remarkable that in the treaty of peace concluded after that war was over not a word was said about the two principal things for which we went to war. England merely granted us a respite or a cessation of hostilities, without making any agreement virtually that bound her, except what I shall relate in a few moments. Students of history will recall that all that saved us in that war was the brilliant and wonderful victory of Andrew Jackson over the British at New Orleans on January 8, 1815. That victory was won after the war had closed, but General Jackson had not been informed that a treaty of peace had been signed, communication in those days being very slow, and, therefore, not knowing that the fighting was over, he won one of the most brilliant victories of our history.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does not the Senator think that the reason this war is not over right now is that Senators on the other side have not heard of it as yet?

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean the subsidy war?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may be right about that. I read editorials a little while ago in which it was stated that this was a Democratic filibuster entirely. The Senator happens to be a Republican from the good State of Iowa, and I have been informed that not only the Senator from Iowa but quite a number of other Republicans were just as determined, if not a little more determined, that this bill should not pass at this session than any of us Democrats. Am I correct about that? I do not want to mislead anybody.

Mr. BROOKHART. I can assure the Senator that he is absolutely correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for that assurance.

Mr. President, I have been diverted for a moment. I want to say that it may be wondered why I am referring to the war of 1812 in this way in an argument on the ship subsidy bill. I will tell Senators why. A treaty of peace with Great Britain was eagerly sought by our representatives, and signed in 1815 under the circumstances that I have mentioned, Great Britain assuming that she was the victor, and our representatives virtually assuming that we were the vanquished. What was the result? The result was that we entered into a commercial treaty under which American rights were sacrificed in a marvelous way. Why, in large portions of the British Empire our merchant ships were not allowed to go into the harbors, save for water. They could not trade with the people; they could not obtain cargoes in the harbors along the Indian Ocean or the South African waters or the African waters at all, or even in the Mediterranean Sea. We gave up the right even to trade with those British Provinces; and what was the result?

You would have thought that that treaty would have been annulled by our Government long ago; and yet the remarkable situation exists to-day that that treaty, made in 1815, is still the law of the land, an existing treaty between this country and Great Britain; and recently—I do not know whether it has been changed lately or not—our ships went to Egypt, for instance, loaded with American goods for Egypt, and they had to get sand from the desert of Sahara for ballast to bring the ships back, and you gentlemen recently put a tariff tax on that ballast. Great Britain, by order in council, did not permit the Egyptians to send back their goods in American ships, but they had to come here in British ships, under the provisions of that treaty of more than a hundred years ago. So it is with other colonies, and so it is that these discriminations against our shipping have been practiced. There are other treaties of like kind.

Congress in 1920 passed a bill, under the leadership of the present chairman of this committee, my distinguished friend from Washington [Mr. JONES], which authorized and directed the President of the United States to annul and abrogate that treaty thus discriminating against American rights. President Wilson, who was President at the time, declined to do it, on the ground, I understand, that it was an invasion of the Executive prerogative, and later on President Harding took the same position.

Mr. President, with those treaties in the way we are not in a position to build up our American merchant marine. Those treaties ought to be abrogated. It has been held that the Congress has a perfect right under the Constitution to annul and abrogate commercial treaties of this kind. I call the attention of the present Presiding Officer [Mr. ROBINSON in the chair] to the fact that I believe in 1912, when he and I were Members of the House, Congress passed a bill or a joint resolution abrogating the treaty of 1832, made with Russia, for reasons which were set out at that time. There is no doubt about the power of Congress to abrogate these treaties. There are 26 of them in all. Our Executives have refused to do it, and I am not blaming anybody. They may have been within their rights, but Congress will also be within its rights if those treaties are annulled, as they ought to be. This Government of ours, in building up a merchant marine, ought not to permit any Government to discriminate against the American Government in the matter of its trade and commerce abroad. There ought not to be any discrimination, and yet under these old treaties it is provided that discriminations can be made, and they are made every day.

Mr. President, I submit in the substitute I have offered, in sections 13 and 14, provisions annulling and abrogating and declaring at an end these treaties that militate against the success of our merchant marine. They ought to be abrogated. They are not in consonance with the times. They are out of date. They are discriminative against us. They constitute an outrage upon our business and they should be abrogated, and I propose that the Congress shall abrogate them in the way I have mentioned; and that is one of the principal differences between my substitute and the bill as reported by the committee.

The next principal difference, Mr. President, is a corollary to that provision. I now read it. It is very short:

"SEC. 15. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to set aside upon receipt of 5 per cent of the amount of all custom duties paid under law in force at the time of the enactment of this act or under laws subsequently enacted on all goods, wares, and merchandise imported in ships of the United States, and to pay out the same to the importers of goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be imported in such vessels of the United States, said sums to be paid in proportion to the duty collected on the goods thus imported by each importer: Provided, That these payments shall not be made prior to a day 15 months after the passage of this act, at which time the treaties mentioned in sections 13 and 14 of this act shall have been abrogated and annulled by this act, unless it shall be determined finally by the courts that this section is not affected by said treaties: Provided further, That no such sums shall be paid to any importer who imports any goods now on the free list, or which may hereafter by law be put upon the free list, in vessels other than in those of the United States, and the Shipping Board shall establish rules and regulations by which the fact of importation of goods on the free list shall be determined: And provided further, That persons traveling and returning to the United States bringing goods, wares, or merchandise with them, shall likewise be entitled to 5 per cent of the duties paid by them: And provided further, That this section shall not apply to importers transporting their own products in their own vessels."

Mr. President, I want to say in reference to this provision that in my judgment it is infinitely better than the cash-subsidy provision of the pending bill. In so far as we Democrats are concerned, of course it should meet the approval of every one of us, for the reason that it reduces the present high tariff horizontally 5 per cent on all goods brought in American bottoms. No advocate of a low tariff could possibly object to this provision. It saves the 5 per cent, not to any favored interest but to the merchants who import the goods. It allows those persons to sell to the American people those goods thus brought in American bottoms cheaper than those merchants who bring in their goods in foreign bottoms. It gives an advantage to those patriotic Americans who help to build up American shipping, and they ought to have the advantage.

Mr. President, let us see what else it does. A provision like that will mean that the American merchant marine will get cargoes. That is the purpose of it—to get cargoes. Any importer of foreign goods into this country will, of course, take advantage of the law to obtain a 5 per cent reduction in tariff duties by bringing in those goods in American vessels. What will that mean? That will mean business for our American merchant marine. That will mean cargoes for our American merchant marine. That will mean the true building up of our merchant marine. It is not a gift to them. You do not give them a thing. You merely furnish to them cargoes for their ships. I say to the Senator from Washington, in whom I have the greatest confidence, that in my humble judgment a 5 per cent differential on goods brought in in American bottoms will do the American merchant marine a thousandfold more good than three times the subsidy provided in this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I recognize the importance of having cargoes for American ships, and, of course, that was the primary object of the discriminating-duty provision; but, while I may not understand it, as I understand the Senator's provision he sets aside in the Treasury 5 per cent of the duties collected upon imported goods, and then he takes that money and pays it to the importer as a subsidy for bringing those goods into this country in American ships. I can not see the difference in principle between that and what we provide. It is a different application, but I do not see that it is a different principle.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is quite the contrary. I do not recall the history of the Senator on the tariff bill. I believe that he is a high-tariff man; but take those of us who believe in a lower tariff than we have. There is not one of us who would not vote for a horizontal reduction of 5 per cent on the present high-tariff duties. It would mean cheaper goods for the American people. I would vote for that whether it provided cargoes for our American merchant marine or not. I would vote for just the bald proposition, and not only vote for it but work for it and support it, because it is in consonance with what I believe about the tariff. I think the present tariff rates are too high. I would vote for a horizontal reduction of the tariff of 5 per cent with nothing else, and even more, perhaps; but when we can couple with that the bringing to our American merchant marine of an enormous amount of business which will make them prosperous, it seems to me that it should meet the approval of practically every one, and it is no form of a subsidy, no form of a bounty. It can not be construed into a bounty. Why? These importers are the ones that pay the tax. It is a lessening by 5 per cent of the taxes now levied upon importers of goods. It can not be said that it is a bounty to them. It is not at all. It is a reduction of tax, and a reduction of tax in such a way that it will force into American bottoms an enormous quantity of goods.

This is no new item. It has been suggested in the past quite frequently. It was enacted, in substance, in a law that was passed by the Congress in 1913, known as the Underwood-Simmons bill, and in that bill there is a provision for a differential of 5 per cent on goods brought in American bottoms, and, as I recall, some court held that it was unconstitutional; but, at any rate, it never has been enforced. The Senator will recall, from the history of our merchant marine, that for nearly a half century after the formation of our Government a differential duty was placed upon goods brought in American bottoms, and our merchant marine before the war was largely built up by this differential duty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I remember about that. I remember that I made a speech in behalf of this provision in the Underwood tariff law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to know that. The Senator and I are not very apart on this merchant-marine business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is one of the best speeches I ever made, and I hope the Senator will read it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will. I am going to read some more of the speeches of the Senator in a little while—part of that 14-hour speech of his.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That will be fine. My point, however, was this: I do not think there will be much controversy between the Senator and me on the principle, except that it seemed to me that the Senator has the provision framed contrary to what he has been arguing with reference to the principle of the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I may be wrong about it, but the Senator takes this money and puts it into the Treasury. It is not remitted as a diminution in the tariff, but he takes the money and puts it into the Treasury, and then out of that fund he pays a certain sum to the importer for bringing goods into this country in American ships. It looks to me as though that is a subsidy. I may be wrong about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will discuss that in a minute. I yield to the Senator from Iowa just now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I may be in full accord with the Senator as far as that is concerned——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the Senator will be.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Because I am for subsidies when necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to yield to me only for the purpose of making two reports from the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent, out of order, to submit two reports from the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I am not to be taken off my feet.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I know there are others who feel that there ought to be an objection, so I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Objection is made?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield now to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want the Senator to be uneasy. I will notify him before I propose to invoke the rule.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator need not worry about that. All I ask is just a reasonable compliance with the rule. I will not invoke it except when I think it is being violated to consume time or parcel out time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am undertaking in my feeble way to discuss the provisions of this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator has done it.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I have no desire to do otherwise.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word about the provision which the Senator and I have been talking about.

The Senator will recall the inhibition in our Constitution against the Senate initiating revenue legislation; and therefore in the Senate an amendment could not be offered providing for a differential in tariff rates such as the Senator has suggested. That was one consideration in the preparation of this provision in section 15.

Another consideration was that such a differential in tariff duties might be in legal parlance a discrimination. Foreign nations under treaties might be in a position to object to a differential which might discriminate in the matter of bringing goods in American vessels. But no foreign nation can object to our appropriating money for any purpose we see fit. Therefore, if precisely the same result could be accomplished as a differential by directing the 5 per cent to be set aside and paid out, it avoids that difficulty which might otherwise be brought up.

But there is even another consideration to which I will call the Senator's attention, and ask his usual thoughtful consideration of it. A differential such as the Senator from Washington suggested awhile ago in tariff duties would affect only dutiable goods. It would not affect goods on the free list at all. The Senator will see that point. More than half of our goods are now on the free list.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It would be very easy for us to provide that goods otherwise on the free list, if brought in foreign ships, should pay a slight duty.

Mr. McKELLAR. That could be provided, but from our Democratic standpoint I would not want to vote for any such provision as that. Of course, the Senator would have no objection to it, but I would. I do not want a tariff put on any more articles than are now on the dutiable list. But the provision that I propose eliminates that consideration in that there is a proviso that if any importer brings any goods on the free list in ships other than American bottoms, the 5 per cent is not paid. So he is obliged to bring his free goods in the same as his dutiable goods in order to get the 5 per cent on the dutiable goods. I think when the Senator comes to consider that provision he will come to the same conclusion that I have reached, that it would be a reduction of the burden of taxation upon the American consumer by a horizontal reduction of the tariff to the extent of 5 per cent, that it would furnish cargoes of dutiable goods for our merchant marine, and it would at the same time furnish cargoes of free goods, goods on the free list, for our merchant marine.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if it is not true that people well informed on the whole subject have been favoring for a great many years the principle of discriminating duties as a sound principle upon which to build a merchant marine? That is an old policy approved by people who have made a study of the subject, and it was in force at one time and produced great results in building up a merchant marine. Even good, strong Republicans and good, strong protectionists like the American Economist, for instance, advocate to-day that same principle as against the subsidy. If that is true, why should we not resort to a method of that kind rather than the method of paying money out of the Treasury?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from Florida that not only is he correct, but I believe it was in 1789, the first year of our Government under our new Constitution, that a bill was passed which provided for a discriminating duty on goods brought in American vessels, and that has been done continuously. It was an American policy continuously up until the treaty of 1815. Great Britain never accepted the provisions of our commercial treaty putting it in full force and effect until 1848 or 1873, and it was that time that marked the beginning of the decline of American shipping. We built up a splendid merchant marine long before the Civil War by reason of discriminating duties which brought cargoes to our fleet. That is what we need now. I want to impress again upon the Senate that the purpose of the provision is to gain cargoes for American ships so that they may prosper. No one is more in favor of building up the merchant marine than I am.

I come to the next principal provision and, of course, instead of the Senator from Washington agreeing with me about this one, he will disagree very firmly, I have no doubt. I come to one of the principal differences between my substitute and the committee bill. Section 17 of my substitute reads as follows:

"SEC. 17. It is hereby declared the policy of the Congress that all the ships now owned by the Government under the direction of the Shipping Board shall be operated for a period of 10 years, either directly by the Shipping Board or by leasing to independent operators under such terms as the board shall prescribe, to the end that the American merchant marine may be established upon a firm and enduring foundation, provided that no ship shall be leased at a loss to the Government.

"And the Shipping Board is hereby directed to establish trade routes and trade connections as rapidly as possible and wherever in its judgment paying routes can be maintained and to utilize every ship that it can utilize without loss to the Government. The Shipping Board is further directed to make a list of such ships as it does not believe can be profitably utilized by the Government or its lessees and make its recommendation in reference to the disposition thereof to the Congress at its December, 1923, session, giving full data as to each ship recommended to be sold to others than American citizens."

Mr. President, at this point I am going to digress and the reason why I digress is because I want to read to the Senate a very excellent defense of the filibuster delivered by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who I see is now in the Chamber, and who was not in the Chamber when I reached that point a while ago. I did not want to refer to it when he was absent. As he is now here I want to read what he said in 1915 on the subject of the filibuster. I doubt if he is like some of our other friends who have changed on the proposition; I expect that he holds to the same view now; and, therefore, I am going to digress long enough to quote what he said at that time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. Presdient, I very well remember what I said, and my views are not changed in the least degree.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very glad to know it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator will not look upon me as discourteous if I do not remain to hear read what I so well remember.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I shall not; but I will just read it for a moment. I think it will interest the Senate, in view of the present condition with reference to the pending bill.

On February 16, 1915, the Senator said:

"Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I was just observing, there is room for a very wide difference of opinion with regard to the propriety or wisdom of imposing a cloture upon the deliberations or debates of the Senate.

"I have given due heed, I think, to the arguments for and against the limitation of debate, and without entering into the reasons which have influenced me, I desire to say that in my opinion the weight of the argument is in favor of a limitation of debate in the Senate. When I say that I am not to be understood as saying that I believe the majority of the Senate should at any time have the power to absolutely foreclose further debate, but I do think that a proportion of the Senate—I have not reached a definite conclusion upon that point, whether it should be a majority or whether two-thirds of the Senate—ought to have the power to put into effect a rule which will automatically close debate after a reasonable time, after every Senator has had an opportunity to reasonably discuss the question before the body."

That is a prelude to the part to which I wish to call particular attention:

"There are, however, two conditions which ought to be excluded from the operation of any such rule. There are two conditions against which a filibuster, so called, is not only justified but, I think, imperatively demanded. Whenever the Chief Executive of the country attempts to impose his will upon the Senate, and thus to preclude or prevent that fair and open mind to which all discussion ought to be directed, when Senators do not feel that they are at liberty to vote upon a particular measure in any way which their judgment and their conscience direct them to vote, then a rebellion in the form of a filibuster is not only justified but, I think, it is absolutely required if we would preserve the freedom and the dignity of the Senate of the United States. I recognize, however, that there is no practicable way in which the existence of that fact or that condition can be shown. I do not know of any method through which proof could be offered of that fact. Therefore I pass it without further consideration.

"But there is another condition, Mr. President, which justifies a political minority in prolonging debate to the uttermost limit of their strength. That condition is a caucus held by Senators which, under a rule adopted by some political organization, binds or attempts to bind all Senators belonging to that political organization to vote in a particular manner."

Those two propositions, I think, can not be gainsaid by anyone. I have read them in order to show——

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with that, every word of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was quite sure the Senator would. The reason why I quote that at this time is because of the commanding place and influence of the Senator in this body. He is respected by every one here. He was chosen by this body as its President pro tempore to preside when the Vice President is absent. We have all learned to know the careful consideration that he gives to all questions that come before him. We all know of his fairness and of his desire to do the right and square thing. So, when I quote him, I feel that it is a very high authority to which other Senators should give very great heed.

Mr. CUMMINS. It depends on each man's conscience.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. Now, here is a bill which comes virtually from the Executive. The ship subsidy issue was an issue in every campaign last fall. It was decided adversely to the President. The Members of Congress elected and to take their seats in the next Congress would never pass the ship subsidy bill. The only way the ship subsidy bill could possibly be passed would be to bring it to a vote at this session of Congress, where men who were defeated would take part in the vote and help to form a majority for the passage of the bill. It has been repudiated by the people. The new Congress will not pass it.

Yet the Executive undertakes, by a message delivered before the Congress, to impose his will, to impose his views upon the Congress of the United States. Those of us who regard the ship subsidy bill as having been repudiated by the American people believe that for some reason—probably some reason that seems to the President entirely right and sufficient—he desires to impose his will upon the Senate of the United States. And, under the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Iowa, of course every Senator who thus believes has a duty to employ every means to defeat the bill in the present Congress.

Again, under the statement made awhile ago by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that the bill was submitted first to certain organizations and then afterwards to a caucus of the Republican members of the Senate Committee on Commerce and later to the members of the House committee having the bill in charge there, and they in their caucus undertook to impose upon the Congress of the United States their will, then, under the definition of the Senator from Iowa, not only is it our right but it is our duty—those who do not believe that the bill should be foisted upon us by a secret caucus—to oppose the measure to the limit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly if the Senator from Iowa had conceived it possible that the President would undertake to force his will upon the Congress after a measure had been repudiated by the people, he would have included this particular situation in his opinion of a filibuster. The present situation is even a little stronger than that which he described so well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it is very much stronger. I thank the Senator for the interruption. It is very much stronger, because it indicates that then there was no mandate from the people. It had not been submitted to the people previously, but here the very question was submitted to the people of the United States, and they decided adversely; and, nothwithstanding their adverse decision, the President of the United States, simply because eight of the Senators hold only until the 4th of March, undertakes to foist the bill upon the American people which they have repudiated, to jam it through the Congress, to use the excellent expression of the Washington Post, notwithstanding the decision of the American people.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think that if the Senator from Iowa would really express himself on the proposition at this time—and I see him sitting before me now—he would agree with the view just expressed by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have such great respect for the Senator from Iowa that I would not feel like inviting him to do so unless he felt like doing it of his own accord.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator wishes to interrogate me regarding anything, I am perfectly willing to be interrogated.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I said, I feel that that would hardly be proper. If the Senator from Mississippi desires to do so I have no objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. I, of course, can understand the humor of the Senator from Mississippi, but I felt quite sure that the Senator from Tennessee did not feel quite that way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I do not. I would not feel like interrogating the Senator from Iowa unless he desired voluntarily to submit to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the Senator from Iowa exactly caught the purport of the interruption. The Senator from Tennessee had just paid a very great eulogy, and very properly so, to the great ability of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Which I do not deserve, but which I appreciate very much.

Mr. HARRISON. And he had quoted at length from a speech which the Senator had made contending that when the will of the people was being thwarted the minority had a right to go to any extent, even almost to rebellion, I believe, if I recall the words correctly, in preventing a cruel and unjust act; and the Senator quoted conditions that would warrant such a procedure. The Senator from Tennessee then said that the present situation was even stronger, because there were 7 or 8 so-called "lame ducks" who were being used in order to force through by a very narrow margin this piece of proposed legislation; that it was done after the people had spoken in an election; and that if the Senator from Iowa would now express himself, perhaps, he would add that condition in addition to other conditions which he imposed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am quite content with the statement I made from which the Senator from Tennessee read. I am a law-abiding man, and so long as the Constitution of the United States permits Senators who may have been defeated for reelection to act as Members of this body, I do not believe in putting any limitation upon their action. That would not be in accord with our institutions.

I am in favor of changing the Constitution, and have been so for many years—I have made some effort in that direction in the past—so that no Congress shall convene save the Congress which has been last elected by the people. I do not believe it is wise to permit one year practically to intervene between the election of a Congress and the time when that Congress shall begin to function. I suppose I feel about that just as the Senator from Mississippi does; but, so long as we are operating under our Constitution, it is idle to speak of limiting in any respect the votes or the scope of the votes of the existing Members of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that I agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa that we not only have no legal right but that we have no moral right, in my judgment, in any way to deprive of any right Senators whose terms of office run only until the 4th of March, 1923. They have just as many rights as other Senators have, and I would not attempt to take them away from them. Of course, I again agree with the Senator from Iowa when he says that the Constitution ought to be changed so that after the election, or as shortly after the election as may be reasonable and proper, the new Congress may assemble before any business is transacted after the election; in other words, that after the election is held in November there shall be no session of Congress until the new Congress comes in.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with that.

Mr. McKELLAR. We nearly all voted for the constitutional amendment having that object in view just a few days ago, and it is now in the House of Representatives. A very large majority of Senators voted for the amendment on both sides of the Chamber, and I think it commends itself not only to the Congress but to the American people, and it is right.

If there were no other reason for refusal to pass this bill than the fact that Senators who have been elected to the Senate and whose terms have not yet expired might vote on it, of course, there would be nothing in the contention; but here is a bill that comes to us outlawed, so to speak, by the American people, and which many of us believe is wrong both in policy and in principle, but which the Executive asks shall be passed by us. Then, I think under the rule which has been laid down by the Senator from Iowa, which I have just read, that that is an Executive interference that requires those of us who believe that the bill should not pass to prevent its passage in any way that it is honorable and right so to do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, I desire to say that I have expressed myself a great many times on this floor with regard to Executive interference, and I have not changed my mind about that. The Constitution gives to the President of the United States the right to advise Congress of his views and to make his recommendations concerning public affairs. No one can criticize or no one can complain of the President for doing that thing. So far as any other interference is concerned, I abhor it just as much as the Senator from Tennessee possibly can. Every man knows—that is, he can define in his own mind, although he may not be able to put it accurately in words—the influence which an Executive should exercise upon Congress. I have no reason to believe that the present Executive has gone beyond his constitutional privilege, his constitutional duty, if I may put it in that way. If he has done so, whoever knows it ought to disclose it.

I am rather intimate with the President of the United States in a social way; I value his friendship; I think he is a strong, good man; but he has never indicated to me his views in reference to—indeed, we have never even discussed—the so-called shipping bill. I think the notion that he is attempting in any improper way to influence the Members of Congress with regard to this proposed legislation is a misapprehension; that it is founded upon an error. Does the Senator from Tennessee know of any instance in which the President has made such an attempt?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am very glad to say to the Senator that there can be no question that the President had the constitutional right to make any address and recommendation to Congress that he saw fit to make in reference to this matter, but I doubt his right and the wisdom of it to insist, as the public prints say that he does insist, that this bill which he has recommended shall be voted on in a Congress, that is a kind of left-over Congress, after the American people have decided against the bill. In other words, I am not questioning the high motives of the President, but I am merely questioning his having taken such action and the wisdom of his action. It would be entirely proper for him, it seems to me, to make that recommendation to the new Congress that is to come in, but it seems to me it is just a little out of place for him to insist that the bill should only be acted upon by a Congress such a large part of which has been repudiated.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is in favor of amending the Constitution so that there shall be no intervening session of Congress between the election and the time when the new Representatives and Senators shall take their seats?

Mr. McKELLAR. We all feel that way about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that were the law, if that were the Constitution, I agree entirely with the Senator from Tennessee, but that is not the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I said very frankly to the Senator that I believed a Senator has the constitutional right to act until his term expires.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senators and Representatives who are going out of office on the 4th of March have the same right exactly to vote upon a public question that they would have if they had been reelected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I agree to that; there is no difference between us as to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not understand the criticism which has fallen, not upon the President, because I have not heard it expressed in that way, but I heard it said—I think it was proposed in the form of a resolution—that Senators whose terms are about to expire should not vote at all. I think, however, that was speedily withdrawn, because it was recognized that that could not follow. The people elected these Senators for a certain period, and during that period they have a right to exercise all the privileges which attach to the office of a Senator. Ultimately the people will have their way and will send Senators and Representatives who, broadly speaking, represent their views. I think the Senator from Tennessee places undue emphasis upon the fact that some Senators are going out of Congress on the 4th of March, and that we, the Republican side of the Chamber, should not therefore press this legislation because they are going out.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator from Iowa, if he would give consideration to another feature of the question that we have not discussed as yet, would virtually have the same view that I have. If this were merely ordinary legislation the Senator would be correct about it, of course, but this is extraordinary legislation. It provides that the Shipping Board may enter into contracts to pay subsidies out of the Treasury of the United States not for the next year, but for a period of some 10 to 15 years, and, therefore, it is binding not only upon the present Congress, but it will be binding upon practically eight Congresses in the future, and it will be binding upon four future Presidents, simply because when this Government makes a contract such as is proposed by this bill, granting subsidies over such a long period of time, the Government is going to live up to that contract; it will be obliged to live up to that contract as an honest Government.

Under those circumstances, at a short session of Congress, without due deliberation, with only one or two speeches on the part of the proponents of the bill—I think only one or two such speeches have been made—we ought not to tie up future Congresses and future Presidents in the way that is proposed by this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. About half the domestic expenses of the Nation, excluding war expenses, are composed of subsidies. We are voting on subsidies all the time. I make no suggestion with regard to my view of this bill, but I can not see any reason for defeating it because it is a subsidy, because we are constantly subsidizing the people of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not in 10 and 15 year contracts. I think this is the only bill of this kind; certainly it is the only bill that I can now recall during the 12 years that I have been in Congress that has sought to bind the Government for anything like such a period of time.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be very unwise; I do not say as to that; but it is a thing that everybody can understand. I have been rather surprised to hear the clamor against subsidies when the United States was subsidizing practically every class of citizens in one form or another. I do not believe that a government can be successfully maintained in these days without subsidies. I think there are people who can not take care of themselves for one reason or another and the Government must subsidize them. I am not saying that the Government ought to subsidize shipping; I am only saying that it is not a remarkable thing that the Government shall pay out money in order to maintain people who can not maintain themselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator if he knows of any other government which is subsidizing its shipping with a cash subsidy?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not going to enter into that question. I have not studied that phase of the situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, no other government has passed a cash subsidy bill for its ships.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator a few moments ago was speaking about the tariff. Is not the tariff a subsidy?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have always maintained it was, and for that reason have voted against every high-tariff bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator voted for the Underwood-Simmons bill, did he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. That was a very different bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Was not that a subsidy?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was a subsidy, but not to such a degree; that is all.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that was a revenue producer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but——

Mr. McKELLAR. Its purpose was to produce revenue and not to afford protection for favored interests.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was in the Senate when the Underwood-Simmons bill was passed, and I think that the debates of that period indicated that most of the Senators believed that the rates in that measure would not have been levied had it not been for the protection they contained. That is my judgment.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is another difference, if the Senator will permit me to make the suggestion, between the tariff and the pending bill. The tariff as a measure raising revenue by reason of the duties on imports is specifically provided for in the Constitution, but I do not think anybody in the world would say that a bill providing for the payment of cash subsidies to ships is provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. When we come to consider whether a proposed subsidy is wise or not, then that is a matter of individual judgment and individual conscience. But to be very much astonished at the word "subsidy" I can not understand, because we grant subsidies all the time and we have to do so all the time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall any such subsidy as is proposed here.

Mr. CUMMINS. A different kind of subsidy, of course, but having really the same end—that is, to take care of people who can not take care of themselves. Did the Senator hear the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] deliver his very eloquent speech this morning?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I heard it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Senator regard the proposal he advocated as a subsidy?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think it would be.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be a very defensible subsidy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not so sure of that; I am rather against all subsidies at all times.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am expressing no opinion about that, but I know that we pay out, excluding the Army and Navy, about half of all the money we appropriate in the form of subsidies.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Iowa seems to think that presidential interference depends upon the degree. He concedes, as we all do, that the President has the constitutional right to make recommendations. He made a recommendation to Congress upon the ship subsidy bill, and it thereupon became a party measure; but I want now to ask the Senator whether the mere matter of recommendation was not exceeded when the President a few weeks ago, in recommending the passage of the debt settlement bill, used language entirely outside of the subject he called Congress together to discuss? He said:

"Knowing there is abundant time for ample debate, I would be recreant to my belief in the urgency of a decision on the merchant marine bill if I did not renew the request that it be brought to a final disposition. I venture the allusion because it has been threatened that the merchant marine act shall not be allowed to come to a vote."

He carried his insistence further when he gave this criticism of the program:

"Mere avoidance by prolonged debate is a mark of impotence on a vitally important public question."

A direct criticism of Congress during the last few months.

"I plead for a decision. If there is a favorable majority, the bill should be enacted."

Not a majority of the people, but a majority now existing in Congress.

"If a majority is opposed, defeat will be decisive. Then if Congress fails in providing the requested alternative measure the Executive branch of the Government may proceed as best it can to end the losses in liquidation and humiliation."

More or less of a threat to Congress that if it did not do the Executive will in this matter humiliation would come to the country by Executive action.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not so understand the President's language. It seems to me very respectful and temperate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me repeat it to the Senator:

"Then if Congress fails in providing the requested alternative measure the Executive branch of the Government may proceed as best it can to end the losses in liquidation and humiliation."

The Executive branch of the Government is going to end the losses in liquidation and humiliation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Congress has already given to the President the power to sell these ships.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is all right.

Mr. CUMMINS. And all that he says there is that if the law is not modified he may conclude that it is his duty to sell the ships as provided by Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not that a threat?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not a threat; no.

Mr. McKELLAR. When it comes from the President of the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were to say what I intended to do under certain circumstances, I would not regard that as a threat. I see no impropriety at all in the language of the President. He has a right to impress upon the Congress his view with respect to the merchant marine law, and I have always thought that he employed very temperate language in conveying his ideas. That is his distinctive style—to speak respectfully.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, listen to this:

"I speak frankly, because the situation demands frankness. I am trying to emphasize a responsibility which can not be met by one branch of the Government alone."

Is not that a statement that the Congress was not meeting its responsibility?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is a statement that it requires Congress and the President to make a law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I submit this sentence to the Senator:

"There is call for congressional expression, not mere avoidance."

Is not that a statement that the Congress is likely to avoid its duty?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a statement that in his opinion Congress ought to proceed with more rapidity in the disposition of this matter. Does the Senator see any impropriety in that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is not an appropriate message. The President had given his views to a former extra session of Congress. The President had come to Congress and given his views specifically on the merchant marine bill, had urged its passage, and had given all the reasons that he gave for it in this last message. There was no reason for his repeating them. The Congress knew exactly what his views were; and it appears to me that it is in substance a threat to get rid of our entire merchant marine unless they pass the bill providing a cash subsidy; and I say that with all respect to the President, whom I esteem very highly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it lies within our consistency, anyhow, to criticize a man for saying something twice. There is a good deal of repetition in the Senate, and no one can conduct an argument without it.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it is not saying something twice to make a formal effort under his constitutional prerogative to emphasize the same thing, and not only to emphasize it but, as it appears to me, to be threatening in his words.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, he believes in it——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure he does.

Mr. CUMMINS. And he is repeating his belief, I suppose, as often as he gets an opportunity to do it; but there is nothing wrong about that. The wrong would come only when he attempted in some improper way—not publicly, not while performing his constitutional duty—to influence Members of Congress with regard to their votes.

So far as I am concerned, I like to see a man who believes in a proposal just as outspoken in that belief as it is possible to be. That is one of the admirable things about the President of the United States. He does not conceal his beliefs, and he thinks that it is his duty under the Constitution to express what he believes the legislation on this subject should be; and, so far as the threat to dispose of the ships if the bill does not pass is concerned, what would the Senator from Tennessee do?

Mr. McKELLAR. With the ships?

Mr. CUMMINS. With the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, if I had charge of them I would have the Shipping Board operate them for the benefit of the American people. This is what they ought to have been doing all the time. I would not tie them up; certainly no more of them than was necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. No matter what it cost to operate them?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would proceed with them under the law, under the powers that I now have, and I would operate them for the benefit of all the American people, without giving subsidies to any of them, or asking Congress to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. The operation is optional with the President. He does not have to operate the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but I would take that option if I were in his place. I would not undertake to put them in private hands for a song, as is attempted to be done here. I would operate those ships for the benefit of all the people, and not ask for authority to turn them over to the hands of a few people, and then give those few people a subsidy to operate them. The Senator asks me what I would do, and I tell him very frankly what I would do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator would operate them no matter at what cost, I suppose? I do not believe the President of the United States has the moral authority, anyhow, to operate these ships and levy $50,000,000 a year upon the people of the country toward their operation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe if they were properly and economically operated by a Shipping Board that knew its business, instead of losing $50,000,000 a year the Shipping Board would be making $50,000,000 a year in the operation of those ships.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know as to that. I am not able to answer that. I am not an expert in shipping.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not, either; but the Senator asked me what I believed, and I am telling him.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I think it might be taken for granted that the ships are being operated about as cheaply as they can be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether that can be taken for granted or not, under the facts as established in the hearings. I have very great doubt about that. For instance, just take the salaries of three of the vice presidents of this board at $35,000 a year. I think that is a willful waste of the people's money, and they ought not to have any such salaries.

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends. I know of a good many men who can earn $35,000 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; perhaps there are such men. But they are not the vice presidents of the Shipping Board.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether these men earn the money or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I only know that one of them during the war, as I understand, got $6,500 a year.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amount of a salary does not prove that it is excessive. You must go further than that before you can pass on that matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says it is not excessive. Does the Senator know of a single other officer, except the President of the United States alone, who gets as much from the Government as the vice president of the Shipping Board at $35,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; the Senator must know that.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator must know that only the President gets a salary larger than $35,000 a year, paid by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh! There are a great many larger salaries paid than are paid to officers of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am talking about governmental salaries. No other governmental salary except the President's is as high as that. The Chief Justice of the United States gets $15,000, and he is the highest paid, I believe, unless it be the Vice President, who gets $15,000, or maybe it is $12,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Twelve thousand five hundred dollars, I think.

Mr. BORAH. And we are going to buy him a house.

Mr. McKELLAR. No other officers of the Government than the vice presidents of the Shipping Board get such enormous salaries. Why, take the members of the Shipping Board themselves. They get $12,000 a year, and yet these vice presidents get three times that; and one of them, by the way, in a letter that I had published in the RECORD, directed me to inform my constituent that it would be cheaper for my constituent to ship his goods in a British vessel than it would be for him to charter an American vessel, when he was there as the representative of the American vessel.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know anything about those facts.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am giving them to the Senator so that he may know the kind of Shipping Board men to whom we are giving these enormous salaries. You would think that a man to whom we pay the enormous salary of $35,000 a year——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not even know who it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Smull—you would think that when he was applied to for the chartering of a ship by an American citizen he would not say to the American, "You can get your ship cheaper from the British merchant marine."

Mr. CALDER. Maybe he was telling the truth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I believe either the Bible or some other good book says that it is not always expendient to tell the truth.

Mr. BORAH. No; it was not the Bible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please observe the rule. Senators desiring to interrupt the Senator having the floor will address the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, joking aside, the facts about that matter were these, and I will state them again: I will put in the RECORD the letters that passed between us a year or two ago. Some constituents of mine, Humphrey Godwin & Co., of Memphis, Tenn., sent me a letter asking me to see upon what terms and when they could charter from the Shipping Board an American ship to carry a shipload of cottonseed meats—the Senator, of course, knows what they are—from a Texas port to two British ports. I read that telegram over the telephone to a man by the name of Robinson, who was in Mr. Smull's office, and Mr. Robinson without any ado replied to me over the telephone: "Tell your constituents to interview the British people." I think he used the word "people" instead of "merchant marine." "We do not want that business. The British people can do it cheaper than we can." He never asked any questions. That was the statement. I telegraphed that statement, by his direction, to my constituents. I wrote to Mr. Smull that night—he happened to be away at that time, he was in New York City, this man to whom we paid $35,000 a year—I wrote him that night, sending him the telegram and my reply to it, and giving him the information, and the next day I got a letter from Mr. Smull upholding Mr. Robinson in saying to my constituents that it was cheaper to ship on British ships, without any investigation, without any knowledge of the subject, simply upon the proposition being stated to him, and incidentally stating what the rates were, and he did not even have the rates right, as the correspondence will show, and I will put it in here. It has already been put in the RECORD once, but I want to put it in again right here for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not pass upon the competency of the various men who are employed in the Shipping Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that man were in my employ I would not regard him as a $35,000 man.

Mr. CUMMINS. That man was operating for the Government, and it was his duty to do what he believed was right. That is one of the objections I have to Government operation of steamship lines and railroad lines. I do not believe in it, because when the Government operates——

Mr. McKELLAR. They do not care about business.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government can not be as selfish, and ought not to be as selfish, as the individual corporation. It is not possible that it shall be.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not going into the discussion of Government ownership to-night.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I am not, either.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not time.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do not believe that the Shipping Board has paid more for its men than it was necessary to pay in order to get the kind of men it wanted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, Mr. President, during the war we got this very man for $6,500, according to my recollection, and if I am wrong I want to be corrected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. We got a good many men during the war at a dollar a year, too.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and they were the most expensive men in the world. I think this man was expensive at $6,500 during the war and infinitely more expensive now at $35,000.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to say to the Senator that the two men he is speaking of now would be delighted if the Government of the United States would relieve them of the positions they are now occupying. I say that because I know it. I do not say it because I have heard it from unreliable sources. They can get more money than $35,000 to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the transaction with my constituents is the kind of a business transaction that they are engaged in as vice presidents and officers of the Shipping Board, I think it would be infinitely better for the United States Government if they should get some other jobs as soon as possible. They ought to be relieved immediately.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us see if that is so, taking the very case that the Senator recites here as an example. Mr. President, the officer of our Government told the absolute truth. A tramp steamer from England could carry that cargo, with his boat here with nothing to take back, very much cheaper than the American boat could carry it there and have nothing with which to return. We could not have put anything else than these products of cottonseed on board. That was the cargo, and a tramp steamer at any time can take——

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator does not know the facts. The Senator is just absolutely without knowledge as to the facts in the matter. My constituents did not ask him anything in the world except for a price to charter that steamer. They did not fix any limitation. It was not a question of price. They merely asked to charter an American steamer, and they were deprived of the right. Mr. Smull did not make them a price. Indeed, he quoted the British price as being cheaper than the American price without ado. He was looking for the interest of British ships, not American ships.

I say that if we have that kind of officers in the Shipping Board, whether we pay them $1 or whether we pay them $35,000 a year, they ought to be discharged. I have said it before, and I say it again. They ought to be discharged. We ought not to have men of that kind in our employ. Why, that is what is the matter with our Shipping Board. That is what is the matter with our merchant marine, if the Senator will permit me just a moment. It has been charged that the chairman of the board has openly stated that the Shipping Board did not want business; they wanted to get out of business as soon as possible; and it is conceded, I think, that they do not believe in Government operation and do not want it to go on any more.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the American ships that are operating are operating on regular courses; and as for taking one shipload of stuff to England, with no return freight, and having to secure a complete crew to operate the vessel, they could not possibly do it. They can not take a ship out of the regular advertised course for the purpose of running it upon another course to take just one cargo of merchandise.

Mr. McKELLAR. At the time this gentleman made that reply to me they had over 500 ships tied up in the ports along the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. SMOOT. But they can not cast off a ship and run it to England and back without some men to run it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course; but there were 5,000,000 men out of employment then, under the administration of the Senator's party in this country, men without a job, men who would have been delighted to get a job to sail on the vessels, if the officers of the Government had been up to their proper business qualifications.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I did not refer to politics, and the Senator should not bring in politics. When we came into power that had happened; but to-day we have not men enough to fill positions in the Government of the United States. That was the cause of it, and that has been the result of it. But I did not rise to discuss politics. I rose to state to the Senator the exact situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, I want to give full information to the Senator and to the Senate. On August 25, 1921, I received the following telegram:

[Telegram.]

AUGUST 25, 1921.

Senator K. McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Kindly make diligent inquiries of Shipping Board to ascertain how we may proceed to obtain by charter the services of an American steamer to handle full cargo about 3,000 tons cottonseed cakes late October, loading Houston, Tex., to two United Kingdom ports. We naturally desire secure rates somewhat lower than prevail for lesser quantities. Is there any just reason why we can not charter direct with Shipping Board?

HUGH HUMPHREYS.

On the same day I sent the following telegram:

[Telegram.]

AUGUST 25, 1921.

Mr. HUGH HUMPHREYS,
Memphis, Tenn.:

Telegram received. Called Shipping Board at once. Mr. Smull, in charge of allocation, out of city. Be here to-morrow. Mr. Robinson advises that you can get cakes hauled cheaper by British ships. Will see Mr. Smull when he returns and urge him to let you have ship and at less cost than the British ship.

KENNETH McKELLAR.

Here is the letter I wrote Mr. Smull that very afternoon:

AUGUST 25, 1921.

Mr. J. B. SMULL,
Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMULL: Inclosed please find telegram from Mr. Hugh Humphreys, of Memphis, Tenn., one of the best and most reliable merchants and brokers there, which telegram explains itself.

I have talked to your Mr. Robinson about the matter, and he did not give me much encouragement, saying that the British could haul the freight cheaper than the American ship could be chartered for. If everybody is told this, we might as well sink our ships. It seems to me that every effort should be made to have Mr. Humphreys charter this ship and haul his cottonseed cakes in it. Mr. Robinson told me that you would be back to-morrow, and I will be greatly obliged if you will advise me over the telephone as soon as you come to a conclusion about it.

I am wiring Mr. Humphreys, and inclose you a copy of my telegram.

Very sincerely yours, KENNETH McKELLAR.

It will be seen that this letter and the two telegrams all occurred on the same afternoon. The next day Mr. Smull returned—Mr. Smull, the gentleman to whom we are paying the enormous salary of $35,000 a year to look after the American ships and to look after American business on those ships. Here is the letter which I received from Mr. Smull and which I now read:

AUGUST 26, 1922.

"Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just returned from New York in connection with the United States mail matters"—

He did not say whether they were giving contracts to foreign steamers or not, but at that time the foreign steamers carried the most of our mail. I reread that part of the letter:

"I have just returned from New York in connection with the United States mail matters, and find your letter of yesterday awaiting my attention.

"I regret I was not here to talk to you in person when you called on the phone yesterday. I have taken this matter up with Mr. Robinson, and while he may have explained himself very bluntly, facts are stranger than fiction, and the fact remains that all full-cargo tramp steamers under foreign flags can operate more cheaply than Shipping Board steamers.

"I might add that the conference rate for cottonseed cakes from the Gulf to the United Kingdom ports has been fixed by the American and British interests at $10 per 2,240 pounds. The present market rate for a full-cargo tramp steamer in the same trade is approximately $6.50 to $7 per ton, and your constituent can probably obtain a foreign steamer at this figure. The Shipping Board would lose money on any steamer they put into this trade at this rate.

"Incidentally this explains to you way the Shipping Board is laying up its steamers as fast as they can be laid up, in order to stop losses, and this situation will only adjust itself with an improved condition in the general export situation.

"Very truly yours,

"J. B. SMULL, Vice President."

Here is what my constituent replied on August 29, 1921:

"I agree with you that the letter you sent is a remarkable one and is a complete admission of the inability of the Shipping Board to handle the ships of the country. In my own opinion, the trouble is that they have never handled themselves in a businesslike way and have never entered the shipping business as other shipping companies conduct their affairs. I simply can not understand why the boats are not leased or chartered to various shipping interests of the world, but instead are endeavoring to handle them in a most unbusinesslike way.

"The pre-war rate from Gulf ports to Europe was about 10 shillings. To-day the Shipping Board, with everything at about normal prices, confess they can not operate at more than four times that rate.

"Don't wake up the Washington office of the Shipping Board, but the conference rate, instead of being $10 per ton, as stated in their wire, is $8 per ton, and is being so quoted by all of their agents."

Here was a man operating the ships, being paid $35,000 a year, and he did not know the rates and quoted the wrong rate. But he was careful to assert that British rates were cheaper. How can we fail to lose money when we have officers like that in charge?

Then my constituent went on to say—and he gave me permission to use this:

"We do not wish this mentioned, because it might result in their tying up still more steamers and allowing the American produce to rot or be sold at perfectly ridiculous prices because of their inability to properly operate the steamers.

"I wish you would send the original of the Shipping Board letter and my original telegram over to Senator McKELLAR, who is president of the Mississippi Valley Association, as I would like for him to see the total impossibility of Americans trying to do business in their own ships. The idea of admitting to other countries that we can not compete, and tying up our ships, is simply beyond my process of reasoning.

"With kind regards,

"Yours very truly,

"HUGH HUMPHREYS."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator who he would have operate our ships?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would certainly be able to find a man at a less salary than that who could manage it a great deal better than he did. I believe almost anybody who was put in charge of operation could go out and get cargoes and would perform better than Mr. Smull and his representatives performed on that occasion. That is the only actual experience I have had about obtaining ships.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator take the position that to have efficient operation we must have men who have had experience with operation?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the Senator aware that whenever the Shipping Board has put an experienced man in charge of operation the charge was at once made that he has not been serving the Government, but the interests he had theretofore affiliated with?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state that question again?

Mr. LENROOT. Whenever an experienced man has been put in charge, has not the charge been at once made that he is not serving the Government, but the private interests which he had theretofore been serving?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. I do not make that kind of charges.

Mr. LENROOT. I know the Senator does not, but he is aware that the charge has been made publicly always.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator says so, I take his word for it, but I have not made any such charge, and, so far as I recall, no one has made it to my knowledge. I think some of those kinds of statements were made in the newspapers occasionally. I never have paid any attention to those things.

But here was one of the leading merchants of my home city who sent me a telegram like that. I do not think there was over half an hour elapsed between our telegrams. I immediately called up the Shipping Board and was given a rebuff like that, was told to go to the British vessels; that they could run cheaper than our vessels can; that the board did not want the business anyhow. That was a jar to me, as it would have been to the Senator if it had occurred to him.

Mr. LENROOT. One further question. Assuming that the statement is correct; that whatever may have been the fault of somebody, it could have been carried in a British ship very much cheaper than in an American tramp ship. Was the party who wrote the letter to the Senator serving the Government or not in saving the Government that money at the same time the Senator's constituent was getting the service?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will recall the telegram of my constituent, he will remember that my constituent paid very little attention to the price. He wanted the goods hauled in an American vessel. He said he thought that the price ought to be less when they took a full cargo, and I imagine that would occur to any business man. With that sort of statement there was no limitation on it. The man of business would have said, "Why, Senator, a tramp steamer like that will cost your constituent so much, and you can wire him that price. If it is satisfactory to him, we will be very glad, indeed, to let him have it." He might have said that much to me anyway. If I was in the shipping business and wanted to get business, I would be very careful about how I turned down a full cargo of anything. This man did not want business.

I would certainly look into it very carefully, and yet here was a man who just off the reel, without any consideration or explanation, without any knowledge, because he did not have any knowledge about it, refused the business. It is in line with what has been done all the time. Every ship they can lay up has been laid up, and we have many hundreds of them tied up. My judgment is that every tramp steamer that could be put to work from the very beginning ought to have been put to work. We ought not to give up the trade to anyone. If we are going to have a merchant marine that is a success, we have got to fight for the business from start to finish. We have great competitors. We have experienced competitors. We have competitors who have been in the ocean-carrying trade for hundreds of years. We have got to fight like Trojans to take part of that business. We will never have an ocean-carrying business until we get men in charge of it who believe we ought to get the business, and who are willing and capable to fight for it.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's view that we should operate all of our ships irrespective of the losses incurred?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; not at all. I do not think we ought to operate any of them at a loss. I believe if a bill was passed such as I have proposed as a substitute for the bill offered by the Senator from Washington, which incorporates probably three-fourths of the provisions of the bill which he has offered, that instead of operating our ships at a loss the Government would make great profit from the operation of them.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think the Shipping Board can operate ships to-day at a profit?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I doubt it to-day, although some lines are operating at a profit. The reason why I say no is because the shipping business is at the lowest ebb this year that it has ever been in its history.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator criticises the Shipping Board for laying up a ship, and at the same time he says he does not feel that they can be operated at a profit. Therefore, the conclusion must be that the Senator thinks all of these ships should be run at a loss.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator does not understand my position at all, and does not state it correctly.

Now, Mr. President, I have digressed for some time and longer than I intended, but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to another point in connection with the subject of the filibuster. I want to read another excerpt from his language which is a very strong statement from the Senator's excellent speech of February 16, 1915. It applies so very aptly to the pending bill that I can not refrain from quoting it. I read from page 3842 of the RECORD:

"There has never been a moment of real debate in this Chamber upon the bill now before us, because real debate involves a mind that is willing to listen, involves the opportunity at least for conviction and for change of opinion. Since the action of the caucus, so far as those who have regarded themselves as bound by it are concerned, there has never been an hour in which any discussion of the question would avail those who were participating in it. I do not know how many of these Members are in fact opposed to this measure. I do not know that. I do not propose to say. I only say that we are operating under a rule of the caucus which enabled or is intended to allow 36 members of the caucus to control the action of 53 members."

Now, that same condition exists to-day. There has never been any debate on the bill on the part of those who proposed it with the exception of the Senator from Washington. He discussed it on one occasion.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has not given him any chance, has he?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes. Indeed, I have yielded, hurried through all day to-day. I gave him a great deal of time to-day and am willing to give him more time if he wants it. I am willing to give him all the time he wants. He can take some of my time if he likes. But the Senator from Washington is virtually the only Senator on the other side of the Chamber who has really discussed this bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa's position is entirely right; I indorse it. There has been no discussion of this bill. The truth of the business is that it has been agreed upon by party leaders, and, in my judgment, the majority of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber are voting for it not because they believe in it, for I do not believe they do, but they are voting for it simply because they have been asked by their own President to vote for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand the Senators on the other side of the Chamber do not care to give anyone a chance to vote on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I doubt very much whether the bill will be voted on at this session, I will say to the Senator without violating any confidence; but, however that may be, if the President or anyone else wants a vote by the Members of the Congress who have been elected on that issue, there will be no trouble about getting such a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. We could not do that now, could we?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. We can not do that now until next December, unless an extraordinary session is called. If the ship subsidy bill is so important a matter as the President says it is, if it is important enough to bring the President before the Congress twice within a period of three months, if it seems to him so important, let him call an extraordinary session, although I devoutly hope and pray that he may not do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand the Senator. He says he hopes and prays that the President will not call the new Congress together?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not had a vacation in many years, and, personally, I am very much opposed to an extraordinary session.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator ought not to put his own personal comfort in the way of the public good.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall not do so. If the President shall call an extraordinary session, I shall be here every day, just as I have been during the present session. I will make my personal comfort entirely subordinate.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to refer to another matter. Why the necessity of pressing this bill at this time? A morning newspaper stated that if we did not pass the bill it would show the lack of the ability of the Senate to do business. Mr. President, this is a Republican Congress and I am a Democrat, but I wish to say that there has not been a short session of Congress since I have been a Member—and I have been a Member for 12 years—that ever transacted the real business before it, which consists of the appropriation bills, any more efficiently, any more quickly, than the present Congress has done. We have done a marvelous business. We Democrats have helped in every way the passage of all supply measures. There never was a time in my recollection when the appropriation bills had all been passed at this stage of the short session of Congress.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am sure that my good friend does not mean to indorse many of the measures which this Congress has passed?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. I certainly do not. I will come to that. I indorse some of the measures it has passed, but I have indorsed much more the defeat of others. Of course, we have all cooperated, Democrats as well as Republicans, to get the appropriation bills passed. We all wanted them passed, for that was the real business of the session. Perhaps we ought not to have gone beyond them anywhere, but the President insisted that there was other work for us to do.

He presented a Liberian loan bill here which if passed would have voted $5,000,000 in the pockets of a favored few and allowed men whose debts were outlawed to collect them. Congress never did better work than when it defeated that bill. I indorse that defeat. Then came the no less outrageous Dyer antilynching bill. The Senate defeated that bill. I indorse that defeat. Now, if it will cap the climax by defeating this infamous raid upon the Treasury of the United States I shall say that it has done better business than any short session of Congress since I have been a Member of Congress.

I say that with some misgivings, because last week a bill was passed here by an enormous majority to which I was absolutely opposed. I regret its passage. It was a poor business. But taking it by and large, no short session of Congress has ever gotten along faster with the Nation's business than the present short session has gotten along with it, and all this was brought about by Democratic cooperation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee closes, if he is getting ready to conclude——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have not nearly finished, though I am hurrying on very rapidly.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit an interruption, I desire to say that there was a statement made by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a few moments ago in his colloquy with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] that I think is misleading and inaccurate. It was when the Senator from Tennessee referred to the unemployment situation in this country in 1921. I am sorry the Senator from Utah is not now in his seat, because I am sure he would correct the statement he then made.

The Senator from Utah stated that the Democratic administration handed over to the present administration the great problem of unemployment. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him further, I desire now to state the facts, and I make the statement merely to keep the record straight.

In August, 1921, some time after the present administration came into the control of the Government, in response to a resolution which was passed by the Senate asking for certain statistics from the Department of Labor, the Secretary of Labor sent a report to this body. I wish merely, for the sake of the RECORD, to read a part of that report, with the permission of the Senator from Tennessee. The Secretary of Labor stated:

"Responding to the requirements of the above resolution the best estimate that can be made from available sources of information is that there are at present 5,735,000 persons unemployed in the United States. These figures relate to the differences in the numbers of employees carried on pay rolls July, 1921, as compared with the peak of employment in 1920. Figures of the unemployed by industries are:

Manufacturing and mechanical industries (including building trades)	3,900,000
Mining	250,000
Transportation	800,000
Trade and clerical workers	450,000
Domestic and personal service	335,000
Total	5,735,000

"No estimates can be given as to the number of ex-service men unemployed, as the reports covering pay roll data do not segregate them. The same applies to women workers.

"This total must be accepted, of course, as an estimate. It is practically impossible to get exact figures of persons out of work except by an actual count upon a given date, which is, of course, prohibitive by reason of its cost. The Department of Labor, through the United States Employment Service, in January, 1921, estimated that there were 3,473,446 less workers employed in January, 1921, than in January, 1920, and that this was a reduction of 36.9 per cent. For the succeeding six months between January and July, 1921, the number of names on the pay rolls covered by that service decreased 7.3 per cent. There was a decrease of 1.1 per cent between June and July, 1921. This reduction, added to the estimate of unemployment for January, 1921, indicates 3,906,450 less workers employed in industry in July, 1921, than in January, 1920."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi wishes to give information in answering what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated, I shall not make any point as to who has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I am sure the Senator desires the information.

Mr. CURTIS. The unemployment situation in 1921 was all brought about by virtue of conditions which were left by the former administration, and we are perfectly willing that the country should know the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the Senator says it was by virtue of that; but the Senator from Utah said that there was this great unemployment at the time that the present administration took charge, and yet here is a report made by the Secretary of Labor, of the Senator's own party, in August, 1921, which shows that 5,735,000 men were out of employment. I shall ask that this report be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection if it will not take me off the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. It is already in the RECORD, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Then I will say that it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 16, 1921, pages 5037, 5038, and 5039, volume 61, Part V, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And is in a red bound book.

Mr. HARRISON. With that information anyone who may be interested may turn to the pages and read further. I always like to quote Republican authority.

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I was just going to say to the Senator from New York, who is now on his feet, that I notice from the report from the Secretary of Labor, made at that time, that in the State of New York there were 424,716 persons unemployed.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question, if the Senator from Tennessee will permit me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am willing to yield, if it will not interfere with my right to the floor.

Mr. CALDER. I was just about to ask the Senator to permit me to obtain from the Department of Labor to-morrow a statement as to labor conditions to-day and to incorporate them in the RECORD following his statement as to conditions in 1921.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I will be very glad to have that done.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator referred to the unemployment situation in New York. I will say to the Senator that to-day——

Mr. HARRISON. I only referred to what the Secretary of Labor of the Senator's own party had said.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that to-day nobody is out of employment in New York.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very glad to hear that, and I hope that will apply to the Senator himself who retires from the Senate on the 4th of March. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator in response to his suggestion that the Senator from New York is one of the "lame ducks" who is not looking for a job——

Mr. HARRISON. And who is beloved by all of us.

Mr. CALDER. For he has a job in New York City at his own business waiting for him.

Mr. HARRISON. I knew that.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I say to the Senator from New York that there is not one of the lame ducks or anyone else that I would rather vote to confirm to any position with which the President might honor him than I would to confirm the nomination of the junior Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. It is very nice for the Senator to say that but the President will not appoint me, because I do not want any place of any character at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not need that to get the Senator's vote for the ship subsidy bill.

Mr. CALDER. No; it does not.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to say further with respect to unemployment that I notice on February 15, 1922, last year a very distinguished Republican Senator, who is now with us no more but is presiding over some judicial tribunal—I refer to former Senator Kenyon, of Iowa—made a speech on the floor of the Senate in which, among other things referring to unemployment, he said:

"The Senator will remember that in the conferences that took place the statement was made that there were over 5,000,000 men out of employment in this country. That was denied; it was disputed. A gentleman connected with the Government, who has made a great study of this matter, told me a couple of weeks ago that there were 7,000,000. There is absolutely no way, apparently, of getting authentic statistics now. This would enable the Secretary of Commerce to utilize every available fact he could get bearing on the question."

I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator from Tennessee, but I wanted these facts to go in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I had intended absolutely to substantiate our position on this bill by quoting from some of the speeches which were made in 1915 against the ship subsidy bill by some of our Republican friends, but I have had to hurry along and have not yet had an opportunity to cite the quotations. To-morrow or at some subsequent time I desire to finish what I wish to say and to quote to some extent from these eminent gentlemen, and to comment briefly upon what they have said.

By the way, Mr. President, before I proceed further, may I make a parliamentary inquiry at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I yield the floor now and desire either to-morrow or the following day to continue, will I have the right to do so?

Mr. CURTIS. I presume that depends upon whether or not the Senator comes within the rules. The rule provides that a Senator shall not speak more than twice on the same day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have spoken but once.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On t[illegible] pending motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that if it is the same legislative day the Senator would have the privilege of the floor for a second time if he obtained recognition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is on the pending motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the pending motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may continue to-morrow.

Mr. President, before I conclude there is an authority to which I wish to refer very briefly——

Mr. CURTIS. Could not the Senator complete his remarks this evening? We are all anxious to hear what he has to say.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure that the Senator is, but that would depend upon whether the Senator would want to adjourn too quickly. If he did not want to recess right away, I might continue.

Mr. CURTIS. We thought we would sit until 4 o'clock in the morning so as to give the Senator plenty of time.

Mr. McKELLAR. We might possibly get along by staying until that time.

Mr. FLETCHER. We might have a somewhat larger attendance if Senators are anxious to hear the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will forego for the moment the pleasure of quoting from my good friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], so that I may quote from a speech of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce on the very subject concerning which the Senator from Kansas made his inquiry a moment ago. I quote from the speech made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on February 8, 1915, when he said:

"If I should occupy this floor from now until the 4th day of March, no matter what the results might be to me, feeling as I do about it, I think I would be doing nothing more than my duty to the people who have honored me with a place on this floor."

I indorse that statement as being applicable to the present situation, as I see it. If I were to occupy the floor until the 4th of March I would be doing what I believe to be for the best interests of the people of the United States. The Senator from Washington went on to say:

"No greater calamity could come to this country than for us to be involved in this struggle, and I want to say, in all frankness, to our friends on the other side that this bill shall not pass if there is any possible way in which I can prevent it."

I quote those words of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce as applicable to my views on this bill.

Mr. President, before I close I wish to read a short excerpt from a speech made on the same day, namely, the 8th day of February, 1915, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. At that time he said:

"Further, Mr. President, we have been joined in our opposition by seven Senators of an opposite political faith."

We on this side have been joined by more than that many Senators of the opposite political faith. The Senator from Massachusetts continued:

"I have sat here and heard those seven Senators villified as I have never heard Senators attacked in this Chamber before; and yet no man can imagine any motive actuating those men in the course they took which could have any personal advantage. All the personal advantage was the other way. If ever it was clear that men took a position because they felt it to be their duty to do it and did it with the utmost reluctance and were guided by their conscientious convictions, it was those men. I believe and I know they are actuated by the same feelings that we are in presenting the opposition to this bill, namely, that we believe it is a bill dangerous in present conditions to the peace and safety of the United States.

"Some of us, of course, are utterly opposed to Government ownership, especially on the ocean, and, above all, we are opposed to Government ownership at this time. We do not, we can not, tamely accept the proposition that such a bill as this should be passed and its provisions carried out by the purchase of these German ships, which has been the underlying and the stimulating cause of this bill from the beginning, around which there are dark suspicions and sinister stories. With that purpose in view, it seems to us that the passage of this bill would bring this country within measurable distance of war as soon as those ships are set afloat, and the German notice broadens it into a danger to any Government-owned ships."

That is all I desire to say at this moment. I shall take occasion later on to discuss these instructions more fully, more adequately, and as their importance deserves.

In other words, the Senator from Massachusetts, because he believed the shipping bill was wrong, joined in the filibuster against it, and aided in its defeat by a filibuster, and so did the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Gallinger, and so did the Senator from Delaware, Mr. du Pont, and so did most of the Republican Party; and they had no mandate of the people to uphold them in that filibuster as we have in this. We have a mandate from the people to defeat this bill. They voted against it in the last election, and it is our duty, as I conceive it, and it is not only my duty to my constituents, but it is in accord with the promises that I made on every stump in Tennessee on the last campaign, that I would vote against it, work against it, speak against it, and, if necessary, filibuster against it.

Mr. President, I have taken longer than I expected, and I now yield the floor.

During the delivery of Mr. McKELLAR's speech,

SWORD OF GEN. RICHARD MONTGOMERY.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 460) accepting the sword of Gen. Richard Montgomery, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 460) accepting the sword of Gen. Richard Montgomery was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May it be read at length? It is very brief.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the understanding that it is not to interfere with my right to the floor, I will be glad to yield to the Senator from New York for that purpose.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sword of Gen. Richard Montgomery, which he wore when he fell at the siege of Quebec, on December 31, 1775, be accepted in the name of the Nation from the donor, Miss Julia Barton Hunt, whose generosity is deeply appreciated, and that the sword be deposited in the National Museum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed immediately to the consideration of the joint resolution, without its reference to a committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the understanding that it is not to interfere with my right to the floor, I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I impose upon the good nature of the Senator from Tennessee for just a moment longer?

Mr. McKELLAR. With the same understanding, I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that there be printed in the RECORD in this connection in 8-point type an article which appeared in the year 1885 in Harper's Magazine descriptive of General Montgomery's career and of the battle in which he lost his life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From Harper's New Monthly Magazine, February, 1885.]

GENERAL RICHARD MONTGOMERY.

(By Louise Livingston Hunt.)

Among that small band of military leaders who shared the perils of our early struggle for independence, the name and fame of Richard Montgomery should be held especially dear by the people of New York. He has been dead more than a hundred years, and although his memory is revered by the American people, little is generally known of his personal history.

Sparks's American Biography contains a memoir of Montgomery. This was written by his brother-in-law, John Armstrong, who was Secretary of War in the Cabinet of President

Madison, and was known as a man of distinguished talents, well qualified as a military critic. This biography, however, is wanting in such personal details as the flight of time, and the circumstances of Montgomery's character, no less than his untimely fate, have rendered of uncommon interest to the reader of American history. Another sketch of Montgomery, by Brevet Major General Cullum, United States Army, appeared in 1876. While this is no doubt very valuable, owing to the military reputation of the author and the professional view which he takes of the services of Montgomery, it is largely indebted to the first memoir already noticed. It also is wanting in particulars of his private life.

It is not my province to discuss the professional merits of General Montgomery, or even to attempt any consecutive narration of his campaign in Canada. My purpose is to string together the accounts that have been furnished by the letters and manuscripts preserved at Montgomery Place and to bring my readers into closer acquaintance with the hero of Quebec.

General Montgomery was born on the 2d of December, 1736. He was by birth an Irishman. In his youth he served in the British Army during the French and Indian War. On his return to England after the close of the seven years' conflict he is said to have formed friendships with Fox, Burke, and Barré, becoming deeply imbued with their views of the rights of the Colonies. Superseded and disappointed in the purchase of a majority, he left England forever.

While still a captain in the British Army, Montgomery had met Janet Livingston, the daughter of Robert R. Livingston, one of the judges of the King's Bench. He was on his way to a distant post, and had come on shore with all the officers of his company at Clermont, Judge Livingston's country place on the Hudson. Subsequently, when he returned to settle in America, he renewed his acquaintance with her and, with the approbation of her parents, married her in July, 1773. Among the papers before me are the letter of Montgomery to Judge Livingston asking for the hand of his daughter and Judge Livingston's reply.

KINGSBRIDGE, May 20, 1773.

SIR: Although I am extremely anxious to solicit your approbation, together with Mrs. Livingston's, in an affair which nearly concerns my happiness and no less affects your daughter, I have nevertheless been hitherto deterred from this indispensable attention by reflecting that from so short an acquaintance as I had the honor to make with you I could not flatter myself with your sanction in a matter so very important as to influence the future welfare of a child. I therefore wished for some good-natured friend to undertake the kind office of giving a favorable impression; but finding you have already had intimation of my desire to be honored with your daughter's hand, and apprehensive lest my silence should bear an unfavorable construction, I have ventured at last to request, sir, that you will consent to a union which to me has the most promising appearance of happiness, from the lady's uncommon merit and amiable worth. Nor will it be an inconsiderable addition to be favored by such respectable characters with the title of son, should I be so fortunate as to deserve it. And if to contribute to the happiness of a beloved daughter can claim any share with tender parents, I hope hereafter to have some title to your esteem.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD MONTGOMERY.

CLAREMONT, 21 June, 1773.

SIR: I received your polite letter by the hands of Mr. Lawrence at Poughkeepsie, from whence I returned last night.

I was then so engaged in the business of court, both night and day, that I had no time to answer it, and though I would have stolen an hour for that purpose, it required a previous consultation with Mrs. Livingston.

Since we heard of your intentions, solicitous for our daughter's happiness, we have made such inquiries as have given a great deal of satisfaction. We both approve of your proposal and heartily wish your union may yield you all the happiness you seem to expect, to which we shall always be ready to contribute all in our power. Whenever it suits your convenience we hope to have the pleasure of seeing you here, and in the meantime I remain, with due respect,

Your most humble servant, ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Mrs. Montgomery wrote a series of notes to be used for a memoir of her husband. The limits of this article permit only a few gleanings from this quaint and interesting manuscript:

"General Montgomery was born in Dublin, and was educated in the College of Dublin. His father, Thomas Montgomery, of Convoy House, Donegal, had three sons, Alexander, John, and Richard, and one daughter married to Viscount Ranelagh. The eldest son, Alexander, was an officer under Wolfe in the conquest of Canada, and for 40 years member of Parliament for the county of Donegal. John died at Lisbon a noted merchant. Richard was the third son. Their mother was an English lady of fortune whose estate was settled on her younger sons, the eldest son having inherited the estate of his uncle. Richard was placed in the British Army, in the Seventeenth Regiment, by the advice of his brother, Alexander, his senior by many years. Richard was at the taking of Cape Breton with Amherst. Alexander marched to reenforce Wolfe.

"The duty of the Seventeenth Regiment was in America. For this reason, when the stamp act was to be enforced an order was given to employ that regiment, then in England, which Montgomery, receiving with several others, declared publicly that they would throw up their commissions if the order were persisted in. In 1772–73 he came to New York, purchased a farm at Kingsbridge, and in July, 1773, was married. He then removed to Rhinebeck, where he built a mill and laid the foundation of a house.

"Unknown, as his modesty led him to suppose himself to be, he was chosen early in 1775 one of the Council of Fifty to New York from Dutchess County. While thus engaged Congress determined to raise troops in defense of our rights. Philip Schuyler was appointed the major general, and the appointment of brigadier general was tendered to Montgomery. Before accepting it he came into his wife's room and asked her to make up for him the ribbon cockade which was to be placed in his hat. He saw her emotion, and marked the starting tear. With persuasive gentleness he said to her: 'Our country is in danger. Unsolicited, in two instances, I have been distinguished by two honorable appointments. As a politician I could not serve them. As a soldier I think I can. Shall I, then, accept the one and shrink from the other in dread of danger? My honor is engaged.' Mrs. Montgomery took the ribbon, and he continued: 'I am satisfied. Trust me. You shall never blush for your Montgomery.'

"He had hardly received his appointment when it was announced that General Washington was to pass through New York on his way to Boston. On the morning of his expected arrival the whole town was in a state of commotion. All the militia was paraded, bells ringing, drums beating, and in that moment the British Governor Tryon arrived. As he landed he looked with delight at the general excitement that prevailed, and said: 'Is all this for me?' when two of his counselors took him mournfully by the hand and led him to a house where he saw the great Washington pass, attended by a crowd of patriots. At a window next to the City Hotel I was happily so placed that I could see him. Here General Schuyler and General Montgomery received their commissions and instructions. The next day, when Montgomery opened his commission, he found all the commissions of his brigade left in blank. Such was the trust reposed in him."

Two years of quiet and domestic happiness were broken in upon by Montgomery's being sent as a delegate to the First Provincial Convention, held in New York in April, 1775. He never thought himself fit for civil service, and with reluctance took the place assigned him. But his heart was in the movement. With such feelings of ardent devotion did he give himself up to the cause of American liberty, that when called upon by Congress to quit the retirement of his farm in order to become one of the first eight brigadier generals, he wrote to a friend "that the honor, though entirely unexpected and undeserved, he felt to be the will of an oppressed people, which must be obeyed"; and he accordingly went immediately into active service.

Mrs. Montgomery accompanied him on his way as far as Saratoga. In after years their parting was described as follows by his brother-in-law, Edward Livingston, who was at the time a boy of 11: "It was just before General Montgomery left for Canada. We were only three in the room—he, my sister, and myself. He was sitting in a musing attitude between his wife, who, sad and silent, seemed to be reading the future, and myself, whose childish admiration was divided between the glittering uniform and the martial bearing of him who wore it. Suddenly the silence was broken by Montgomery's deep voice, repeating the line, 'Tis a mad world, my masters,' 'I once thought so,' he continued, 'now I know it.' The tone, the words, the circumstances, overawed me, and I noiselessly retired. I have since reflected upon the bearing of this quotation, forcing itself upon the young soldier at that moment. Perhaps he might have been contrasting the sweet quiet of the life he held in his grasp with the tumults and perils of the camp which he had resolved to seek without one regretful glance at what he was leaving behind. These were the last words I heard from his lips, and I never saw him more."

I turn next to the letters written by General Montgomery to his wife during his last brilliant and memorable campaign.

The correspondence was not voluminous; at that time communication between Canada and New York was slow and difficult. In the most favorable weather the sloops which plied the Hudson required a week to go from Albany to New York. On comparison of dates, some of the letters prove to have been two months on the way from Montreal or other parts of Canada to Rhinebeck, where Mrs. Montgomery lived.

These letters show him to have been blunt and straightforward, yet affectionate, and on occasion fond of a joke at home.

"If you find you can be spared," he wrote, June, 1775, "and wish to make a trip to New York, and will not stay too long, I shall be very glad to see you. I dare say Peggy and Kitty"—his wife's sisters—"will not dislike the jaunt."

"FROM TICONDEROGA, August 24, 1775.

"I have received yours from Albany and the cask of rusk. Ticonderoga agrees very well with me. I have a great deal of exercise both of body and sword. The New Englanders and I jog on very well together, and I go to prayers every evening with them after exercise is over. The general is gone to the Indian congress, so that for a few days I am in command, though without the difficulties he had to struggle with, as he had before put matters in proper train.

"As for house or home (except yourself), I have hardly time to lend a thought. Be assured of my warmest affection, my dearest girl, and accept my warmest wishes for your happiness."

A letter dated from Camp St. Johns in September, 1775, betrayed a soldier's impatience at his wife's complaints at the prolonged separation from him: "I must entreat the favor of you," he wrote to her, "to write no more of those whining letters. I declare if I receive another in that style, I will lock up the rest without reading them. I don't want anything to lower my spirits; I have abundant use for them all, and at the best of times I have not too much."

The following letter gives evidence of his keen sense of duty in the distribution of office, which no tie of consanguinity could affect in any manner whatsoever:

"This very evening (October 9, 1775, near Camp St. Johns) I received my dear Janet's letters to the 23d of September, which bring me the agreeable news of your recovery. I hope to have the same account of your good father and mother, whose health and happiness I think myself deeply interested in. You are right. I most certainly might have advanced Harry to a majority. Disinterested and generous motives will forever, I hope, prevent me from serving myself or family at the expense of the public. Though a spirited fellow, he has not experience for such an important post. I grant there are others as bad and worse. This is not my doing; nor will I ever have such a weight on my conscience."

The uncommon sympathy that existed between his wife's family and himself is a striking feature of this short correspondence. There are constant messages of remembrance for them, all interwoven with the news from the camp and in the midst of the most harassing events and circumstances.

"I have no time to write to your father," he wrote from Montreal on the eve of his departure for Quebec. "My most affectionate respects attend the old gentleman and lady. My love to the girls. Do they go to town? No husbands this winter? Alas! I live in hopes to see you in six weeks."

The last letter of the collection bears the date of the 5th of December, 1775. It was written just a fortnight before his death and is as follows:

"HOLLAND HOUSE, NEAR QUEBEC, December 5.

"MY DEAR JANET: This day I had the pleasure of yours of the 13th of October. I think your letters are a long time on the road. I believe I have now the right to complain, as I am sure you don't write as often as I do.

"I suppose long ere this we have furnished the folks of the united colonies with subject matter of conversation. I should like to see the long faces of my Tory friends. I fancy they look a little cast down, and that the Whig ladies triumph most unmercifully.

"The weather continues so gentle that we have been able, at this late season, to get down by water with our artillery, etc. They are a good deal alarmed in town, and with some reason. The garrison is little to be depended upon, and very weak in proportion to the works. I wish it were well over, with all my heart, and sigh for home like a New Englander.

"I sha'n't forget your beaver blanket if I get safe out of this affair, nor your mother's martin-skins. Present my affectionate duty to her, and make her easy respecting Harry. He has by no means given any offense, though some uneasiness, by some little imprudence. I am glad to hear your house is in such forwardness. May I have the pleasure of seeing you in it soon! Till then, adieu!"

General Schuyler's health did not permit him to conduct this campaign, as had been intended. He relinquished the command of the forces to General Montgomery at Isle aux Noix. There was insubordination among the troops. Montgomery's energy and dauntless will were more than equal to the emergency. He had great trouble with the New Englanders. All seemed thoroughly demoralized, the New Yorkers as well as the others. "O fortunate husbandmen!" wrote Montgomery, "would I were at my plough again!" He was thoroughly disgusted with them all. However, his course through Canada was a triumphant one, and notwithstanding all his difficulties, success followed in his footsteps. "I have courted fortune," he wrote in another letter, "and found her kind. I have one more favor to solicit, and then I have done; till Quebec is taken, Canada is unconquered." Chief Justice Marshall states that Montgomery "had determined to withdraw from the Army, and had signified, before marching from Monteral, his resolution to resign the commission which had been conferred upon him."

Marshall adds, as a probable incentive to the storming of Quebec, that he had "the desire of closing his military career with a degree of brilliancy suited to the elevation of his mind by the conquest of Canada to the United States." "Fortune," he said, "favors the brave." Little had he then contemplated failure, or his own approaching end. In a conversation which he had with one of his aids-de-camp shortly before the storming of Quebec, he had indulged in meditations on his own life and spoke of his loss of ambition, a sense of duty being alone left as his spring of action. He longed to return to the retirement of his country life, though he said he "would always be ready to contribute to the public safety should the scene change and his services be again required." He was convinced that there was, as he said, "a fair prospect of success," and, notwithstanding the perils of his situation, his hopes ran high and his soul was undaunted. It has been said that he knew the fortifications well, because he had been with Wolfe at the taking of Quebec. This is a mistake. He was in the British Army in Canada at the time but not with Wolfe, having been ordered to follow Amherst with his regiment. This error probably originated from the fact that Alexander Montgomery, the general's eldest brother, was with Wolfe at Quebec.

It was at 4 o'clock in the morning of December 31, 1775, during a violent snowstorm, that the attack on Quebec was made. The little American army had undergone inexpressible hardships during the campaign, and the soldiers were half starved and half naked. It took all the magnetic power of Montgomery to stir them into renewed action. "Men of New York," he exclaimed, "you will not fear to follow where your general leads; march on!" Then placing himself in the front he almost immediately received the mortal wound which suddenly closed his career.

Thus fell Richard Montgomery, at the early age of 37. Three weeks before his death he was promoted to the rank of major general. Young, gifted, and brave, he was mourned throughout the country, at whose altar he had offered up his life—apparently in vain; for his fate decided the battle in favor of the British.

The story that he was borne from the field of battle by Aaron Burr, under the continued fire of the enemy, has always been received with doubt. It may now, upon the highest authority, be pronounced to be without foundation.

It was rumored, but not ascertained by the British for some hours, that the American general had been killed. Anxious to ascertain, General Carleton sent an aid-de-camp to the seminary, where the American prisoners were, to inquire if any of them would identify the body. A field officer of Arnold's division, who had been made prisoner near Sault au Matelot barrier, accompanied the aid-de-camp to the Prés de Ville guard and pointed it out among the other bodies, at the same time pronouncing in accents of grief a glowing eulogium on Montgomery's bravery and worth. Besides that of the general, the bodies of his two aids-de-camp were recognized among the slain. All were frozen stiff. General Montgomery was shot through the thigh and through the head. When his body was taken up his features were not in the least distorted, his countenance appeared serene and placid, like the soul that had animated it. His sword, the symbol of his martial honor, lay close beside him on the snow. It was picked up by a drummer boy, but immediately afterwards was given up to James Thompson, overseer of public works and assistant engineer during the siege, who had been intrusted by General Carleton with the interment of the body. Through the courtesy of the British general, Montgomery was buried within the walls of Quebec with the honors of war.

General Montgomery's will had been made at Crown Point on the 30th of August, soon after the commencement of his last campaign. The authenticity of this document is attested by the signature of Benedict Arnold. It is still in existence, and reads as follows:

THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF RICHARD MONTGOMERY.

I give to my sister, Lady Ranelagh, of the Kingdom of Ireland, all my personal fortune for her sole use, to be disposed of as she pleases, except such legacies as shall be hereafter mentioned. All my just debts must first be paid. Also, I give my said sister my estate at Kingsbridge, near New York, for her sole use, to be disposed of as she thinks fit. To my dear wife, Janet Montgomery, I give my furniture, farm utensils, carriages of all sorts, horses, cattle, shares, books (to this watch, mathematical and philosophical instruments, and apparatus).

I also leave to my said wife the farm I purchased from Shares, at Rhynbeck, with horses and everything upon it.

The ample fortune which my wife will succeed to makes it unnecessary to provide for her in a manner suitable to her situation in life and adequate to the warm affection I bear her.

My dear sister's large family want all I can spare. I could wish to recommend one or two of her younger children to my Janet's protection.

I must request the Honorable Robert Livingston, my much-esteemed father-in-law, and my brother-in-law Robert, his son (whose good sense and integrity I have all confidence in), to see this my last will and testament executed. Though the hurry of public business and want of knowledge in the law may have rendered this instrument incorrect, yet I believe my intention is plain. I therefore hope no advantage will be taken of any inaccuracy.

My brothers, whom I greatly esteem and respect, will accept of what alone I have in my power to give—my warmest wishes for their happiness.

RICHARD MONTGOMERY.

AUGUST 30, 1775, Crown Point.

This may certify that the foregoing will and testament of the late General Montgomery was found by us among his papers a few days after his death and immediately sealed up.

BENEDICT ARNOLD,
DONALD CAMPBELL.

This certification is in the handwriting of Arnold.

General Montgomery left no descendants. By his will it appears that he bequeathed the greater part of his fortune to his relatives in Ireland. The farm at Kingsbridge would now be of enormous value from its proximity to New York.

A curious inventory of his effects was taken and forwarded to New York. The greater part of his wardrobe was purchased by General Arnold. An account was also sent to Mrs. Montgomery of the manner in which his effects had been disposed of, and a list of the articles marked on the inventory as sold to General Arnold. Governor Carleton sent General Montgomery's gold watch and seal to General Wooster, at Montreal, who sent them to Mrs. Montgomery.

The body of General Montgomery remained in Quebec for 43 years. It was then brought to New York in compliance with a special act of the legislature.

At Mrs. Montgomery's request, Governor Clinton commissioned her nephew, Lewis Livingston, to superintend the removal of the remains to New York. From a minute report which he wrote to his father, Edward Livingston, then in Louisiana, we gather many details of interest hitherto unknown to the public. On account of the great lapse of time since the death of General Montgomery apprehensions were entertained that there would be difficulty in ascertaining the exact spot where he was interred. Such apprehensions were, however, groundless. Mrs. Montgomery had been some time previously informed by Mr. William Smith—the son of the Chief Justice, then deceased—that the person who had buried her husband was still living and had in his possession the sword the general wore when he was so unfortunately slain. Shortly after the arrival of Colonel Livingston in Quebec, James Thompson, then 89 years of age, was pointed out to him as the very person who had been intrusted with the superintendence of the general's burial and who had served in the British Army during the siege. He was ordered to explore the place of interment and dig up the remains. This he accordingly did, in the presence of one of his excellency Governor Sherbrooke's aides de camp, Captain Freer. As Thompson still possessed all his faculties, Colonel Livingston obtained from him full information. Owing to the alteration that had taken place in the appearance of the ground he could not indicate exactly where the body lay. It was found, however, within a few feet of the place he fixed upon, and there was so much circumstantial evidence to corroborate all he said that not a doubt could be entertained of his veracity. He mentioned a number of details respecting the interment and gave a particular description of the coffin in which the body was placed, which corresponded perfectly with the appearance of the one taken up. The coffin was kept exactly in the state in which it was found and placed in a strong wooden case.

Sir John Sherbrooke pursued a very liberal course of action. He did not hesitate one instant to deliver up the remains; he only expressed a desire that the affair should be considered a private rather than a public transaction. Mr. William Smith was extremely useful in furthering the views of Colonel Livingston; he was intimate with the governor, and used his influence to obtain a compliance with the request of which he was the bearer.

Governor Clinton had directed the adjutant general, with Colonel Van Rensselaer and a detachment of Cavalry, to accompany the remains to New York. They left Whitehall on the 2d of July, arriving at Albany on the 4th. Great preparations had been made to receive the remains with all possible splendor and éclat. The procession moved through all the principal streets of Albany, escorted by the military under arms, joined by an immense concourse of citizens. The remains were laid in state in the capitol. In every village on the route similar honors had been paid to the memory of the gallant Montgomery. The skeleton had been placed in a magnificent coffin, which had been sent by the governor. On the 6th of July, at 9 o'clock in the morning, a procession, perhaps still larger than the first, accompanied the coffin to the steamer Richmond, on board of which it was put with a large military escort. The boat floated down for several miles under the discharge of minute guns from both shores. It was astonishing to observe the strong sympathies which were everywhere evoked by the arrival of these sacred remains. The degree of enthusiasm that prevailed and the patriotic feeling that evinced itself reflected credit upon the State of New York, and not a voice was heard in disapproval of the tributes of respect thus paid to the memory of this hero of the Revolution.

Governor Clinton had informed Mrs. Montgomery that the body of the general would pass down the Hudson; by the aid of a glass she could see the boat pass Montgomery Place, her estate near Barrytown. I give her own quaint and touching terms as she describes the mournful pageant in a letter to her niece: "At length," she wrote, "they came by with all that remained of a beloved husband, who left me in the bloom of manhood, a perfect being. Alas! how did he return! However gratifying to my heart, yet to my feelings every pang I felt was renewed. The pomp with which it was conducted added to my woe; when the steamboat passed with slow and solemn movement, stopping before my house, the troops under arms, the Dead March from the muffled drum, the mournful music, the splendid coffin, canopied with crêpe and crowned by plumes, you may conceive my anguish; I can not describe it."

At Mrs. Montgomery's own request, she was left alone upon the porch when the Richmond went by. Forty-three years had elapsed since she parted with her husband at Saratoga. Emotions too agitating for her advanced years overcame her at this trying moment. She fainted and was found in an insensible condition after the boat had passed on its way. Yet the first wish of her heart was realized after years of deferred hope, and she wrote to her brother in New Orleans, "I am satisfied. What more could I wish than the high honor that has been conferred on the ashes of my poor soldier?"

The remains were finally interred in New York on the 8th of July, 1818, beneath the monument in front of St. Paul's Church. This monument was designed and executed in France, ordered by Benjamin Franklin. * * *

The British chargé d'affaires ad interim to the United States, Victor Drummond, Esq., having recently obtained General Montgomery's sword, presented it to me on the 3d of September, 1881, at Montgomery Place, where it has been added to the other relics of the general. * * *

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

House Joint Memorial No. 4, introduced by Committee on Military and Indian Affairs.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that—

Whereas great services patriotically rendered and sacrifices heroically made by service men and women in the World War places a great obligation upon the people of this Nation; and

Whereas as a result of these services many veterans are now becoming disabled in mind and body and in need of every consideration and assistance; and

Whereas existing laws and regulations do not promote the most satisfactory service to be rendered these disabled veterans; and

Whereas it is the desire of all worthy people that such sacrifices shall not go unrecognized and unrewarded: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the State of Idaho, the senate concurring, do earnestly recommend and request that the Congress take up for consideration and early enactment measures now pending and providing for the relief of disabled veterans, and especially do we urge the immediate enactment into law or regulation of the following:

1. The construction of new neuropsychiatric hospitals in sufficient numbers to care for the ever-increasing number of mental patients be immediately undertaken and pushed to completion, and that the staffs of such institutions be ample to care for the existing needs of the patients therein.

2. That veterans hospitalized for any disabilities of service origin (all disabilities of venereal nature or involving moral turpitude excluded) be granted a total temporary compensation status while undergoing hospitalization, this to include disabilities of service origin, or aggravation thereof, of less than 10 per cent.

3. That all beneficiaries of the Veterans' Bureau discharged from a hospital with disabilities duly connected with the service or aggravated thereby be placed on a total temporary compensation status until such time as vocational training becomes feasible for them, or until it becomes evident that the claimant is able to follow some gainful occupation.

4. The amendment of existing law so as to permit all claimants suffering with compensable disabilities of service origin be allowed compensation on hospital basis when so hospitalized.

5. That all disabled ex-service men be given the necessary hospital treatment and care irrespective of the status of his compensation claim.

6. That the two-year time limit, now in force under the amended Sweet Act of August 9, 1921, in which ex-service men suffering from tuberculosis or neuropsychiatric disabilities are entitled to compensation and benefits of the Veterans' Bureau, be extended to five years from date of discharge from active military or naval service.

7. That beneficiaries of the Veterans' Bureau suffering from neuropsychiatric disabilities of service origin, or aggravation thereof, rated 10 per cent or more and declared nonfeasible for vocational training, shall be allowed a 50 per cent compensation during such time as they are adjudged not feasible for training and unable to continually earn a livelihood.

8. That an ex-service man who is shown to have a tubercular condition of the bone, developing within three years after separation from active military or naval service of the United States, shall be considered to have acquired such disability in this service, or to have suffered an aggravation of the preexisting tubercular condition, and nothing should be construed to prevent a claimant from receiving benefits of compensation, medical care, and treatment for disabilities due to this disease, of more than 10 per cent, developing within three years from date of separation from active service, if the facts of the case substantiate his claim.

9. The amendment of section 310, war risk insurance act, so as to allow all disabled veterans compensation from date of discharge, providing they submit evidence showing a disability of compensable degree.

10. The amendment of existing law so as to inaugurate a system of permanent ratings by a board with laymen representation who will consider the man's previous education, earning ability, and general status in life, as well as his physical condition, with the end in view of establishing a permanent disability rating code.

11. That so much of section 300, Public 47, Sixty-seventh Congress, as establishes service connection of men suffering with neuropsychiatric and tuberculosis of a degree of 10 per cent or more, within two years after discharge, be made applicable to the original rehabilitation act, and that claimants having a disability constituting a vocational handicap and who are eligible to compensation of 10 per cent under the authority of this section, be granted section 2 training.

12. The amendment of existing law to make rehabilitation training available to widows and dependents of deceased persons who lost their lives in line of duty in military service.

13. The amendment of existing law to compensate any trainee who is injured while actively pursuing a course of training prescribed by governmental agency.

14. The amendment of section 2 of the rehabilitation act in such manner as to recognize any service connection established under provisions of section 300 of the war risk insurance act, amended, as sufficient for all purposes under the provisions of the rehabilitation act.

15. That a civilian board of appeals composed of three representatives, professional or business men, in each district, be established to pass on the cases of beneficiaries of the Veterans' Bureau who are dissatisfied with the treatment received from the rehabilitation department and desiring further training.

16. That ratings for compensation be made by a medical board, before which the claimant appears in person, and that such ratings be not decreased nor allowance of compensation overruled by central office.

17. That a rating board shall be established in each hospital, with full legal powers to render decisions, adjust awards, and make examinations.

18. That adequate provisions be made for the payment of compensation to claimant's widow and any direct issue of the union, such compensation to be payable to the widow so long as she remains unmarried and payable to the children until they become of legal age.

19. That the Veterans' Bureau immediately discontinue the use of form letters to claimants and in their stead write fully on each claim, giving such full information as claimant may need to complete his case; be it further

Resolved, That we express to the Congress of the United States the hope that some method of extra compensation for the service men and women of the World War may be provided whereby the material sacrifices of those who served may be repaid upon a basis which will be equitable and within the reasonable limit of expenditures which conditions will justify; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby instructed to forward this memorial to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America; that copies be sent the Senators and Representatives in Congress of this State and to the national headquarters of all duly recognized veterans' organizations.

This joint memorial passed the house on the 20th day of January, 1923.

That I have carefully compared the annexed copy of House Joint Memorial No. 6 with the original thereof adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the seventeenth legislative assembly of the State of Idaho and filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Idaho February 8, 1923, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Idaho. Done at the capitol at Boise, Idaho, this 10th day of February, A. D. 1923.

Secretary of State.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

House Joint Memorial No. 6.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent: That—

Whereas great distress obtains upon Government Federal reclamation projects in the State of Idaho; and

Whereas in the early history of the movement for the construction of Government reclamation projects in the State of Idaho the Government of the United States on April 5, 1904, caused to be published Senate bill No. 247, and at page 20 thereof in said document discloses the representations made by the representatives of the Government of the United States as to the costs of reclamation per acre upon the Boise project, and Mr. Newell, who at the time was director of the Reclamation Service, at a meeting of the citizens of Boise Valley, among other things, made the following representations:

"Replying to another question, he said the cost could not possibly exceed $20 or $25 per acre." The cost referred to by the director was the cost for a water right and completed project to be assessed against the lands of the Boise project; and

Whereas when the first unit of the Boise project had been completed, and the only one that has been completed, the Secretary of the Interior announced an $80 charge per acre for each acre of land; and

Whereas Senate Document No. 247, published by the Government of the United States, was spread broadcast throughout the Middle West and State of Idaho and elsewhere as an inducement for settlers to take up Government land and to enter into contractual relations with the Government of the United States and assume to pay the burden of reclamation; and

Whereas hundreds of settlers went upon Government lands and located within the reclamation projects of the State of Idaho, with the understanding that they would be required to pay from $20 to $25 per acre for the reclamation of their lands, and many of whom waited from five to nine years after their location upon desert lands before any water was furnished to them whatsoever upon their lands from said reclamation project or any other source; and

Whereas hundreds of settlers upon Federal reclamation projects in the State of Idaho have exhausted all of their resources in an effort to meet their obligations to the Government of the United States and at this time are practically penniless; and

Whereas the Federal reclamation projects in the State of Idaho are confronted with one of two alternatives—first, an extension of time must be given and arrangements made for a reasonable distribution of the payments required to be made to the Government; or, second, hundreds of settlers who have spent from 10 to 15 years of the best part of their lives in an attempt to make homes upon Federal reclamation projects in the State of Idaho will be forced to abandon their said homes and seek a living elsewhere, and that, too, in the declining years of their lives; and

Whereas the conditions heretofore stated in this memorial have been greatly augumented on account of excessive freight rates obtaining from the State of Idaho to eastern markets being practically prohibitive until the products grown upon Federal reclamation projects have rotted in the fields for the reason that they would not bring sufficient sums to pay transportation charges; and

Whereas justice and a desire to show our appreciation to those who have struggled for years to subdue the desert and to improve our country and its citizenship impels us to ask that the Congress of the United States of America, by act of Congress, postpone all payments overdue upon reclamation projects and spread all of the remaining payments to fall due, together with said past due payments, over a period of 40 years to the end that the Government may have returned to it by the citizens who have in most instances undertaken to reclaim desert lands on Federal reclamation projects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we earnestly urge the Congress of the United States of America to immediately enact legislation in harmony with this resolution; and be it

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho is hereby instructed to forward this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, and that copies of the same be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

This memorial passed the house on the 3d day of February, 1923.

M. A. KIGER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

This memorial passed the senate on the 5th day of February, 1923.

H. C. BALDRIDGE,
President of the Senate.

I hereby certify that the within House Joint Memorial No. 6 originated in the house of representatives during the seventeenth session of the Legislature of the State of Idaho.

DAVE BURRELL,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Washington that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Reed, Pa.
Brandegee	George	McCumber	Sheppard
Brookhart	Gooding	McKellar	Shields
Broussard	Hale	McKinley	Smith
Bursum	Harreld	McLean	Smoot
Calder	Harris	McNary	Stanfield
Cameron	Harrison	Moses	Stanley
Capper	Heflin	New	Sutherland
Curtis	Hitchcock	Norbeck	Swanson
Dial	Johnson	Oddie	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Warren
Ernst	Kellogg	Pepper	Watson
Fernald	Ladd	Phipps	Weller
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pittman	Williams
France	Lodge	Ransdell

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BROOKHART. Just so that I do not give up the floor.

Mr. WATSON. From the Committee on Finance——

Mr. FLETCHER. I object to the reception of the report.

Mr. WATSON. Very well; I am suppressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Indiana did not get his report through? It is too bad.

Mr. President, I think this is a very important motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I just wanted to note the fact that there is no order in the Chamber. We can not hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks the Senator from Mississippi. The Senate will be in order. Senators remaining in the Chamber will please be seated. The Senator from Iowa will suspend until the Senate is in order.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I do not think it would make much difference. So I hope the rule will not be too severely enforced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. BROOKHART addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time, he said:

I would like to ask unanimous consent before I leave the floor that when the Senate takes a recess to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator yield the floor for the purpose of submitting that request?

Mr. BROOKHART. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator did that, I make the point of order that the Senator can not submit a request of that kind and hold the floor at the same time.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit that simply because a Senator has the floor he is not precluded from asking for unanimous consent that when the Senate takes a recess to-day it recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow. Of course, the Senator from Washington has a right to object, but he has no right to insist that 95 other Senators have a right to make that request but that simply because a Senator has the floor he can not make it himself.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did not the Senator——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the point of order now if the Senator from Iowa yields the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask whether or not the Senator from Iowa yielded the floor when he submitted his request?

Mr. HEFLIN. He has not submitted any request.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But he must do that in order that it may be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. He said, "before I leave the floor I should like to submit a request." Let the reporter's notes be read.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If he is not submitting it now, all right.

Mr. HARRISON. We are talking now on a point of order. The matter is very clear. The Senator from Iowa——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the point of order that the Senator from Mississippi is taking the Senator from Iowa off the floor. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I am only arguing the point of order.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have not yielded the floor to anyone.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the Senator from Iowa will hold the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi will state the inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to see what the parliamentary status is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make the point of order that the Senate can not take the Senator from Iowa off the floor by submtiting a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that appeal I want to be heard.

Mr JONES of Washington. I ask the ruling of the Chair whether the Senator can do so in the time of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that the Presiding Officer has no desire to run the Senate beyond the orderly rules of the Senate——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit that I have a right to appeal from the decision of the Chair on the ruling.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator can not do that unless the Senator from Iowa yields.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Iowa yielded?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor He declines to yield, and he will proceed.

Mr. BROOKHART resumed his speech. After having spoken in all for about three hours and a half,

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Iowa desires to close his speech at this time.

Mr. BROOKHART. The first section of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the Senator desires to conclude his remarks at this time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; if that is satisfactory.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not asking the Senator to do so.

Mr. HEFLIN. The light is very dim, and I suggest that it is difficult to read the matter from which the Senator from Iowa is quoting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the interrogatory, Does the Senator from Iowa yield the floor?

Mr. BROOKHART. If the proposition to recess that the Senator from Nebraska made to me is to be carried out, yes; otherwise, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the Senator would like to close. That is agreeable. So I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that when the Senate closes its session to-day it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, with the understanding that we will have a short executive session now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the understanding the Senator suggests?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That we have a short executive session right now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know that I want to agree to any understanding of that sort.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. Some Senators have asked for an executive session. It is a matter of indifference to me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not want to have that put in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. I thought it was understood that we intended to have an executive session.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can move to go into executive session without unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its business it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request propounded by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object to it in that form. I will not object to a request for unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to state that I intended now to move an executive session. Of course, if the Senator does not desire an executive session, it makes no difference to me, but there are several Senators who have asked that we have an executive session. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. I think that is not a part of the unanimous consent we arranged. It was to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator I did not agree to any such unanimous consent. It was suggested to me over here that we take a recess and have a brief executive session when the Senator from Iowa concluded his address, and I understood that we were to have an executive session. I am indifferent about it, so far as I am concerned, but I hope the Senator will consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We had better carry out what was intended and what has been heretofore agreed to by unanimous consent, namely, to take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. LODGE. We can have an executive session at any time after to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not feel like closing the session in view of the situation, and think we had better go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa continue to yield the floor for the purpose of attempting to reach a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKHART resumed and concluded his speech, which, entire, is as follows:

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the developments here to-day have been remarkable in many ways. I am glad to find out that everybody in every way is in favor of a filibuster. It seems like they have all been in it at one time and another. As I look over the RECORD here to-day I find the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] holding a little spot on the floor for 14 hours, or such a matter, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for 13 hours, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] for I do not know how many hours. I shall have to assure you that I am too new in the Senate to live up to the grand precedents that have gone before me. I am afraid I shall not hold out that long. However, I shall do my level best; I assure you of that.

There is another thing about this occasion that is especially significant to me. This is the natal day of George Washington, the Father of Our Country, the greatest filibusterer in history. Yes; it was George Washington who filibustered the American people clear out of the British Empire. He went farther than a filibuster, even. A filibuster is lawful, I guess, as we learned here to-day. It is constitutional to start with, and nobody has suggested that even the Supreme Court would ever hold a filibuster to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States; but the Father of Our Country did not even have legal sanction for his great filibuster. No. He carried it on into a red, white, and blue revolution.

I remember the little incident that started that filibuster in those old days. I read it back when I was a schoolboy. It related to something about tea, about a tax on tea, and there were some of the compatriots of George Washington who did not like the looks of a tax on tea, and they filibustered that tea over into Boston Harbor. Yes; that occurred up in Boston—dear old Boston—

> The home of the bean and the cod,
> Where the Lowells speak only to the Abbotts.
> And the Abbotts speak only to God.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BROOKHART. On the same conditions that I have heretofore mentioned.

Mr. CALDER. I trust the Senator will pardon my suggesting a correction. I think that was the Cabots, not the Abbotts.

Mr. BROOKHART. I accept the correction. I am not very strong on poetry, anyhow.

Yes; that little filibuster conducted by the Father of our Country went on. I remember how the embattled farmers went out along Lexington Road with their guns in their hands in those old days. I also remember a day, on this 7th of November just past, when the embattled farmers of the United States went out with their ballots in their hands. Well we remember the crossing of the Delaware, and we remember Burgoyne, Valley Forge, and those terrible days, and we remember how even George Washington, driven to the wall, contemplated going back into the woods of America with a filibustering party to fight even in that desperate condition; and then finally we remember the days of the victory over Cornwallis at Yorktown. Yes; the French, Lafayette, Pulaski, Von Steuben—all those, we remember—came over and helped us by taking part in that greatest filibuster in the history of the world, the American Revolution. Therefore it is with somewhat of a pride of Americanism that I announce to you plainly and frankly that I am going to try to filibuster a little myself here to-night. You do not need to stay unless you want to. I will excuse all of you except the Senator from Washington. I think he ought to stay.

We had some little plans worked out about this filibuster some time ago. We thought if they would accommodate us fully on these night schools, so that we could present all our matters, we would let the daytime go with legitimate business.

But we had not gone very far until we found they wanted to adjourn about 10 or 11 or 12 o'clock, and we can not possibly make our record upon the proposition before the 4th of March, if these night schools do not run longer than that. Therefore plans have to be changed a little. The Senators who desired to take part in the school got anxious. They had prepared elaborately for the presentation of the subject, and having done that they did not want all that labor to go to waste. They wanted to get some use of it. I was put up as the first one to start the filibuster. I do not know just why that was, unless because the paper published a story about how I wanted to wear overalls in the United States Senate. The farm bloc is going to do that some of these days, so look out for it.

But before I got started to speak in the filibuster the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] showed up. We farmers are good-natured, so, of course, I gave way to him, and he talked about a day and a half explaining the proper place for the Supreme Court of the United States. That explanation is not completed. There will be some further reference to it later, because that is important, too, and will have to be fully figured out.

Now, following him the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] blew in, and I have a right to talk about him as I please, because I was originally a Missourian myself, and I sometimes have to be shown, too. It will be remembered that he brought in a map and pointed out the different sections and sectors and segments of the whole world and explained how we ought to get a few more of these sections, or islands, I believe it was. I am considerably in sympathy with that proposition. I would like to have an island myself.

I do not want to review all that happened here, but I kept giving way first to one and then to another. I was sitting on the front bench all the time ready to start this little filibuster. It went on until nearly 7 o'clock to-night before I got a real fair chance to say "Mr. President." Then, strangely enough, the Presiding Officer saw me and recognized me right away.

Here are the rest of our plans. I might as well let everyone know a little about it. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], who sits next to me, has some ideas about the ship subsidy and the filibuster, too. Having given proper attention to the scriptural phases of it, he proposes to aid us in the further proceedings here in this Chamber. He thought he would start probably somewhere about the history of Noah's ark. In fact he said he could demonstrate conclusively by scriptural quotations that Noah's ark never needed a subsidy; that it got by all right without the aid or consent of anybody else in the world.

Then the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], who is always very patient and always very well prepared, is going to present the scientific phases of the subsidy business. He has looked into the corpuscles of it and seen the red and white fellows who were battling the microbes of disease, and he thinks they got by without any subsidy. So he will be ready to explain that fully during the progress of the night schools in the Senate, provided they run late enough.

Then there is the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who lives out in a semidesert portion of the country. The best part of his State lies next to Iowa. He has been investigating the prehistoric situation as to ship subsidies. He will probably present its geological phases. He found the skeletons of the mammoths, the dinosauria, and a lot of those prehistoric fellows that slid around in the warmth of the ancient seas in those times, and he finds that they also got by without a ship subsidy. It is important, of course, that all of this be put in the RECORD if we have time.

Then there is the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. At the beginning of the discussion we really only expected one Senator from Wisconsin to participate in the filibuster, but strange things happen even in a debate on the ship subsidy, and now we have two Senators from that State who have joined us in the discussion, with the announcement that they will both be with us in the vote when we get ready to recommit the shipping bill. The senior Senator from Wisconsin has some very decided views about the ship subsidy. He thinks it is a mark of imperialism, and he will take up its political phases, coming down through the glorious history of Greece, the more glorious history of Rome, and then its decline and fall when it went into the subsidy business.

The senior Senator from the great State of Idaho [Mr. BORAH] joined us in what the headlines determined to call "the battalion of death." At the time he joined we expected that he would also be alone in the proceedings, but miracles happened again, and this morning the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] joined us in a wonderful oration, with lots of fight in it, lots of good farmer stuff in it. I mean to comment more on that than anything else before I get through my part of the proceedings to-night.

As for myself, I had decided principally to take up the question of the cooperative movement in the world. I have some very strong convictions about the development of cooperation, not only in the United States but throughout the world, and I have a few volumes on the subject to which I shall refer occasionally. I understand it has been stated that the Presiding Officer would rule that I could not read straight out of those volumes, since that is not speaking.

I hope he does not do that, because if I have to read a little while and then speak a little while, it will take me about twice as long to get through the volumes. But I have some other subjects also and I do not know of any better time to get rid of them than right now, and if the Doorkeepers will keep the occupants of the gallery in their places and not let them get away, I shall tell them about several of those subjects.

Have I overlooked something? Oh, yes; we only have about 10 days to do all this, and there are six of us Republicans, aided and abetted by about a dozen other Republicans, and the time is very short. Then it may have been noticed that the Democrats are butting in on us all the time and taking the floor away from us. We do not have a clear path. Yes; we listened to the history of the League of Nations in a magnificent address by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. I will say to the occupants of the gallery that that is good reading if they did not hear all of it. I know some of them could not keep awake during the entire time, but it was accurate and it was reliable. The distinguished Senator from Texas presented it very ably.

I understand the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] wants a chance to tell us something about cotton. Even the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has asked for a little time on the state of the Union. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has not had much opportunity up to date to discuss the real merits of the bill, and he desires to do that before we get through with the motion. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has collected a new installment, the most delightful installment yet, upon the administration of Federal reserve banks, and I am sure there is nothing can prevent his delivery of that speech before this session is over.

Yes, then we have the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] who always has something to say about the Democratic Party. He has not yet found out that it is dead. So he is going to tell us about how much alive he thinks it is. Nobody would want to stop him even if they could. So there are many difficulties in the way of acting upon the pending motion, and I do not know just when we will get to a vote on it.

The Presiding Officer stated the motion, I believe, to the effect that we should proceed to the consideration of House bill No. —; I have forgotten the number and I have not time to look it up, but it is the ship subsidy bill. I do not think we ought to proceed very far toward the consideration of that bill. I think there are several other subjects that need our attention that are of more importance to the common people of the United States than a subsidy to a few shipowners.

For instance, I think the transportation question is in a very serious condition. Everything in the world is unsettled, and the worst unsettled proposition we have is railroad transportation. In the early discussion of this subject I had a few words to say about the railroads, about their finances and about their operation, and as quickly as I had finished those remarks I was in trouble. I will say to Senators that I get into a good deal of trouble every once in a while anyhow. Up to date I have always got out some way or other. It was not long until along came the president of the Association of Railway Executives, who lit down upon my speech. I think now is just about as good a time as any to have it out with him. I do not know that there will be much entertainment in it, but it will pass away the time. I am going to be very brief because the time is short.

Out in Iowa we, at times, have been infested with a species of stock promoter who sold his stock through divers methods of false pretense. A favorite method was to donate a stock subscription to a leading bank or a citizen, and on the strength of this subscription secure subscriptions from others. In our State such banker or leading citizen has become designated and well known as a "bird dog." The railroads of the United States have inaugurated a similar system, which they have followed for a long time. Its end and purpose is to deceive the public about their value, their capital, their credits, their net earnings, and their subsidiary profits. In order to promote this deception they have an organized force of experts and high officials who are also experts in the channels of publicity. By their well-calculated system of presenting certain phases of the proposition and omitting others they are able to deceive the public and the press as to the real situation and facts of the railroad problem. In other words, they keep a whole kennel full of these "bird dogs" to attract the public attention while they ruthlessly shoot down the public prosperity with extortionate rates.

At the present time the leading "bird dog" in this kennel is Samuel M. Felton, president of the Chicago Great Western Railway. Mr. Felton is unusually well qualified for this exalted position. He is president of one of the poorest managed and worst waterlogged railroads in the United States. It has the best equipment and the finest facilities for the training of "bird dogs." Since his presidency the principal function of Mr. Felton has been to appear in rate cases as a leading witness, pointing out the inability of his road to earn anything and demanding rates high enough to yield a return upon its great reservoir of dirty water. Incidentally, and true to his species and training, he always insisted that these high rates should be granted to all the other roads, even though their profits arose to an unconscionable level.

During my campaign in Iowa the railroads detailed a small "bird dog" from the Rock Island system to demolish my platform, but since the election they have unleashed the leader of the kennel, and now in the Senate I must face Samuel M. Felton himself.

After I recently spoke in the Senate in reference to railroad matters Felton soon appeared in the press of the United States and said of my speech:

> It is doubtful if any man holding a high public office ever made, in an equal time, more baseless and reckless misstatements than you made regarding railway matters in this speech.

You see he made a world champion out of me the first round.

> An illustration of the way in which you make statements that have no basis in fact, is afforded by your assertion that, largely owing to inability to pay the freight rates, the apple growers of the State of Washington will this year be forced to dump 10,000 carloads of apples into the Columbia River. A telegram from the Wenatchee Valley Association, composed of the growers in the apple district of Washington, says that your statement "is not true," and adds, "the district has already shipped about 8,000 cars, and there remains about 5,000 cars."

I do not know much about Wenatchee or how many apple trees there are there, and, of course, I did not say anything in my speech about Wenatchee. An examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 18 and 19, 1922, on pages 626, 627, and 665—I hope the Senators will remember all those pages—will show in the first place that I made no such statement, but that I did say the Farmers' Union told me they were getting ready to dump 6,000 bushels at one time into the Columbia River and to take a moving picture of those apples as they go into the river. I then asked the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] if such was the fact. To this the Senator from Washington replied:

> Six thousand bushels? I would not be surprised if it were 6,000 carloads.

I then told him that my information was there would be 10,000 carloads dumped into the river altogether. To this he replied:

> With regard to that I will say I do not think the condition is overdrawn.

And later in responding to a question from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] the Senator from Washington said:

> The farmers had received about 5 cents a box after the freight was paid and after the expenses of picking, boxing, and packing were paid.

Now Senators will see who it was said it; who gave us the facts. I wonder why the president of this railroad did not jump onto the distinguished Senator from Washington? He is the one who brought in the question of freight rates specifically. Mr. Felton let the Senator from Washington alone and got after me because I am new on the job, and not very well able to take care of myself, as Senators know.

Later I put into the RECORD a telegram from Mr. John Quincy Adams concerning this situation. I believe even the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] would not question a telegram from a man whose name is John Quincy Adams. He is president of the Farmers' Union of Spokane, Wash. Since then I have received a telegram from the master of the State Grange of Washington to the same effect. They corroborate their Senator in his statement that one-third of their apple crop must be destroyed because it does not bring enough money to pay the freight to market. If the railroads want to feed their "bird dogs" apples, I suggest that they transfer Mr. Felton out to the Columbia River.

Mr. Felton is next grievously exercised because of my statement that the securities representing all of the values of all of the railroads can be bought on the market for $12,000,000,000, while under this law we are required to pay in rates on $18,900,000,000. In this repect he does not deny the potent fact that the securities will actually sell for $12,000,000,000; but he criticizes viciously my statement as to things considered by the commission in fixing the value; then quotes Commissioner Hall to the effect that no consideration whatever was given to stocks and bonds, and asserts that it was all based on the valuation law introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and passed by Congress in 1913. In the first place, I desire to say that the so-called La Follotte law did not lay down a rule of valuation. It laid down elements of investigation, and left the rule of valuation for determination by congressional action. The transportation act of 1920 supplied this deficiency, and caused the commission to use all the fictitious elements of section 19a, as well as the property accounts of the railroads themselves, in determining this value, which exceeds the market value by $7,000,000,000.

At this point I wish to say that when the railroads came through Iowa, and when they went through other States in the Union, when they took our farms to use in the railroad business they condemned them and were able to take them at their fair market value. That is all they paid. Now, when a farmer comes along and says to them, "Your property is only worth the fair market value of the securities that represent all its value," they fly up in the air and light heavily down onto that farmer. He is out to confiscate something.

I have an editorial here from a newspaper in Iowa quoting a speech by Mr. Samuel O. Dunn, the editor of the Railway Age, before the Mason City Chamber of Commerce. I read from the editorial as follows:

> Samuel O. Dunn, editor of the Railway Age, addressing the Mason City Chamber of Commerce, asserted that the proposal of Senator BROOKHART to arbitrarily reduce the established valuation of the railways by $7,000,000,000 would result in financial disaster. Such reduction, he stated, would destroy most of the value of railroad stocks and a large part of the value of railroad bonds. The result would be to throw many railroads into bankruptcy, and with them would go banks, trust, life insurance, and other companies which own railroad bonds. Furthermore, the reduction, Mr. Dunn said, would stop investment in railway securities and render impossible the providing of required facilities—the equipment which the late car shortage showed was so seriously needed.

A little later on in the evening, if Senators will remain long enough, I shall have something to say about that old calamity howl of the railroads, "Our credit is destroyed and we can not sell our bonds; we shall have to have higher rates." That is always the cure. I shall have quite a good deal to say about that.

They also say in their advertisements in the newspapers, "We can not get the funds even to equip and maintain our roads." I shall have something to say about that also. If Senators wait long enough they will get all of this.

> The situation thus created, Mr. Dunn continued, would bring the country quickly face to face with the question as to whether it would abandon its present policy of drastic regulation for a policy of Government ownership of the railroads.

Mr. Dunn contended that an attempt to reduce the valuation of the railroads by legislative fiat, as Senator BROOKHART proposes, "would be to attempt confiscation of property upon the largest scale ever attempted in any country at any time, except in Russia."

Of course, Mr. Dunn knows a great deal about railroad "bird-dogism." He knows a great deal about how to advertise the false statistics and the false combination of figures that will deceive the public; but when it comes to confiscation by Government action, I am going to show Senators to-night, if they will stay long enough to hear me, by quotations from an editorial in the Manufacturers' Record that the railroad law, combined with certain manipulations in the administrations of the Federal reserve banks, confiscated $32,000,000,000 of the farmers' property, and Mr. Dunn has not shed a single tear over the fate of the 7,000,000 farmers, many of them already in bankruptcy and nearly all of them at the verge of it, because of that governmental action.

I may miss some of the points Mr. Dunn made, and I should regret to do that. He speaks of reducing this value by a legislative fiat. I wish to say to him that he has increased the value of those stocks and bonds by all sorts of fraudulent fiats. It is a market that he himself created for those stocks and bonds in his own stock exchange, managed by his own crowd of financiers, that finally found this value of $12,000,000,000 for all the stocks and bonds, as I have quoted. I did not make that market; no law of Congress made that market, and yet he insists upon theoretical schemes of valuation that will impose additional burdens on the farmer, who pays more than half the freight of the country anyway. The farmer always pays the freight. He never adds it in. Other lines of business add it in as a part of the cost of production, as a part of the original cost, and then dispose of their products, not only with freight added in but with a profit and commission for adding in the freight; but the farmer pays the freight; he writes his check for it. When he buys the equipment which is necessary for his person, for his home and for his farm, the freight is all added in after the manner I have described, and he again writes his check for the freight.

Mr. Dunn points out that the radicals who are supporting the policy of confiscation are receiving the support of producers and farmers who are hostile toward the railroads because of the high freight rates, and he speculates briefly concerning the effect of a wholesale policy of confiscation if once entered upon. He says on this point:

"The farmers of this country own more property than any other single class of people. Their farms and other property are valued at almost $80,000,000,000, or four times as much as the railways"—

Yes; they are valued at six and one-half times as much—

and yet they are the class who are being chiefly relied upon by the radicals to enable them to carry through this program of railroad confiscation. It is hardly conceivable that the class of people who own the largest amount of property in the country will be the first to support a policy of wholesale confiscation of property.

That sounds big; that sounds effective; but you know what the farmers want of the Samuel O. Dunns and the Samuel M. Feltons. There is just one thing they want out of those chaps: They want them to be honest. That is the only thing they ask. They took the farms of the farmers at their fair market value, and the farmers want to pay them a return on the fair market value of their property, using their own rule; but they have succeeded in avoiding that in one way and another, and especially by some of the provisions of the rate-making section of the new railroad law which took effect on March 1, 1920.

The New York Times discussed this subject; and, whatever may be said about this subject, they talk about it a little. Yes; I have clippings from every direction about their fear of the confiscation of part of the value of their property. If that be confiscation, I want to say that that outfit of financiers confiscated, as I shall prove to you, more than $32,000,000,000 of the property value of the farmers of the United States.

Mr. President, I have really forgotten where I was in this speech. I will try to see. If I happen to repeat a sentence or two, will that be against the rules?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON in the chair. No.

Mr. BROOKHART. In order that there may be no mistake upon this proposition on valuation, this time I am going to submit to the Senate the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission in Ex parte 74, in the matter of the applications of carriers in official southern and western classification territory for authority to increase rates, found on pages 228 and 229 of Fifty-eighth Interstate Commerce Commission. I think I have that case here. Yes; I have it. No; that is not it, either. I am sorry, Mr. President, but I am afraid I shall have to postpone that until the next section of my remarks is delivered, about day after to-morrow; but, at any rate, I promise you it shall be put in the RECORD.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is afraid I shall run out of material here because that document is overlooked. I want to reassure the Senator from Florida. I have two desks' full over there yet.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it is very important to have that. I wanted to have it go in the RECORD in connection with the Senator's discussion of it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me look again. No; that is not the one.

Mr. Felton next says that the valuations of railroad securities were at the lowest ever reached in 1920, because as a result of Government operation the net rate was actually only 1.7 per cent.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] thinks I am talking too loud. He thinks my voice will play out. He does not know me at all. I used that voice for nine months, and it was better at the end than it was at the beginning.

He [Felton] then claims that this condition was brought about by Government regulation. I forget whether I said that once before or not. In answer to this I will say that when the railroads condemn a farm for their use they pay for it only the fair market value, and the Government would have the right to condemn the railroad securities under the same rule. Yes; I have a Supreme Court decision on that point, Mr. President, but I have not that with me. I will produce that, though, before the discussion is ended, and we will see that it gets into the RECORD properly.

I deny that they have been reduced in price by Government regulation. The transportation act was not advocated by me nor by the shippers of the country. It is substantially what was demanded by the association of railroad security holders, and it is Mr. Felton's own bill. I think it is unfair for a railroad president to kick on his own bill. I think he ought to stand by it.

If the value of securities has been forced down in the market, it is because of the mismanagement and the treachery to both the people and the Government of such men as Felton.

He next quotes a valuation of $13,969,200,000 made by Clifford Thorne in 1913. As I was associated with Thorne at that time, I know how that valuation was made. The market value of the securities of 35 roads was ascertained, and the percentage of this to the whole capitalization of those roads; then the total capitalization of all the roads was multiplied by this percentage. Mr. Thorne intended that these 35 roads should be above the average and always claimed that his valuation was greater than the actual value of the stocks and bonds of all the roads. His purpose was to be conservative and to get a value well above the market price. It is probable that if he had obtained the actual value it would not much have exceeded $10,000,000,000 at that time. From this basis there is no very great shrinkage in the price to $12,000,000,000 three years later.

Felton says they have invested four and one-half billion dollars of new capital since 1913. These figures are up to date, swelled a quarter of a billion dollars, and three years past the time we are talking about. Altogether, they should be reduced by one and three-fourths billion dollars, which leaves my original statement well sustained.

This "bird dog," Felton, next seeks to attract the attention of the people away from this valuation by the charge that I participated in public gatherings of socialists and was indorsed by the socialists of Iowa for United States Senator. Why, Mr. President, we have not enough socialists in the State of Iowa to wad a popgun. You would not have anything if you had their indorsement.

I never saw a live one myself. I have heard of them occasionally. I do not know whether it would make any difference if a Socialist indorsed you or not. If you were telling the truth, I rather apprehend it would not, and somehow or other I never got afraid of a bird dog when he barked that kind of names at me. I just let him bark. But there is a purpose in all these statements. They are absolutely false and a part of the usual campaign of the railroads against every man who seeks to tell the truth about their iniquitous system of capitalization—the darkest, blackest pages in the economic history of the world.

I was up in New York the other day, and after I had discussed railroads and other matters a distinguished financier said to me: "How about your Iowa country? You are not fair to the railroads." He said: "Why, I was out in Iowa when your land was worth $5 an acre, and we built a railroad along beside it, and it was worth $150 an acre." Then I said: "Yes; Iowa is the best agricultural spot in this big round world. There is not another block of land more than 200 miles square like Iowa, with as little waste land in it as Iowa." I said: "We gave one-seventh of that princely domain to the railroads, and that one-seventh, at $150 an acre, would more than pay for them. Then we voted taxes on towns and townships, and we voted bonds on counties, and we built railroads, and now," I said to him, "you own them back here in New York."

That is the way they built the railroads for us. Why, look over the history of the Union Pacific, which comes over to the edge of Iowa. They got Government aid for that road to the extent of about $30,000 a mile. Those were the days of subsidies. You know, those days are over now. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to that fact. Then, after getting aid from the Government at $30,000 a mile, they sold bonds to the public at about $30,000 a mile more, and then they sold stock, $200,000,000 of it, to the public at about 10 cents on the dollar. They got about $10,000 a mile more, or $20,000,000, for that stock—about $70,000 a mile altogether that these patriotic and philanthropic gentlemen who managed our railroads secured from the Government and the public to build the Union Pacific Railroad. When we got into the evidence of its cost we found that it cost a little less than $30,000 a mile to build the whole outfit. The rest of it went to New York and other seaports.

That is the trouble with this railroad situation. Oh, yes; they say we want to forget that history; we want to pass all that by. "We are doing better now. We would not do a thing like that at this time." No; but they could do something like Felton did with his road out there. I am going to tell you about that later on in the evening. I have some documents here figuring that all out, and I am going to let you know just how they work things up to date, how they inflate values, and then ask the farmers to pay them rates forever to get a return upon all that dirty water.

Well, you know, we have concluded that if we can get a few more sets of overalls in the United States Senate and in the other House of Congress maybe we can stop that sort of thing; and you know we are perfectly willing to try it, too.

Mr. Felton next seeks to conceal the guaranty provisions of the law because the commission was unable to levy rates high enough to yield the 6 per cent. The failure of the commission to raise the 6 per cent—now 5½ per cent—does not disprove the guaranty, but does prove that the American people have broken down under the burden and can not pay it on any rates under any law.

He next seeks to cover his tracks by the assertion that I prophesied that Government expenses during the war would be $400,000,000 a year cheaper. In answer to this I want to deny that I ever made any such prophecy in regard to the operation of our railroads by the Government under the management of men like Felton. He takes himself out of the service at that time, and then rushes to the defense of the other managers who sought to discredit Government operation and practice the darkest treason against their country; and I want now to cite in this RECORD a few instances of this treason.

Mr. Felton bases his defense of these traitors upon a general statement of William G. McAdoo, and I want to quote the testimony of McAdoo in the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee:

Testifying before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce February 1, 1922, William Gibbs McAdoo, Director General of Railroads during the first year of the Federal control, after paying tribute to the loyalty of railroad workers, declared:

(1) That some prominent railroad officials did not or would not render loyal and efficient service and were subsequently removed from management.

(2) That the offending officials failed to maintain average earnings for their corporations, thereby incurring heavy deficits that were met by the Government.

(3) That had these faithless officials performed their full duty while they were intrusted with railroad management there would not have been a deficit during the first year of Federal operation.

(4) That pay rolls were padded, thereby imposing an unjust and unnecessary burden upon the Government of hundreds of millions of dollars.

A check was made upon a division of a road from Ottumwa, Iowa, to Kansas City, Mo., and during the two weeks of this check on the management of that railroad there was not a freight train on the division that got over a single major grade on the road without stopping and cutting in two. In other words, an engine had to travel 250 miles to haul the train 100 miles. The facts were presented to the general manager, he stopped that thing in 24 hours, because it was being done under his orders to discredit Government operation of railroads.

There are some people who are peculiarly disloyal to our Government. If there is any business of the Government that ought to be done by the Government, they take the attitude that they would like to have it for themselves, and they immediately set up the howl that "the Government is inefficient and its business can not be done by itself, but you must turn it over to us and we will make profits out of it and do it efficiently," but always forgetting about the size of the profits.

In a letter to President Rea, of the Pennsylvania, Mr. McAdoo said on the 17th of January, 1918:

I would not be candid if I did not tell you that I am fully satisfied with the efficiency of the management—

No; it is "I am not fully satisfied." You see, I almost made a mistake there. I left out that "not," and we want all the "nots" properly preserved in the RECORD. So I will have to read that again, if it will not be against the rules:

I would not be candid if I did not tell you that I am not fully satisfied with the efficiency of the management of the Pennsylvania Railroad. I believe that great improvement can be made, and I look to you and the officers of that system to bring that improvement about at the earliest possible moment. * * * I would not be frank if I did not tell you that unless there is a decided improvement in the efficiency of the Pennsylvania system a change in the management will become inevitable.

[At this point Mr. BROOKHART suggested that when the Senate recess to-day, it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, when a point of order was made and ruled upon.]

Mr. BROOKHART. Now, Mr. President, that got me all muddled up, and I do not know how soon I will get straightened out, but I think I will some time during the evening.

Mr. McAdoo wrote a similar warning to President Willard of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad on the date of January 17, 1918, saying:

I would be less candid if I did not tell you that I am dissatisfied with the management of the Baltimore & Ohio. I think it has proven inefficient and unequal to the present situation. I am sure it can be improved and I expect the improvement. I speak thus frankly, because I feel that you ought to know that a change in the management of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad will be inevitable unless better results are speedily obtained.

You see, when we find out what Mr. McAdoo really thought and swore to about the management of the railroads, it did not attain to that high and patriotic pinnacle which is pictured by the "bird dogs" of the railroad system.

In a letter to A. T. Dice, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, dated January 19, 1918, Mr. McAdoo said:

I am not at all satisfied with conditions on the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad. From the reports I get it is not measuring up to the demands of the situation. This appears to be due to lack of efficient management. I would not be candid if I did not tell you that unless there is a prompt improvement in operating conditions—

[At this point a page placed a glass of water on Mr. BROOKHART'S desk.]

Mr. BROOKHART. No; take it away. I never drink anything stronger, but I never drink when I am speaking. And now I have lost my place again. I will have to read that letter over again. This is a mighty good letter, anyway. He said:

I am not at all satisfied with conditions on the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad.

From the reports I get it is not measuring up to the demands of the situation. This appears to be due to a lack of efficient management. I would not be candid if I did not tell you that unless there is a prompt improvement in operating conditions a change in management will become inevitable. This is a time of war, and excuses can not be accepted. I do not expect the impossible, but I am sure that an improvement in your railroad can be made through more efficient management.

Yes; it was in a time of war, when these railroad managers owed a patriotic duty to their country, but they deliberately wanted this inefficient management everywhere in order to discredit Government operation and retain the roads which had yielded them so many enormous fortunes in that dark, black history of railroad finances.

Now, again. Mr. McAdoo seems to have talked to most all these railroad chaps, and they do not mention anything about this talk, either, when they jump on me for being a Bolshevik. They forget all about that. To Mr. W. G. Besler, president of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, on January 19, 1918, he wrote, as follows:

We are in a great war and excuses are not worth anything. The only thing that tells now is results. The public demands them and the life of the Nation demands them. I would not be candid—

You see Mr. McAdoo did not miss that "not" in any case. It was there every time. He said:

I would not be candid if I did not tell you that I am not fully satisfied with the efficiency of the management of the Central Railroad of New Jersey. I believe that great improvement can be made, and I look to you and the other officers of that system to bring about that improvement at the earliest moment. I would not be frank if I did not tell you that unless there is a decided improvement in the efficiency of the Central Railroad of New Jersey system a change in the management will become inevitable. This I should deeply regret.

I should not have regretted it as much as Mr. McAdoo if he had removed Mr. Felton and some of the other bird dogs.

I find I have some more of these, Mr. President. I am afraid I shall not have time to get through, but I will do the best I can

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the article which the Senator from Iowa is now reading proves the assertion that I have uttered on this floor time and time again, that there was a conspiracy to bring on deflation. The article which the Senator is now reading from the secret conclave held behind closed doors proves that fact beyond peradventure.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that I have already said that he has hardly yet got started on this Federal reserve bank proposition. The Manufacturers' Record editorial here has some 18,000 words, I believe. It is the longest editorial that was ever written, and it is hotter stuff, I believe, than are the speeches of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield for a question, Mr. President; but I am not through.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Iowa was not showing any disposition not to yield when I addressed him. I wish to say to the Senator that I have one of those pamphlets. There were a hundred of them in all and the type was knocked down after the hundred copies were printed. Those copies were to be handed around and secretly used. I obtained one of them the other day, and the Manufacturers' Record also got one of them, upon which that editorial is based. I expect to read from one of them on the floor very soon.

Mr. BROOKHART. I judge from that that the Senator from Alabama has not yet started on this phase of the question. I hope that he may take it up and fully discuss it, because in this first speech of mine I shall not have time fully to present it.

However, Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Washington would like for me to end my first speech now, and I wish merely to finish this quotation. Then I shall yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Iowa is mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Washington is enjoying the speech of the Senator from Iowa very much.

Mr. BROOKHART. I thank the Senator. Just a little bit more and then I shall consider the proposition which was made to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

> And I think we are all agreed it would be very ill advised to give out any impression that any general overhauling of rates was discussed at this conference. We have discussed the general credit situation in your committee, which has been appointed with plenary powers, will prepare a statement which will be given out to the press to-morrow morning, and we will all see what it is. You can go back to your banks and, of course, tell your fellow directors as frankly as you choose what has happened here to-day, but caution them to avoid any premature discussion of rates as such. We have had an exceedingly interesting day, gentlemen. The suggestions which have been made are valuable, and we have profited by your views. I wish to express on behalf of the board our appreciation of your coming here and to thank you for the unselfish and loyal interest you have taken in the Federal bank situation throughout the country in giving this matter the careful thought and consideration that you have. And I am sure that the spirit which has manifested itself at this meeting here to-day will spread throughout all the country, to the member and nonmember banks; and if it does we can look the future in the face with courage and confidence.

I have made this preliminary statement for the purpose of showing what happened in reference to these railroad rates about which I have been talking to-night at that same meeting.

> Mr. Watts offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:
> Resolved, That this conference urge as the most important remedies that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board give increased rates and adequate facilities such immediate effect as may be warranted under their authority, and that a committee of five be appointed by the chair to present this resolution to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board with such verbal presentation as may seem appropriate to the committee.

There was the financial board planning to boost the rates upon the farmers of the United States at the same moment they were planning the most disastrous deflation ever dreamed of in the history of man.

Here is what the Manufacturers' Record says of that deflation. I especially invite this to the attention of the Senator from Alabama when extravagant statements are spoken of. In certain quarters it may have been thought that the Senator from Alabama was extravagant in his statements, but here is what the Manufacturers' Record says:

> As the Manufacturers' Record showed a few weeks ago the decline in the value of farm lands in 1920 and 1921 under deflation amounted to about $18,000,000,000 and the decline in the value of farm products of these two years, as compared with 1919 prices, showed a decrease of over $14,000,000,000, making a total loss to the farmers of upwards of $32,000,000,000.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States, through its Federal Reserve Board, through its commissioners who have put these rates upon the farmers of the United States, brought calamity upon the farmers of this country. Now, it is seeking to add further to the calamity by providing another subsidy for shipping and entirely ignoring the farm legislation that is so essential to give us even a little chance to recover from this great calamity. There never was a situation that so strongly demanded that the shipping bill should be dropped, that this motion be voted down, and that the farm legislation be considered; yet I do not know whether or not it will be done. I do know, however, that whether it is done or not, whether the farmers get any chance or not, some of us in this Chamber are going to keep the pledges we made to the farmers of our States; and if I close my speech at this time. the next time I speak I promise you that I shall make a presentation of what the farmers of the State of Washington and some other States think. I think the farmers are all alike from Boston to Seattle. I think there is no difference in their opinion. I think, yes, I know, every labor organization and every national farm organization has declared against this ship subsidy bill. There is nobody asking for it except those who seem to think they may profit out of the subsidy that will be taken from the Treasury of the United States and turned over to a few private parties for carrying on the shipping enterprise.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Just a question in that connection, if the Senator will permit me. The Senator has pointed out that Mr. Edmonds, the editor of the Manufacturers Record, has called attention to the fact that deflation cost the farmers of the United States in the deflation of farm products and of farm lands $32,000,000,000, which is $9,000,000,000 more than the war debt of all the people of the United States, so that the farmers of the United States have been forced to suffer these losses for the benefit of a few people in the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. And also have to pay the war debt to a large extent.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask if the Senator from Nebraska objects to the unanimous-consent agreement that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object to it in that form. I am willing to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock, but I want that to end the evening session. If the Senator wants an executive session, he can move it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator objects, very well.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what I understood to be the Senator's proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was.

Mr. BROOKHART. It was not a part of the agreement that an executive session would be had.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was not a part of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CURTIS. We do not ask that that be a part of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The proposition was that unanimous consent be given that when the Senate closes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The proposition was to recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No suggestion of that kind came to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that there has been no business transacted since the last call for a quorum. This discussion has not been business, and the Senator from Iowa has not yielded the floor for any purpose except to reach an agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has yielded the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. The request has been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Iowa has not yielded the floor; he still holds it to ascertain whether a unanimous-consent agreement can be reached.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that the Senator from Iowa yielded the floor so that a unanimous-consent request might be made, to which unanimous-consent request objection was made, which is the transaction of business. Now I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas raise a point of order?

Mr. CURTIS. I raise the point of order that there has been no transaction of business since the last quorum was called, and the Senator from Iowa has not yielded the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington submitted a unanimous-consent request to the Senate and the Senator from Nebraska objected to it. If that is not business what is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule. This question in almost substantially the same form arose during the night session the other evening, at which time the Chair held that a suggestion for a unanimous-consent agreement had not been perfected unless the Chair had become an element in it and had asked if there was objection, in which case it would constitute business. On this occasion a request was made for unanimous consent, and the Chair asked if there was objection, and an objection was interposed by the Senator from Nebraska. Consequently, the Chair rules that the call for a quorum is in order, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Without losing the right to call the roll, I think we had better go ahead——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, let us have the roll called. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sheppard
Ball	George	McKinley	Smith
Brandegee	Hale	Moses	Stanley
Brookhart	Harrison	New	Sutherland

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CAMERON, Mr. ERNST, Mr. NORBECK, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not recorded as having voted.

Mr. HARRISON. I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result having been declared, it is too late now for the Senator to be recorded.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that my name may be recorded in the negative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I object to any business being done until a quorum is secured.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

After a little delay, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. COLT, and Mr. KEYES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

to get all of these in before the sun rises in the morning. Oh, there is a lot of time. It is only 17 minutes past 8 right now.

"If, in these circumstances," asks Mr. McAdoo, "there had been no deficit, what becomes of the charge of extravagance and wasteful inefficiency now preferred against Federal control? Do not these figures show that the waste, inefficiency, and incompetency, if any, was shown by the railroad executives when they were operating the railroads for account of the Government during the first five months of 1918?"

* * * * * * *

"What excuse can they offer for their reckless and indiscriminate criticism of the operation of the railroads under Federal control when, figured on any basis, by far the greater part of the deficit for the year 1918 occurred when they were operating the carriers for the account of their Government?"

Again:

To the charge of inefficiency is added that of disloyalty, or worse, made by Frank McManamy, assistant director of operations during Federal control, who declared that railroad officials "have wrongfully paid out millions of dollars" in padded pay rolls. These overpayments, Mr. McManamy said, "were deliberate," and in direct violation of the instructions of the director general.

Now, here is what he says:

The record, then, clearly shows that some railroad officials were incompetent and inefficient, as well as dishonest; and that during the most critical period of the Nation's history they withheld the loyal and willing service that was cheerfully given by the railroad workers.

I shall have to withdraw that last statement as it was not a part of the quotation. I want to get this exactly right, Mr. President. It is important that we be very particular in that respect, especially this evening. It is true, but not the statement of McManamy.

Mr. President, I have pointed out some of the evidence furnished by the Director General showing the disloyalty of the managers of these roads during the war-time operation for the express purpose of discrediting Government operation; yet, bad as that management was during all that time, inexcusable and unpatriotic as it was, nevertheless it was $1,426,000,000 cheaper to the American people than the first year of operation after the Government turned the roads back to private control. I am not going to back away from the statement I made, for it is true. I have talked to railroad workers in many States, and everywhere they have told me the same story; how the management directed them to do things inefficiently in order to muss up the service and disgust the public and also to increase the expenses.

With all that record it is not fit that a Senator of the United States should find out facts! He is a bad man who finds out the truth about that, and he is a terribly bad man if he gets up in the midst of a filibuster and tells the folks about it. I believe the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] would say that I am getting every day in every way worser and worser. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I want to tell you more about my friend Felton, of the Chicago & Great Western. I promised to do so, and I will do it now.

This Great Western Railway, managed and operated by this same Samuel M. Felton, is a wonderful piece of economic machinery. It has a financial story that is not second to very many. It is almost entitled to a championship place.

The Chicago & Great Western Railroad Co., which was a reorganization of the Chicago & Great Western Railway Co., issued, upon its organization, capital stock of the par value of $86,268,115 and bonds of the par value of $18,500,000.

I hope the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] will preserve all those figures, for they are very important.

For the total capital liability thus created the new company received, as shown by the records of the former railroad securities commission, only $33,214,443.31 of consideration.

I think almost anybody can remember that 31 cents.

It is true, however, that from the proceeds of part of the securities delivered to the reorganization managers under the agreement between them and the various stockholders' committees, were paid notes of the old company, together with interest, amounting to $10,653,414.

I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that while he was out of the Chamber I gave some very important figures, and, if the Senator desires to get them, I will repeat them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to that. The Senator from Iowa can use the time that way just as well as in any other.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Washington is the most accommodating filibusterer in the world. His record is clear on every point.

In a sense this may be considered a consideration received by the new company; or, rather, the stocks of the old company, which were received by the new in exchange for its own capital stock, may rightly be deemed of proportionately higher value with the note obligations of the old company, which had priority over them, extinguished. Adopting this more liberal view of the value behind the stocks and bonds of the new company on its organization, the total increases to $43,867,857.31.

I call the attention of Senators particularly to the fact that the 31 cents stuck all the way through.

For this value received, the company issued its stocks and bonds to the amount of $104,768,115. The market value of the bonds issued, having been at that time $17,020,000, the assets remaining behind the new stock amounted to only $26,847,857.31. There is, therefore, $59,420,257.69 (or about 70 per cent) of "water" in the outstanding stock of the Chicago Great Western Railroad Co.

We lost the 31 cents that time, because we had to subtract it to get that 69 cents; but the big point in the proposition is that my friend Felton's road—this man Felton who calls down governors, Senators, and anybody else who tell about a railroad—is operating a road on a lake of $59,000,000 of water. I think he ought to be changed to a navigation manager. Then I think the Senator from Washington ought to give him a subsidy. However, I think I will show a little later on that he has got a subsidy now. I have some documents upon that question, and, if Senators will remain long enough, I shall try to get to it later in the evening.

There is another thing about Felton and his railroad financing and about his method of getting the farmers to pay freight rates. He goes on the stand in a rate case—I have heard him, and so I know—and swears under oath that they can not earn any percentage on the capitalization of the Great Western Railway. Of course, anybody would know that, for when this $59,000,000 of water comes in sight there would not be much return on that kind of a road, anyhow. Of course, however, he is not particularly asking for the Great Western, because Senators will understand that Mr. Felton is the bird dog of the organization and he is acting for his master. We want to find out who the master was. There is some evidence about that in these same capitalization figures:

The totals of the amount of "water" above shown to exist in both classes of the capital stock of the Chicago Great Western Railroad Co. is $59,420,257.69—

I read that a few moments ago—

That this amount is correct may also be shown without regard to the proportion contained in each class of stock. The total amount of new stock issued directly by the present company under the reorganization was $44,489,078; the amount of stocks and bonds issued to the syndicate were $60,277,937; grand total, $104,767,015. The total consideration received by the company directly and through the syndicate in cash and old securities was $43,867,857.31; excess of par value of new securities above the value received therefor, $60,899,157.69; deducting the difference between the par value and the market value of the $18,500,000 bonds sold, viz, $1,480,000, the true amount of water is again seen to be (after adding the $1,100 (par) of common stock issued and not included in the published reorganization plan), $59,420,257.69.

Mr. President, that is not really what I wanted to explain. I omitted some other figures, and I think I will have to go back and read them. I quote:

Upon analyzing the plan under which the new securities were issued it will be found that the water is distributed as follows:

I wanted to know something about the distribution of that water in the Chicago Great Western Railroad Co. Distribution is an important item. I found that out when we came to distribute the time for this debate, for it took me four days to get the floor, and I do not want to give it up for four days more if I can help it.

I. In the new preferred stock—
(1) $30,884,798 of new preferred stock was issued in exchange for the old debenture stock having a market value of $10,971 757.99. Water was injected, therefore, to the amount of $13,913,040.01—

I would hate to lose that one cent—

(2) $10,136,604 was issued to the reorganization managers and sold to the syndicate formed to provide necessary cash for the new company. This syndicate furnished the company $20,653,414 (including amount paid to the note holders of the old company above referred to). But they received bonds of the company, having a market value of $17,000,020. Therefore, the total consideration applicable to this amount of preferred stock was only $3,633,414, and the water in same is $6,503,190.
Total water in the $41,021,402 of preferred stock outstanding (almost 50 per cent) $20,416,230.01.

That is the water job that is managed by Samuel M. Felton.

II. In the new common stock.
(1) Common stock to the amount of $13,604,280 was issued in exchange for the old preferred stock A, which had a market value of $3,125,810.07.

It was worth $3,000,000, but there were $13,000,000 of common stock issued for it.

Of common, therefore, more than 75 per cent is "water," or $10,478,469.93.

Then there is another item here of $28,525,557.75, making the total "water" in the $45,246,713 of common stock outstanding over 86 per cent—$39,004,027.68.

There is something else in here that I seem to have missed. Here it is. I wanted to find out who was Mr. Felton's boss in all these transactions. I should like to get some of this farm legislation under consideration, if we could do something for the farmers in some way, and Mr. Felton and these chaps who get after me about this question would like to get more stocks and more bonds and more "water" and more rates and more dividends.

Here they say:

It is worthy of note that in addition to the fee of $500,000 paid to Morgan & Co. under their agreement with the committees of the various stockholders of the old company the Morgan syndicate made a profit of $6,003,190. It is not clear how the syndicate rendered any such service to the new company or to the former stockholders as would justly entitle them to any such profit. Apparently the only detail of the final reorganization plan which necessitated the service of bankers was the sale of $18,500,000 of bonds. As these bonds are secured by an absolute first mortgage on the entire property of the Chicago Great Western Co., it certainly seems that $6,000,000 is an excessive price to pay for underwriting such an issue.

Morgan & Co., who charge us $6,000,000 for getting a mortgage of $18,000,000 on a property worth twice that much, hail from the State of New York, and maybe the Senator from New York can explain to me why they charge our farmers such a figure as that out West. The Senator just smiles. He does not explain.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield for a question. I do not yield this floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields for a question.

Mr. CALDER. I regret very much that I did not hear the Senator's statement fully as I came in.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will read it over to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. I am quite sure, however, without knowing anything of the facts, that the statement that 33 per cent was charged for obtaining a loan on a piece of property worth twice the value of the loan would hardly be borne out by the facts when they are all known. I say this without having any knowledge at all of the subject the Senator is discussing.

Mr. BROOKHART. In this case the Senator, then, does state that the farm bloc really has a kick on Morgan & Co.?

Mr. CALDER. I say to the Senator that there is no occasion for anybody anywhere in America, if he has property worth twice the value of what he wishes to borrow, to pay 33 per cent for just the pleasure of giving some one a bonus for lending the money.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator says it was all right 25 or 30 years ago, but it would not do now. Is that the idea?

Mr. CALDER. No; I did not say it was all right at any time. I did not say that, and the Senator knows I did not say it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator from Utah interrupted me, and I did not hear all that he said.

Mr. CALDER. I say that there is no property in America, I do not care where it is, where there is any occasion to pay a bonus of 33 per cent, if the property proposed to be mortgaged is worth twice the value of the money desired.

Mr. BROOKHART. On that point I will have to let the Senator know that this was not ancient history of the Great Western. It was its reorganization, the last one they had. That is the way they fixed us out in Iowa. Do you wonder that we are all turning Bolshevik out in that country?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BOOKHART. Yes.

Mr. KING. Only a question: I will inquire of the Senator whether, in his examination of the activities of Morgan & Co. and the promoters of the Mercantile Marine Co. he has not discovered that the same persons or the same factions described in the document from which the Senator is now reading promoted the Mercantile Marine Co. with a view to controlling the freight rates upon land as well as the freight rates upon the sea?

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall be very glad to answer the Senator's question about to-morrow afternoon. [Laughter.] I have some very elaborate statistics of the interlocking directorates, and some charts in white and black and red and green and blue, showing how they are all scrambled up together, and you can not unscramble them even with a Supreme Court. Yes; they are all mixed together. They are all after us in the same way. That has been the trouble. Here are about 7,000,000 farmers working 16 hours a day for a living, and here are six or seven million laboring people working the same way, and then nearly all of the net income is going to the combination of a few gentlemen organized in that way. There is something in organization, you see; but I am afraid the Senator got me off my subject a little.

I was talking about one Samuel M. Felton, president of the Chicago & Great Western Railroad Co. Now, let us get that right. It used to be the "railway" company, and then Morgan & Co. came down from New York, changed its name from "railway" company to "railroad" company, and charged us $6,000,000 for doing it; and it is the president of that outfit that has printed my name in all the papers all over the country that would carry it, and a lot of them seem to have carried it. I think maybe they will find out that I am harmless after a while, and I will not be such good news in these papers; but at the present time it makes me an awful lot of trouble explaining these things out, and that is why it is nearly 9 o'clock and I have only gotten about half-way through with Felton yet.

Now, let us see something about the subsidy proposition in reference to this. It seems that there was some question about subsidies in reference to the management of this road. I wonder if I have lost that document. If I have, I will say that you will all have to come back to-morrow night. It will not do to miss that. The document to which I refer related especially to the patriotic action of these railroad presidents. Take this man Felton, for instance. Before the war, when times were good, he only charged us $40,000 a year for the mismanagement of this waterlogged railway out in our country. After the war was over and the times got real bad, he could not live on that, and he raised it $10,000, and we have to pay him $50,000 now for running this road and for paying Morgan $6,000,000 of our money for changing the name from "railway" to "railroad." There is a lot of trouble, I will tell you; and I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York again to the fact that it is not only the farmers of Iowa that are getting roused up about some of these things. I met a bunch of farmers from New York the other day, and, do you know, they were talking the same way as those farmers do out West.

Oh, there is not any section any more in this farm bloc. The farmers of the Pacific coast, the fruit growers out there, the cotton growers of the South, the cattle raisers of the Rocky Mountains, the corn growers of the Middle West, and the dairymen of the East are all talking the same language; and if you read the Washington Star you saw a picture of that language in the cartoon the other night. They figured out how the United States would really look after the farmers got in here, and they are coming. Now, mind that.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has just furnished me a copy of that picture. It is entitled "The Iowa Idea of a United States Senate." I wonder if they are blaming that to me?

Here is one Senator with a document almost as formidable looking as the Evening Star, and it is entitled "Care of Live Stock"; and evidently that Senator has not found out that there is a senatorial barber shop here, from the looks of his whiskers. Then we see "A bill to abolish 'biled' linen." Well, you know, we had an exhibition of that here the other day. I remember that Boston tea party, one of the most celebrated parties ever held in the history of the United States, and that party, as I recollect, was given in jeans, pants, and cowhide boots; but the other night here in the Senate we had to send out the Sergeant at Arms to bring in a social bloc to make a quorum, and they came in their evening togs, too. It will be a different-looking Senate when the farmers get here, and I will tell you, you had better look out for those togs.

The next one down the line has a book on hog hygiene. I want to tell you the State of Iowa has 7,000,000 hogs. We raise three times as many hogs as any other State in the Union. We are experts on that, and I want to say it takes more brains to know all about hogs than it does to know about United States Senators.

The next Senator is speaking. I should judge, from the gesture he is making, that he is in a filibuster. He says: "Mr. President, put that guy out." I do not know which one he referred to in that case. I see he is pointing at the boiled shirt. I did not catch that.

Another one has in his hand a document called "Flapper Weekly." I wonder if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] can explain that? I never saw that paper.

There is another one who says: "Yep, but it killed half o' mine." I do not know whether that is in reference to the paper or not. There are some very deep-seated observations in this cartoon of the United States Senate of the future, when the farm bloc really gets to going. At any rate, I am going to invite that cartoonist out to my State and show him a live farmer some day. He is so used to these social blocs here that I do not believe he ever saw one; but he made a good guess and a good picture.

There is the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. He knows a lot about these cartoons. Maybe he could explain how all these farmers got into the United States Senate so suddenly. I will say this much to the Senator from Illinois:

He came out into Iowa and made one speech, and it did not defeat me. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that he did not want the help of the senatorial committee in the compaign?

Mr. BROOKHART. Oh, no; I was awfully glad to get it. I would not have gotten a silk-stocking vote in the State if the Senator had not come out there.

Mr. McCORMICK. What about the more material assistance that the Senator received?

Mr. BROOKHART. Oh, yes; it was all very welcome. I hope the Senator comes out again. I did not want the Senator to take that so seriously. That worries me a good deal. I was just joking, you know. I will say to the Senator further that they have been making me a lot of trouble here this evening. They have been bothering me a good deal. You know, I am new and quite green, and I get mixed up a good deal as I go along.

Mr. President, I am going now to change and take up another phase of this matter. I want to talk a little bit about this system which they present constantly to the American people in reference to their straitened finances. Whenever you find anybody talking for a railroad he always tells you how their credit is broken down, their earnings are getting less and less, getting worse and worse all the time, and the only cure for it is high rates.

In 1915, on this same line of argument, they conducted a campaign for higher freight rates, a horizontal increase straight up in all rates, and they advertised their condition all over the State of Iowa. I believe there are about 700 newspapers in the State of Iowa. They are the only people in hard lines I ever knew who advertised it and paid for putting it in the newspapers, but they did it; and I want to submit for the consideration of these empty seats here to-night some of their principal advertisements.

Here is one that was published in all these papers out in Iowa. You know, one of the convenient things about a railroad advertising in a newspaper is that the farmers have to pay for it, after all. They never forget to charge rates enough to pay the bill. That makes it a very handy plan, but it is a part of this same plan of publicity that my friend Felton, of the Great Western, used and practiced on me.

It reads:

That the railroads of the United States are to-day confronted by the greatest crisis in their history there is not the slightest question.

That sounds familiar, does it not? It is the same old story.

For some years they have been desperately struggling with an ever-increasing cost of operation in the face of reduced freight and passenger rates. But, serious as this situation was before the European war, which has indefinitely closed to them the foreign money markets, has suddenly brought them face to face with a situation which threatens not merely many new receiverships but the actual paralysis of the entire transportation industry of the Nation.

Now, is not that awful? This was 1915, when they were wanting advanced rates.

It was this state of affairs which compelled the closing of the New York Stock Exchange some months ago. What will happen in the future the future alone can tell. American railroads are valued, in round figures, at $20,000,000,000, and of this vast sum nearly $5,000,000,000 worth of securities are held abroad. Should Europe in its frantic struggle for funds seek to convert these securities into cash during the next few months, where is the money to come from with which to buy them?—

I would not know, I will admit—

And failing to protect the securities, what demoralization will follow, not merely in railroad investments but in all other American industrial values as well?

This is an extract from a paid advertisement in all of the Iowa newspapers.

Mr. CALDER. Is that a recent advertisement?

Mr. BROOKHART. In 1915—just preceding the advanced-rate case of 1915. It is quite recent.

Mr. CALDER. My information is that Europe has disposed of all of its American securities.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and we bought them and loaned Europe ten or eleven billion dollars besides, did we not?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. So there was not much in the great, big scarecrow they hung up on our garden fences out in Iowa, was there?

Mr. CALDER. Well, I do not know. I am inclined to think that if we had been called upon to meet that demand of $5,000,000,000 in a little while without the immense profits that came to us during the early days of the war we would have had a hard job to meet it. We took the $5,000,000,000 worth of securities held in Europe and paid for them with war supplies at extraordinary prices, and they were returned to us without any difficulty and without upsetting market conditions. But in time of peace if Europe had called upon us to pay $5,000,000,000 within a short period I think we would have had some difficulty, and it is possible it might have resulted in a serious panic.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator thinks if they offered them for sale and we did not have the money to buy them, they would have to keep them.

Mr. CALDER. No; if they had dumped them upon our market, it would have been a pretty serious condition for the value of American securities of every character.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is an awfully bad thing for railroad securities or anything like that to come down, is it not?

Mr. CALDER. To come down to a considerable extent, yes; because that affects the whole market condition of the country. It always has done so, I will say to the Senator, in the experience of the country in the past.

Mr. BROOKHART. Well, yes; and it is bad when the railroads squeeze the farm values down in the same way.

Mr. CALDER. Oh, I agree with that.

Mr. BROOKHART. I believe the Senator from New York and I will get along pretty well after he gets a little better acquainted with the farm bloc.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will permit me, I think perhaps, outside of the State of Iowa and one or two others, we have as many farmers in New York as any State in the Union.

Mr. BROOKHART. But they are not as "blocky" as ours.

Mr. CALDER. They are not as blocky, perhaps, because they, being nearer the markets, do not have the physical difficulties in marketing their products. I know the Senator's farmers have hard times and our farmers have hard times, too; but our nearness to the market makes it easier to turn our products into money than for the Senator's farmers. I have a great deal of sympathy for the farmer, and if the Senator will show me where I can help them at any time he will find me on his side.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am trying to show the Senator now where he can help. That is why I am talking about the railroads to-night. I want to show the Senator that practically always all of this claim that their financing is broken down and their credit destroyed is a false alarm put out by their bird dogs for the purpose of deceiving the public and justifying an increase in rates. That is the theory of it. That is why I am arguing it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in order that the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BROOKHART. For a question. Remember, I am holding the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to help the Senator hold it. In order that the Senator from New York may understand exactly the situation out in Iowa, when the farmer out in Iowa was getting 15 cents a bushel for oats the Senator from New York was paying 50 cents for a saucer of oatmeal at the Willard Hotel.

Mr. BROOKHART. I was never able to stand the dinners at the Willard, but I expect probably that is right. May I ask the Senator if that is correct?

Mr. CALDER. I think the price was 40 cents to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. I was quoting from memory what the Senator from New York said at a previous time in an interruption of a speech I was then making.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator did not miss it much after all.

Now let us see more about these advertisements of railroad credits. Here is another one that was published in all those papers at our expense. I want Senators to keep that in mind, that all of these luxuries of advertising are at our expense. They are all charged or figured in the operating department in some way.

The net operating income of the railroads of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1914, was $118,554,875 less than for the previous year. The gross earnings for the year were $66,698,486 less than for 1913, while expenses and taxes were $49,535,653 more.

Of course they neglect to show that the comparison which they made was with the greatest year in railroad earnings in all the history of the railroads. These figures are probably correct, but by being arranged in that way, they give an entirely false impression of the situation.

The bond and note obligations which will mature between now and the end of next year, and which the railroads will have to meet in some way, amount to more than $563,000,000, and this does not take a dollar's worth of new improvements or betterments into consideration.

These are obligations which were incurred in the past and which must be met as they fall due if the transportation companies are to be preserved from wholesale receiverships and ruin. Manifestly, therefore, American investors, big and little, will come to the rescue, and before they will consent to do this American railroad securities will have to be reestablished as a sound, respected, and paying investment, and this, on the basis of present railroad earnings, is impossible.

That is another one of those paid advertisements. Now, I want to say about that that to a man not familiar with railroad bookkeeping and experienced in railroad juggling of figures it sounds like a telling argument. To a man who knows, it is simply the shrewdest kind of a scheme of deception.

In the first place, the figures are a comparison of 1914 with 1913. If 1913 was a fat year, then the earnings might very properly be less in 1914, and that was exactly the situation. It was a banner year, in spite of the fact that they juggled their expense accounts to make it a bad one. They spent $100,000,000 more for maintenance in 1913 than they did in 1912. They were asking for higher freight rates, and they wanted to make a bad showing, so they spent the money. This helped them in two ways; they made a permanent improvement of their property at the expense of the people, and its tendency was to make a good showing so they could get still more from the people in freight rates.

Here is a concrete example of the juggling on the Pennsylvania Railroad: In 1909 their expenses decreased and were less than in 1908. In 1910 they were asking for increased freight rates, so their books showed an increase of 27 per cent in expenses. In 1911 there was a decrease, and in 1912 there was a slight increase of 2½ per cent. But in 1913 they wanted higher freight rates again, so their expenses increased 29 per cent, and in spite of all this juggling the eastern group earned 8.07 per cent net in 1913 on the whole stock, water and all.

In 1908 every mile of railroad in the United States earned net $3,171 and every year since has earned more until 1913 when it reached the sum of $4,233.

Now, again as to these paid advertisements, they put in the papers this statement:

In times of acute financial stress private industries are in position to very largely adjust their affairs to meet the emergency. They can advance the price of their commodities, cut the pay roll in half or shut down altogether, and thus permit the storm to blow over without actual shipwreck. The railroads as quasi public enterprises, however, are in an entirely different position. Their rates are regulated by law, and can not be advanced without the consent of the people through their lawmaking body. In order to please the convenience of the public, and not to break down the commerce of the country, they must operate their freight and passenger trains whether they carry a full load or only a quarter of a load. And in view of these facts it is manifestly unfair to put the railroads in the same class with private industries in the present crisis and ask them to shift for themselves as best they can. When the people took over the complete making and regulation of railroad rates they at the same time assumed the solemn implied obligation to see that the railroads got a square deal, for the people are the only power that stands between them and ruin.

That was another paid advertisement at this same time, part of this tale of woe that went out asking for higher rates in order to restore the credit of the 47 western railroads.

In reference to that I want to say that I am not charging the railroads anything for reprinting their advertisements. What I have just read was an attempt to justify the rate increase because the railroads were not in the same class with private industry. They say their trains must run whether they have a half a load or not. But remember this fact, that in every State in the country we know of a reduction of trains was made when there was not enough traffic to fill them. Out in Iowa, in my own home town, it has not been long since the Rock Island had two fast trains at that station, one east at 10 o'clock in the morning and the other west at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and also two local trains, one east at 4.35 in the morning and the other west at 9.05 in the evening. All four of those trains have been removed.

In addition to this the railroads are permitted to charge rates high enough to accumulate a surplus to cover periods of depression. The last time I checked up this surplus it amounted to over $1,000,000,000. It would take a loss of $166,000,000 a year for six years to eat up the surplus which they have already accumulated. That surplus was also collected from the people, but as soon as it is collected it is forgotten, and when the war comes along, instead of using it, they ask us to put up more money and bear our own losses besides.

Now, Mr. President, I have several more very interesting advertisements here and I am very sorry that I shall not have time enough to read them all to-night. I shall preserve them, however, and perhaps I can present them a little later. However, there are one or two more that I will present now. Here is another one:

It is the American farmer, however, who has no complications ahead of him and whose flour, pork, beef, mutton, and foodstuffs must be depended upon to make up the shortage which is already looming big in the distance because the harvest fields of the most fertile sections of Europe have been converted into a shambles for the contending armies. Exports of breadstuffs from the United States in November were valued at $40,250,000, or almost four times as much as in November, 1913, while meat and cattle exports amounted to nearly $14,000,000, or a gain of over 20 per cent over 1913, and this despite our miserable shipping facilities on the high seas.

In the light of these facts was there ever a time when the farmers of Iowa and other Corn Belt States can view the future with as much assurance or when they can so well afford to treat fairly every other great industry in the Nation as now?

Putting it in the terms of sound business policy, was there ever a time when they should do their part to the end that American labor may be profitably employed in all the great channels of industry and that our transportation system may be kept up to a high point of efficiency so that it may adequately discharge the heavy shipping burdens which will undoubtedly depend upon it in the not distant future?

That is another beautiful story to the farmer and reason why he should come to the relief of these railroads in this moment of distress. In reference to that I want to say that the commission decided that the roads were not entitled to their 5 per cent blanket increase in rates in the eastern case. Then the war began. Then began a line of arguments found in the above article.

The commission allowed an increase upon 45 per cent of the tonnage in the western case.

They admit the war has brought calamity to every line of business except farming. They single out farming, point to its great prosperity, and insist it should pay more taxes to the railroads. As to the cotton farmer they say nothing. Although more than one-fourth of all the farmers in our country are cotton farmers, they are not even mentioned. Why? Because they were ruined by the war. The railroad business is not hit one-tenth as hard. If anybody is to be compelled to help anybody else on account of the war, the railroads ought to be compelled to help the cotton farmers.

And how much better off is the northern farmer? They tell you the exports of meat and cattle increased by over 20 per cent in November. Yes; but the price has declined over $2 per hundred prior to 1915 and since the war began. The larger shipment abroad would give the railroads more business from the farmer, but the lower prices are losing him money. There is not a feeder in the country but who is loser.

That was true up to 1915 and it was true in 1916 and a little in 1917, and 1918 and a part of 1919 were better, and then came the smash of the farmer.

The railroads of the whole country had over a billion dollars of surplus when the war began. And here are a few samples of what they were earning: In 1913 the 35 eastern roads averaged 8.07 per cent on water and all. The Pennsylvania earned 9.50 per cent. In 1912 the Santa Fe earned 6.91 per cent. In 1911 the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy had nearly $17,000,000 of net corporate income after paying all interest on bonds, taxes, and running expenses of every kind, including lawyers, politicians, and newspaper advertisements. Its whole capital stock was a little less than $111,000,000. Therefore its net corporate income on all stock was over 15 per cent.

Mr. President, after all these advertisements were put in the newspapers something happened in the trial of the rate case. Something happened to show up this system of propaganda which the railroads of the country had constantly been putting out to deceive the people with reference to their financial situation. Here is another advertisement which brought that to issue. They said:

There is not a single manager of a central or western railroad who will not admit that the present supply of first-class freight locomotives and box cars could not successfully meet the requirements of several bountiful crop years, and yet they have not the funds with which to supply this equipment and thus be prepared for the emergency when it comes, as it undoubtedly will.

So in this advertisement these western roads claimed a shortage of funds even to maintain and keep up their equipment. Then when we reached the trial we began the proof upon this queston of credit. This question was asked:

Mr. LORENZ. Would not that have to be considered in order to get a fair picture?

Mr. THORNE. Not to cover the point I was covering. I will state the point to you again, as it is stated in the exhibit.

The carriers have claimed that they have not had the money to maintain their property and that they have had to retrench and go backward. Now, that is true as to some carriers, but as to the carriers as a whole it is conclusively shown by the series of exhibits, including what we have already introduced and those to follow, that the carriers are maintaining their property; they have had the money to spend. They are maintaining it at a higher standard as a whole than ever before in their history, and in spite of not having the money to expend they are spending more in the country as a whole; they spent $100,000,000 more in 1913 than ever before in their history.

Mr. WRIGHT—

Mr. Wright was the general attorney of all these railroads; he was appearing for these 47 western roads trying to get this advance in rates. He said:

Who in this case is spending more?

Mr. THORNE. In 1914 they spent $20,000,000 more than that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Who in this case is claiming that they have not had the money to keep up their property?

Mr. THORNE. In the paid advertisements in Iowa—

Some of those were the same advertisements, Mr. President, which I have read to you—

Do you mean to say that—your honor, just a moment. The exhibit was prepared before the introduction of the evidence, and, necessarily, the paid advertisement was drawn forth from a statement by Mr. Wright, asking who had made the claim.

Mr. WRIGHT. In this case?

Mr. THORNE. I say these railroad parties to this case.

Mr. WALTER. Let us waive that. Do you say you have the money?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; we have maintained our properties, and we expect to. I have never made any contention of that kind in this case; and so far as any advertisement in Iowa is concerned, nobody connected with this case in the handling of it has anything to do with it.

Mr. WALTER. My purpose in rising was to get formally on the record the admission—you do have the required money to keep your property in the shape which you think it ought to be in.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; I am not going back on that.

Mr. President, I call your attention to that remarkable situation. Here were these railroads putting advertisements in 600 or 700 newspapers in my State, and I presume they did the same—I know they did the same in all of the western section—paid advertisements, marked "paid," all of them advertising the fact that they did not have funds and money with which to maintain their properties; and then when we reached that question at issue in the trial of the rate case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, their attorney, representing all the roads, gets up, repudiates the advertisements for which we had paid and says, "We did have the money, and we have maintained our roads."

Not only that, Mr. President, but after the evidence was introduced the commission passed upon the other proposition.

But before I comment on that I want to say that we introduced to offset their claims of broken-down credit the evidence of the credit of the Government of the United States for the preceding 15 years, evidence of the credit of the four greatest governments—the United States, England, France, and Germany—in combination with 20 of the largest cities in the United States. We called that combined rate of those Governments and cities a pure money rate for convenience. We made a chart of the credit rates that the Governments and the cities had to pay. Then we took the credit rates which these 47 railroads had to pay, and we noted the rise and fall of that credit expense to all those roads. There was a remarkable disclosure when all of that evidence was collected.

That disclosure was, first, that these western railroads had a credit a little bit steadier, one which had not fluctuated quite so much as the credit of all of these great Governments and great cities; and, second, we found that by a small fraction the credits of these railroads had fluctuated a little less than the credit of the Government of the United States. Those facts were undisputed in the record. After we had shown them no railroad company denied them, yet they put out their advertisements and their propaganda to convince the people that their credit was broken down.

Now, here is what the commission say upon this proposition in the decision of 1915, "Western Rate Advance Case. Investigation and Suspension Docket No. 555. Rate increases in Western Classification Territory; submitted June 26, 1915; decided July 30, 1915."

The commission say, upon "The financial evidence":

Under this caption we include, first, testimony relating to the interest rate which the carriers pay on money borrowed; and, second, testimony relating to the return on money invested in their securities. In general, the matters here under consideration are not related, except indirectly, to operating expenses, nor to valuations attaching to the carriers' property, but rather to their securities and their financing.

We can not accept as final or determinative in this connection the recital of failures, no matter how well attested, of particular carriers at particular junctures to borrow except at abnormal or prohibitive rates of interest.

Now, then, the particular carrier they used in this case was the Chicago Great Western Railroad Co., and the particular witness they used in this case was Samuel M. Felton, whom I have described somewhat to you to-night.

Nor can we allow the testimony of financial experts as to the relative credit of railroads and other industries at particular times or in individual instances to weigh heavily as against comprehensive statistical studies such as those presented by the protestants' witness Norton.

Mr. President, that means that they went out among the industries and found particular instances of failure or of high interest rates and, using those particular instances as an example of the whole situation, they proved this bad financial condition, when as a whole it did exist. Witness Norton, whom we used, viewed the whole situation in the way that I have described and the commission approved his finding.

Without a detailed analysis therefore of the financial testimony, as defined above, we proceed to set forth the facts of prime importance that seem indubitably established.

The progressive increase in the ruling rate of interest since 1900 has been demonstrated beyond question, and we do not deem it material to go behind the fact into the causes which have operated to bring about this increase. Railroads in common with industries generally have had to pay a rate of interest higher in 1914 than in 1907, and generally higher in 1907 than in 1900.

J. P. Norton, in his exhibit, has shown that the "pure money rate"—that is, the rate paid on Government securities where there is the minimum of risk involved—has risen from about 3 per cent in 1900 to about 3½ per cent in 1907, and to about 3¾ per cent in 1914. He has also shown that the same phenomenon of a rising interest rate in the period 1900–1914 is instanced by the bonds of other public utilities than railroads—

It will be noticed that this parallel runs through everything; that it is not confined to railroads—

by the bonds of manufacturing and other industrial enterprises, by the municipal bonds of the 20 most populous cities in the United States, as well as by the bonds of 8 Western and 10 Southwestern railroads which are parties to the instant case.

So this parallel runs through everything, and the railroads at the time they were telling all the people of the West that their credit was shattered and broken had the steadiest and the evenest credit of any of these institutions, not excepting the Government of the United States.

A summary of this showing is exhibited in the subjoined table, No. 18, which is based upon various exhibits of this witness.

I shall have to read that table. I want to get it in the RECORD, and it is against the rules to do it without unanimous consent, and everybody is objecting now. I am afraid I shall not have time to read all of these figures, but I will do the best I can. I hope the President will not be too much disappointed if I skip some of them.

The table is as follows:

[1] Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; Chicago & North Western; Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha; Great Northern; Minneapolis & St. Louis; Northern Pacific; Union Pacific.

[2] Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific; Colorado & Southern; Kansas City Southern; Missouri, Kansas & Texas; Missouri Pacific; Southern Pacific; St. Louis & San Francisco; St. Louis Southwestern; Texas & Pacific.

While the selection of the roads covered by the preceding table was not made by the witness, and while the inclusion in the western group of three strong roads—the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, and the Union Pacific—only slightly interested in the increases under consideration, may somewhat qualify the typical character of that group, we are of opinion that their inclusion does not impair the reliability of the general trend of interest on railroad bonds shown in the above table. The public utilities and the industrial concerns selected by the witness may possibly be subject to the criticism that they are largely located in the eastern and central section, the more mature industrial region of the country, rather than in the territory traversed by the carriers in this case. But whatever allowance may be made for the above considerations, we are of opinion that railroad credit as evidenced by interest on their loans has not been relatively more impaired than credit generally, public or corporate.

That is the decision of the commission.

A comparison of the movement of the actual and relative prices of railroad and industrial stocks based upon this witness's exhibit is printed in the appendix as Table No. 43.

The rise in the rate of interest results from influences that also produce a rise in the general level of prices. The same necessity that requires the carriers to pay a higher rate of interest on capital borrowed compels them to pay also higher prices for certain articles. This double disability rests, it is true, upon other industrial enterprises; although, as we have previously indicated, the ordinary industrial concern may advance the prices upon its own output and thus in a way offset the disability of rising costs with less delay and hindrance than can a public service industry. For the reasons above indicated, the following table, No. 19, from Norton's exhibits is of interest; and the diagram following, based on data taken wholly from the protestants' testimony, and showing the relative movement of prices for 80 articles used by the railroads and of the revenue from the equated traffic unit, is deserving of consideration.

Mr. President, here is an equally interesting table of prices of relative commodities quite as valuable as the comparison of interest rates. I am very sorry that the limited time at my command will not permit me to read all of it into the RECORD this evening. However, I shall try to get permission, some day when we get back to normalcy and get rid of the shipping bill, to insert it in the RECORD. It is an interesting study—a very interesting study indeed. I think I have a chart here somewhere on the proposition. I do not know whether it can be printed in the RECORD or not. At any rate, I want to present my percentages as I have figured them out from the table which I have just quoted of the pure-money rate, as it is designated, as a combination of the averages of the four Governments, the United States, France, England, and Germany, and the 20 larger cities in the United States. It may be an arbitrary thing to use, but it is a convenient means.

Taking the average of those four Governments and the 20 larger cities of the United States, taking their actual bond sales, actual yields of interest, and averaging them up, with very great labor and investigation, it is found to be true, and an examination of the table shows that the rate of interest to the combined western railroads advanced only five-tenths of 1 per cent in 15 years. The pure money rate, being an average of the four Governments and 20 largest cities in the United States, advanced three-fourths of 1 per cent. So it will be seen that the credits advanced 50 per cent more to the 20 largest cities in the United States than they did to the group of western railroads at the very time they were howling that their credit had broken down. The United States Government rate advanced 0.55 per cent. Therefore the interest rates to the railroads were steadier and advanced less than either the pure-money rate or the United States Government rate.

The table shows that the combined rates of the western railroads exceed the Government rate from 1.67 per cent to 2.32 per cent, and an average of 2.04 per cent for the period. It also shows that the rate of the Northwestern Railroad alone exceeded the Government rate by an average of 1.75 per cent for the period. It is believed this is about the average excess of the whole United States. In other words, during this period the Government of the United States could have borrowed its money at 1.75 per cent less than the railroads paid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. For a question, Mr. President. I am very particular about the floor. I do not want to lose it.

Mr. KING. I am sure I do not want to take the Senator from the floor. I want to ask the Senator if he does not believe, and it would seem to be combating the position which he is taking, that if the Government of the United States should take over the railroads and assume the obligations, of course, which it would be required to do if purchasing them at a cost of approximately $20,000,000,000, that the borrowing power of the United States would not be as good as it is now and the rate of interest which it would have to pay for the money which would be required to pay for the railroads would be a greater rate than that which is now paid by the Government to borrow money?

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Government got the property at what the roads were worth, it would have a property equal to all these funds, and it would not impair Government credit in any way. Of course, if the Government took the railroads at a watered value that would be a different story than if it took them at an honest value. The Government, in spite of all the cry against Government inefficiency, in spite of all the talk from people who want to take the Government functions over to themselves in some way, is conceded by all to be the most efficient instrument in the world when it comes to borrowing money. It can get money at a lower rate than anybody else. Nobody has ever disputed that proposition. I do not know but what there would be a saving in the capital charge, according to the tables which I have read to-night, of something like $500,000,000 a year upon that item. Of course what we called Government operation during the war was a different story because the old bonds continued as they were. There was no advantage of Government credit in the operation of the railroads under the Railroad Administration and the Railroad Administration should not be charged with that kind of an item.

Mr. President, I have presented a credit proposition to the vacant seats here in the Senate and to the few Senators who have been kind enough to sit around to help maintain a quorum for the purpose of showing that there is a widespread system in the United States organized and developed in the most efficient way to misrepresent the facts to the people of the country in reference to railroad capitalization and railroad financing and railroad credits.

Nothing could be better organized, nothing could be worked out more systematically, and by advertising these false combinations of figures in the newspapers and everywhere they have educated a lot of our people to believe that they really were in hard lines when it was not true. Even now railroad credit is perhaps the steadiest of any credit we have in the country. The Government credit, because of the war, has varied much more, and the variation has been much more than that of the railroads themselves. Of course, the Government had to give them some subsidies during the war. It had through its rate-making machinery guaranteed them an adequate or reasonable return upon the investment which was determined by the use of artificial theories of value, and which is perhaps $7,000,000,000 above the market value of their stocks and bonds.

As I said, the Government would have the right to condemn, if it took over the roads ultimately, the stocks and bonds. When the Government surrendered the right of eminent domain to the railroads and they exercised it in my State and in every State they took our properties at their reasonable market values. The only measure of damages was the difference in the market value before and after the property was taken. Upon the same rule these roads are not worth now, according to Mr. C. W. Barron, the owner of the Wall Street Journal, over $12,000,000,000.

In a former speech earlier in the session, when I was discussing the railroad question a little bit, I quoted the $12,000,000,000 figure as coming from the editor of the Wall Street Journal. Then the editor of the Wall Street Journal kicked up an awful muss about it and said it was not true, and I do not know what all he did call me. He did not miss anything to make it emphatic that I had no business to charge him with putting out such propaganda. That was the editor who made all the fuss. Then I looked up the situation and I found the statement was made in the March 5 number of the bulletin of the railway executives and by C. W. Barron, who is not the editor of the Wall Street Journal but the owner of it. So I made a very bad mistake, Mr. President, that I want to get fully corrected in the RECORD here to-night. I shall not charge it up to the editor any longer. We will let the owner stand for those figures.

Mr. President, I think I have forgotten several important points on that phase of the matter, but I hope to have an opportunity later before the ship subsidy bill passes to insert them in some way in the RECORD and present them for the consideration of the patient Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who never fails us a moment.

There is one other matter. I have a bill prepared, and am about ready to introduce it, to fix a new rule in the valuation of railroads and provide that it shall not exceed the value of the securities. If Mr. Barron's statement is reliable, that will reduce the fictitious value about $7,000,000,000. The farmers, who pay the freight, would like to have the real value fixed for the railroads, not any inflated value or anything of the kind. For this reason the representatives of the railroads denounce me as a socialist who wants to confiscate their property by bringing it down to the real market value on the market which they themselves created and control.

Now I want to call attention to something else that happened to the farmers in this connection. I want to call attention to the confiscations which have been put upon them. My authority for this is the Manufacturers' Record of February 22, 1923. That is to-day, but getting a little closer to to-morrow all the time.

I read:

On May 18, 1920, Federal reserve meeting in Washington discussed deflation, reflection of credit, breaking down of prices, and higher freight rates, but Governor Harding warned those present not to divulge the discussions of the day. The inside story revealed by the stenographic report obtained by the Manufacturers' Record.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has occasionally mentioned in the Senate something about this meeting and has told something of the things with reference to it, but the Senator from Alabama is a long way behind the Manufacturers' Record when it comes to disclosing the full magnitude and the full force of the deflation policy which raised railroad rates and destroyed agriculture. Now, some of the things said are:

After one of the most fateful meetings in the financial history of the world, a meeting which no other organization, including the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Supreme Court of the United States, would ever have dared to hold in secret and reach its conclusions in secret and withhold its conclusions from the public, Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, in closing that meeting of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal advisory council, and the class A of directors of Federal reserve banks, said:

These are Governor Harding's own words—

I would suggest, gentlemen, that you be careful not to give out anything about any discussion of discount rates. That is one thing there ought not to be any previous discussion about, because it disturbs everybody, and if people think rates are going to be advanced there will be an immediate rush to get into the banks before the rates are put up, and the policy of the Reserve Board is that that is one thing we never discuss with a newspaper man. If he comes in and wants to know if the board has considered any rates or is likely to do anything about any rates, some remark is made about the weather or something else and we tell him we can not discuss rates at all. I think we are all agreed it would be very ill-advised to give out any impression that any general overhauling of rates was discussed at this conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and vote "nay."

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I transfer my general pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] voted?

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No quorum is present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a self-evident fact.

Mr. HARRISON. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote just taken; but, of course, a quorum must be obtained first. I do not want to lose my right to enter the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not. I take it that we must get a quorum before we can do anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum was disclosed upon the last call of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Forty-six, I think, was the number announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the last call of the Senate to ascertain a quorum, a quorum was disclosed. On the vote just taken a quorum did not vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Chair hold that a quorum voted on the last vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, indeed.

Mr. HARRISON. I have moved to reconsider the vote, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SWANSON. Pending that motion, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll to ascertain if a quorum is present.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard
Brandegee	George	McKinley	Shortridge
Broussard	Hale	Moses	Spencer
Bursum	Harreld	New	Sutherland
Calder	Harrison	Norbeck	Swanson
Cameron	Heflin	Oddie	Wadsworth
Capper	Hitchcock	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Warren
Curtis	Kellogg	Poindexter	Watson
Edge	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.	Weller
Ernst	Lenroot	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. KEYES answered to their names when called.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. KING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. STANLEY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold that for one moment?

Mr. CURTIS. For what purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. The yeas and nays were ordered on a motion to reconsider. I was going to ask to withdraw that motion to reconsider, as I understood that by virtue of so doing there would be a request to recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the motion made by the Senator was out of order. We could do no business without a quorum, and when the Chair announced there was no quorum there was nothing to do but to get a quorum. I therefore insist upon my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CURTIS. The motion I have made is a privileged motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the motion of the Senator from Kansas is privileged.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit——

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The motion to adjourn takes precedence by the rules of the Senate over the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. ROBINSON. The motion to adjourn is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is in order. On that motion the yeas and nays have been requested. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the principal legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as previously, I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to the transfer of my pair as on former votes, I vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to the transfer of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with respect to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I inquire if my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has not voted.

Mr. STANLEY. Not knowing how my colleague would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the motion to adjourn be withdrawn, and that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, with the understanding that we shall have an executive session to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request proposed by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. Pending the request, I desire to say that the suggestion is satisfactory to this side of the Chamber. We have no objection to it.

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD SIDINGS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask permission to yield long enough to allow the Senator from Delaware to enter a motion to reconsider a vote? I will withhold the request I have made for a moment, if there be no objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the motion of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BALL. I ask unanimous consent that I may ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3083) authorizing the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to construct an elevated railroad siding adjacent to its tracks in the city of Washington.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is necessary under the rules of the Senate that the motion to reconsider be entered within two days of actual session of the Senate after the bill passes the Senate. I think that means two calendar days rather than two legislative days, for reasons that I will not state at this time. I think also that the motion is privileged, and that the Senator from Delaware has a right to make the motion.

Although a situation has developed where a quorum may not be found to be present, I hope that there will be no objection, in view of the fact that a manifest error was made by the Senate in concurring in the House amendment, and the Senate must necessarily correct that mistake.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand that the motion is merely to be entered now and not to be acted upon?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not to be considered.

Mr. LODGE. It is merely to be entered.

Mr. BALL. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill named by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL TO-MORROW.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that at 11 o'clock there be an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent requested by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Thereupon (at 11 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 23, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that Thou hast ordained and art administering a providence over Thy children. Sheltered under Thy care, we have a retreat that gives security and blessed quiet. The thought that Thou dost live and love and plan lends courage and sustains us in the hour when hope burns low. We thank Thee that our Nation's history is a great evidence of Thy providence. May we draw to-day new inspiration from the examples of our fathers who struggled in defense of the liberty wherewith they have made us free. Help us to hold in remembrance and appreciation that emergencies can be met, wrongs can be righted, and problems solved by simple obedience to our free Christian institutions. The Lord bless our homeland, which has been consecrated by the prayers, the tears, and the struggles of those who were giants in mind and in conscience, and we will give Thee the praise through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SWORD OF MONTGOMERY.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 460.

Resolved, etc., That the sword of Gen. Richard Montgomery, which he wore when he fell at the siege of Quebec on December 31, 1775, be accepted in the name of the Nation from the donor, Miss Julia Barton Hunt, whose generosity is deeply appreciated, and that the sword be deposited in the National Museum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the history of the sword mentioned in the resolution is given in the letter to me of Mr. Gaillard Hunt, which I ask to have printed with my remarks.

The career of Montgomery in the early months of the Revolution was closely connected with that of the foremost of all Americans, the anniversary of whose birth is being everywhere celebrated to-day.

The Continental Congress having elected Washington Commander in Chief on June 15, 1775, seven days later elected Montgomery a brigadier general.

Immediately, under a plan of campaign devised by Washington and Doctor Franklin, Generals Montgomery and Schuyler were placed in charge of an expedition against Canada. Schuyler being compelled to withdraw on account of sickness, Montgomery led the American forces against Montreal, which he occupied December 7, 1775. Recognizing the importance of this exploit, the Continental Congress promoted Montgomery to be a major general on December 7, 1775. From Montreal Montgomery pressed on to Quebec, encountering great difficulties and hardships due to the character of the country and the severe winter. On the evening of December 31, 1775, as he led his men through ice and snow in an assault upon the heights of the city he was mortally wounded.

In a letter written in February, 1776, Washington, communicating Montgomery's fate to the Continental Congress, lauded his valor and lamented his untimely end. The death of Montgomery made a profound impression both in Europe and America. The Continental Congress proclaimed for him "their grateful remembrance, profound respect, and high veneration, and desiring to transmit to future ages a truly worthy example of patriotism, conduct, boldness of enterprise, insuperable perseverance, and contempt of danger and death," caused to be erected in his honor a monument of white marble at the front of St. Paul's Church, in the city of New York, bearing an inscription written by Franklin. In 1818 the body of Montgomery was removed from Quebec and buried near this monument.

The action which will probably be taken to-day by the Congress of the United States will correspond with the action of the Continental Congress nearly 150 years ago, when it recorded its glowing tribute to the memory of one of the most gifted and heroic of those who sacrificed themselves in the struggle for American independence. [Applause.]

WASHINGTON, February 19, 1923.

Hon. R. WALTON MOORE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: By the wish of my cousin, Miss Julia Barton Hunt, of New York, and in her behalf, I have the profound honor of presenting to the Government of the United States, through the Congress, the sword which Gen. Richard Montgomery carried when he was killed December 31, 1775, on the Plains of Abraham at the siege of Quebec.

James Thompson gives the following account of Montgomery's sword:

"Holding the situation of overseer of works in the Royal Engineer Department at Quebec, I had the superintendence of the defenses to be erected throughout the place, which brought to my notice almost every incident connected with the military operations of the blockade of 1775; and from the part I had performed in the affair generally I considered that I had some right to withhold the general's sword, particularly as it had been obtained on the battle ground.

"On its having been ascertained that Montgomery's division had withdrawn a party went out to view the effects of the shot, when the only part of the body that appeared above the level of the snow was that of the general himself, whose hand and part of the left arm was in an erected position, but the body itself much distorted, the knees being drawn up toward the head; the other bodies that were found at the moment were those of his aid-de-camps, Cheeseman and McPherson, and one sergeant; the whole hard frozen. Montgomery's sword was close by his side, and as soon as it was discovered, which was first by a drummer boy, who made a snatch at it on the spur of the moment, and no doubt considered it as his lawful prize, but I immediately made him deliver it up to me, and some time after I made him a present of 7*s.* 6*d.* by way of prize money.

"The sword has been in my possession to the present day (August 16, 1828). When found it had no scabbard or sheath, but I soon had the present one made and mounted in silver to correspond."

James Thompson was present at the siege of Louisburg, and came to Quebec with his regiment, the Seventy-eighth Highlanders, and took part in the battle of the Plains of Abraham. Subsequently he was appointed deputy officer of public works in the engineer department. He died in Quebec August 30, 1830, aged 98 years. He bequeathed the sword to his son, James Thompson, deputy commissioner general, who at his death in December, 1830, willed it to his nephew, James Thompson Harrower. * * * It was sold by Mr. Harrower in 1878 to the Marquis of Lorne, governor general of Canada. (Note on Montgomery's Sword, seventh series of Historical Documents, 1905, published by the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec, 1905.)

In 1881 the Marquis of Lorne gave the sword to Victor Drummond, Esq., chargé d'affaires ad interim of the British Legation at Washington, and Mr. Drummond gave it on September 3, 1881, to Miss Louise Livingston Hunt. Miss Hunt, with her brother, the Hon Carleton Hunt, of New Orleans, La., and her sister, Miss Julia Barton Hunt, was the owner as a life estate of Montgomery Place, where General Montgomery's widow had died, and where several of the relics of the general were preserved. It was the intention of Miss Louise Livingston Hunt to give the sword to the Government of the United States, but a prolonged illness before her death on November 19, 1914, prevented her from carrying out her intention. Upon her death, as part of her estate, the sword passed to her brother and sister, and upon the death of Carleton Hunt, August 14, 1921, to Miss Julia Barton Hunt, who, carrying out the wishes of Miss Louise Livingston Hunt, now presents it to the Government of the United States to be placed, if it pleases the Congress of the United States, with the other Revolutionary relics in the National Museum, where it may be seen by the public and recall the memory of the gallant officer who gave his life in defense of the American cause December 31, 1775.

* * * * * * *

Yours very respectfully,

GAILLARD HUNT.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOORE of Virginia, the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the district which I have the honor to represent is sacred with memories of Washington. There, at Wakefield, Westmoreland County, he was born. There, at Fredericksburg, Va., he spent a part of his boyhood days and grew to manhood. There he was made a Mason in Fredericksburg Lodge, No. 4, and the Bible used in those ceremonies is still in the possession of the lodge. At Fredericksburg, Va., in that district, the house in which Mary, the mother of Washington, lived and died, still stands, and in that city she lies buried. Patriotic women of this land have marked her last resting place with a stately monument.

Yorktown, Va., in that district, is inseparably linked with the name of Washington, and marks the culmination of his mighty struggle for independence.

Through all the trials, troubles, and disappointments of his long fight for freedom General Washington had the sympathy and encouragement of his devoted and courageous sister, Mrs. Betty Lewis, wife of Col. Fielding Lewis. She was more than sister; she was consoler, comforter, adviser, and friend.

Betty Lewis lived in Fredericksburg, Va. Her old home, known as Kenmore, still stands in that historic city. To this beautiful colonial mansion Col. Fielding Lewis had brought his charming bride, and there she lived until a few years before her death.

Colonel Lewis was a man of wealth and culture and prominent in the city's life. He became an officer in the Revolutionary Army, commanded a division at Yorktown, and after the war he was a magistrate in the town, a member of the city council, and representative in the legislature. Colonel Lewis devoted his activities at crucial periods to the manufacture of firearms for the Revolutionary service, and it is said that his guns armed the Virginia Militia who fought in the Battle of Yorktown. It is said that Colonel Lewis spent all of his money in this patriotic service.

The walls of Kenmore still stand as stanch as when the house was built. The interior stuccowork is said to be probably equal in workmanship to the best in this country. Its decorations were chosen by Washington, and he planned the ceilings and mantels which adorn its rooms.

Within the walls of this historic home have gathered Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Henry, Richard Henry Lee, John Paul Jones, Light Horse Harry Lee, Count de Rochambeau, and many other men illustrious in the history of the Republic. Here there gathered a brilliant company when Washington went to Fredericksburg after the surrender at Yorktown. This old home has survived the shot and shell of civil strife and brought to the present the simplicity, the grace, and the charm of the past.

This old home has an appropriate location, for in this historic city John Paul Jones once lived. Here also lived Gen. Hugh Mercer and Gen. George Weedon, of Revolutionary fame, James Monroe, whose home and law office in Fredericksburg still stand, and other famous men. In this city still stands the Rising Sun Tavern, whose hospitality embraced Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, George Mason, Marshall, and many others.

Though Kenmore had withstood the tempest of war, yet in the past year it became threatened by the onward march of modern commercialism. It was proposed to convert its spacious grounds into building lots, and to transform the old house itself into an apartment house. Then it was that a determined band of heroic women in Fredericksburg rallied to its rescue. Forming themselves into an association, they arranged for its purchase at the price of $30,000, inaugurated a campaign to secure funds, raised $13,000 ($6,000 of which came from their own city), made their initial payment, saved the home, and are now undertaking, by subscriptions of $10 each for life membership in the Kenmore Association for the preservation of the Betty Washington Lewis home, to raise $16,000 to complete the purchase.

This sum will be raised by them; Kenmore will be saved to Virginia and to the Nation. The associations of its past will be preserved for the future. We may visit where Washington was an honored and welcome guest.

In the eloquent language of the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot:

"Kenmore" will be devoted to the memory of its former owner. Her reign there in a sense will be renewed. And "the tender grace of a day that is dead" will preside over that household, never to vanish until time at last takes its inevitable toll and the historic walls crumble to dust.

I mention these facts, believing them to be of interest, and assured that you will join with me in a hearty Godspeed to these patriotic ladies in their worthy work. In the name of these ladies I extend to you a hearty welcome to Kenmore, the home of Betty Lewis, the sister of Washington.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF FOREIGN POSTAGE AND REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2703) to allow the printing and publishing of illustrations of foreign postage and revenue stamps from defaced plates, with a House amendment thereto disagreed to, insist on the House amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speakers' table the bill S. 2703, with a House amendment disagreed to by the Senate, insist upon the House amendment, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. BOIES, and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such Disrtict for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following House concurrent resolution:

House Concurrent Resolution 86.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13793) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes," the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed to make the following correction: In line 15 of the matter inserted by Senate amendment No. 29 strike out "Congress). Promotions" and insert "Congress), promotions."

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment numbered 30 to the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 18, 21, 34, 36, 38, and 49 to the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein, in 8-point type, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] in respect to the so-called Lenroot-Anderson agricultural bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, in 8-point type, in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

FEBRUARY 19, 1923.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCFADDEN: I received your letter of February 17, 1923, requesting my opinion on the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes, which was recently approved by the Senate and is now under consideration by your committee. I have been particularly concerned to see whether the bill conforms to sound banking principles and whether its administrative features are workable.

I have had prepared and send you herewith a detailed memorandum analyzing the bill from these points of view, and commenting also upon some other features which seem to be important. This memorandum points out grave defects in the bill, not only in matters of draftsmanship but in its larger outlines and policies as well. It seems to me that a careful study of the measure in the light of this memorandum leads necessarily to the conclusion that its financial provisions, as now drawn, are unsound and dangerous, and that its administrative features are unworkable.

I realize that some support has been given to the bill in the belief that it will assist the farmers of the country in obtaining credit accommodation, adapted to the needs of agriculture, and in sufficient amounts to avoid the disastrous effect of a credit stringency similar to the one through which this country has recently passed. With this object I am in the heartiest accord. I feel that the students of our banking structure have given too much attention in the past to the commercial and industrial needs of the country and not enough attention to the vital problem of fitting our banking structure to the needs of agriculture. I am convinced, however, that no benefits will enure to the farmer from a system which is financially unsound. The farmer has suffered enough in the past from unsafe banking systems. Let us not now add to this source of danger to the farmer by giving the sanction of the United States Government to a system which violates every canon of sound banking to which this Government has been committed since the establishment of the national banking system.

Some support has also been given upon the assumption that this bill was indorsed by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, which conducted an elaborate investigation and has published a valuable report upon agricultural conditions. This, however, is a misapprehension, for the bill in its present form differs radically from the bill which the joint commission indorsed. Many of the features, especially criticized in the accompanying memorandum, were not contained in the bill indorsed by the joint commission, but were added in subsequent revisions. The indorsements given to the bill in its original form, therefore, are not applicable to the bill as it passed the Senate.

In my opinion the greatest service could be rendered to agriculture by enacting into law at the present session the Capper bill (S. 4280) and withholding action upon the Lenroot bill until the situation can be more thoroughly investigated. The Capper bill has the indorsement of the live-stock industry and of the great cooperative-marketing movement. It will go far, in my opinion, in satisfying the needs of those sections of the country which have suffered in the past from inadequate credit facilities. At the same time it is financially sound and in its administrative features avoids the excessive centralization, which, in my opinion, constitutes a serious defect in the Lenroot bill. The Capper bill carries with it important amendments to the Federal reserve act. It also includes a provision extending for nine months the time during which the War Finance Corporation can make loans for agricultural purposes, thus bringing assurance that any unforeseen credit needs will be amply taken care of during the coming crop season. Until the results of further investigation and experience are available, it seems to me that this is a complete and adequate program of agricultural credits legislation.

There are certain features of the Lenroot bill which have great merit and should, in my opinion, be incorporated in the Capper bill by your committee. The farm-credits departments contemplated in the Lenroot bill are, for instance, authorized to make loans direct to cooperative-marketing associations upon warehouse-receipt security. It seems to me that similar powers could well be given to the rediscount corporations contemplated in the Capper bill. The Lenroot bill also renders eligible for rediscount with Federal reserve banks the paper of factors based upon agricultural products in their raw state. It seems to me that this provision is sound, and I recommend its insertion in the Capper bill. I should also suggest including in the Capper bill the section of the Lenroot bill which repeals the amendment to the Federal reserve act authorizing progressive rediscount rates.

If I may sum up briefly the reason why, in my opinion, the Capper bill is preferable to the Lenroot bill, it is this: The Lenroot bill attempts to create a separate and independent rediscount system for agriculture. Necessarily this will be a secondary and, in all probability, an inadequate rediscount system. It seems to me, on the other hand, that the agricultural interests can properly demand that they be given the benefit, upon sound lines, of the best and most adequate rediscount system which the country can furnish, and that, in my opinion, is the Federal reserve system, liberalized and extended as proposed in the Capper bill. The Capper bill aims at strengthening and developing the existing banking structure and the Federal reserve system and rendering them more useful and more suited to the needs of agriculture.

Very truly yours, A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MEMORANDUM ON S. 4287.

FEBRUARY 19, 1923.

Sections 1 to 6 of the Lenroot-Anderson bill (S. 4287) provide for the organization and operation of farm-credits departments in the Federal land banks throughout the United States. Sections 7 to 13, inclusive, contain amendments to the Federal reserve act similar to those embodied in part 2 of the Capper-McFadden bill. It is the purpose of this memorandum to discuss those sections of the Lenroot-Anderson bill which relate to the organization of farm-credits departments.

The purpose of these sections appears to be to establish a separate rediscount facility for certain types of agricultural and live-stock paper.

The bill provides in effect for 12 agricultural rediscount banking departments, one in each of the existing Federal land banks. Each such department would have a capital of $5,000,000 (to which an additional $10,000,000 might be added with the approval of the President), to be subscribed and paid in by the United States Government. The aggregate capital of all the farm-credits departments might therefore reach $120,000,000.

To a considerable extent the proposed new rediscount system would perform functions which are already being performed by the Federal reserve banks. Federal reserve banks are now authorized to rediscount for member banks agricultural paper with a maturity up to six months. Under other pending legislation this maximum maturity will be extended to nine months. Under the Lenroot-Anderson bill, however, the farm-credits departments of Federal land banks could discount, for national banks, State banks, trust companies, and certain other enumerated kinds of credit institutions, agricultural paper with a maturity of not less than six months nor more than three years. As far as concerns agricultural paper having a maturity from six to nine months, inclusive, offered by national banks or State banks which are members of the Federal reserve system, the two systems would, therefore, be overlapping.

The main purpose of the bill, however, appears to be to establish a rediscount system for agricultural paper which is not eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system, either because of its maturity or because it does not carry the indorsement of a member bank. It is contemplated that such longer term paper shall be made the basis for the issuance of collateral trust debentures, which would be sold in the investment market in the same manner that farm-loan bonds are now sold. These debentures would be exempt from all taxation, State or Federal, including surtaxes, and would be secured by the agricultural paper discounted or purchased by the farm-credits department.

The capital of the farm-credits departments would be completely supplied by the United States Government, and these departments would be operated by directors appointed by the Government. In effect, therefore, the system contemplates a policy of Government ownership and operation of an agricultural banking system through the medium of subsidiary corporations owned and operated by the United States.

It does not appear to be contemplated that the United States shall be legally liable upon the debentures or other obligations of farm-credits departments. Yet the moral obligation would be a strong one, for it is hardly conceivable that the United States Government could permit a corporate subsidiary owned and operated by it to default upon its just debts. In estimating the liability which the Government would assume in enacting the bill, we must therefore consider not only the technical liability which under the bill might reach $120,000,000 but also the potential moral liability, which might be in any amount up to $1,200,000,000.

Before launching the United States Government in a business venture which involves an investment of $120,000,000 in cash and a possible moral obligation of $1,200,000,000, the proposed plan should be studied not only with a view to ascertaining whether it is drawn upon sound lines and with proper safeguards sufficient to insure its financial integrity but also to see whether it is effective in accomplishing the purposes which its authors have in mind.

I. THE SYSTEM IS FINANCIALLY UNSOUND.

The farm-credits departments organized under the act are expected to operate principally upon borrowed capital. It is provided that they may issue collateral trust debentures up to ten times the amount of their paid-in capital and surplus. These debentures would be secured by at least a like face amount of agricultural paper bearing the indorsement of the discounting bank or other institution. The financial integrity of the system would depend, therefore, upon three factors: (1) The financial strength of the farm-credits departments primarily and secondarily liable upon the debentures; (2) the financial strength of the bank or other rediscounting institution; (3) the nature and value of the primary paper pledged as collateral.

(1) The farm-credits departments: The capital supplied by the United States Government is expected to stand as a guaranty fund to protect holders of debentures. In estimating the value of this guaranty certain elements of weakness must be considered. There is no requirement that any part of this capital be maintained in liquid form or that a cash reserve be maintained. All the capital might be invested in nonliquid agricultural paper. There is no limit to the amount of paper which may be taken from any one discounting agency in relation to the capital of the farm-credits department; so far as legal limitations are concerned, the whole capital or even more than the whole capital could be invested in paper bearing the indorsement of one bank or other discounting agency. Considering that the liabilities of the farm-credits departments may be as high as ten times the capital and surplus, it is apparent that the value of the guaranty of the farm-credits department would depend to a very large extent upon the value of the agricultural paper in which its assets are invested.

It is true that the debentures of each farm-credits department would be protected by a pro rata guaranty of all other farm-credits departments. The value of this guaranty, however, appears to be overestimated. It is not a joint guaranty. If the assets of a farm-credits department should prove insufficient to pay all its outstanding debentures, the deficiency may be assessed against other "solvent farm-credits departments," but only in proportion to the amount of debentures which each such department has outstanding at the time of the assessment.

A farm-credits department which has issued no debentures but has operated solely upon its capital, although to a high degree solvent would assume no liability for the debentures of any other department. On the other hand, the larger the liability of any department upon its own debentures the larger would be its liability as guarantor of other debentures. Moreover, it is obvious that the guaranty could be enforced only against the unpledged assets of a farm-credits department. Its pledged assets would go primarily to satisfy the debentures which they secure. If, therefore, a farm-credits department had issued its full limit of $10 of debentures for each dollar of capital and surplus and had pledged, as would, no doubt, generally be required on account of this very liability, agricultural paper of a face value 10 per cent in excess of the face amount of its debentures, it would have no unpledged assets against which its guaranty could be enforced. In general, as a farm-credits department becomes more extended and as its unpledged assets diminish, it would automatically assume a larger share of liability as guarantor. It does not seem that much reliance can be placed upon such a guaranty.

2. The discounting institution: It is apparent, therefore, that unless the paper in which the assets of the farm-credits departments are invested is financially sound, little reliance can be placed upon the liability or guaranty of these departments. The paper will bear the indorsement of the discounting institutions, and the next step in our analysis is to determine the value of this indorsement.

In the original Lenroot-Anderson bill, which had the approval of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, the discounting institution could be a national or State bank or a trust company, savings institution, or incorporated live-stock loan company. In the bill as it passed the Senate there are added rural-credit corporations, incorporated farm-credit companies, cooperative banks, and cooperative credit or marketing associations. The additions are important.

National banks and, to a large degree, State banks, savings institutions, and trust companies are subject to limitations under State or national law and to periodic inspection by State or national examiners. They are required to keep a minimum cash reserve; their investments are frequently limited; there is usually double liability on the part of stockholders; and any tendency toward unsound practices can be quickly checked by State or national banking authorities. Incorporated live-stock loan companies are generally formed on a substantial scale and take only secured paper. In the original bill, therefore, some reliance could have been placed on the indorsement of the discounting institution.

No such safeguards surround the operations of the institutions added by the revised Lenroot-Anderson bill. Rural-credit corporations, incorporated farm-credit companies, cooperative banks, or cooperative credit or marketing associations are enumerated but not defined in the new bill; hence it is impossible to ascertain under what limitations they will operate. There is no requirement that they be subject to periodic inspection, State or national. There is no requirement that they maintain a cash reserve or maintain their capital in liquid form. There is no limitation on the amount which such an institution may lend to one borrower—a limitation essential to sound banking. There is no requirement that capital be paid in in cash. In the case of cooperative credit association—a vague and undefined term—there is no requirement that there be any capital at all.

As amended in the Senate, the bill contains certain limitations on the amount of paper which may be discounted for any one institution, but upon examination it appears that these limitations could hardly be effective. No paper may be discounted for any agricultural credit corporation, incorporated live-stock loan company, or farm-credit company, "which has rediscounted paper equal to or exceeding ten times the paid-up capital and surplus of such company." It will be observed, however, that the limitation refers only to rediscounted paper. A company may be indebted upon its own promissory notes or bonds or other primary obligations in any conceivable amount, and yet it would not be debarred from discounting paper with the farm-credits department. Moreover, there is nothing in the bill to prevent a company from incurring liabilities in any amount which unsound finance might dictate after it has discounted its limit with the farm-credits department. A company with $10,000 capital could discount $100,000 of paper with a farm-credits department and the next day borrow $100,000 more from some other source.

As far as "cooperative credit associations" are concerned, there is no limit whatever upon the amount which they may discount.

Even if the limits which the bill attempts to place were effective, they would be far too high to afford adequate protection. A company taking the best quality of real-estate mortgages or paper secured by live stock or commodities with a safe margin can properly borrow a maximum of ten times its capital. The discounting agencies may, however, do a miscellaneous agricultural business and may make loans without security, or upon questionable security, such as crop mortgages or second or third mortgages on land. For such companies the limit of ten to one is much too high. For banks the limit—unless further restricted by State or Federal law—is five to one. A bank already has demand or short-time deposit liabilities which often exceed ten times its capital and surplus. A law which encourages such banks, in addition, to incur rediscount liabilities equal to five times their capital and surplus, is an invitation to unsound banking and a menace to the public welfare.

It follows, therefore, that no great reliance can be placed upon the indorsement of the discounting institutions contemplated by the bill, since they are not surrounded by the restrictions and safeguards which experience has shown to be essential to sound banking.

3. The agricultural paper: We are thrown back, then, upon the primary agricultural paper upon which the whole system is built. Not only the proceeds of debentures but the whole capital reserve of the discounting institutions, as well as of the farm-credits departments, may be invested in this paper. If the paper is unsound the system is unsound. One might expect to find, therefore, safeguards and limitations thrown about such paper comparable to the safeguards thrown around the farm-mortgage paper upon which the existing Federal farm-loan system is based.

No such limitations or safeguards are provided. Only in the case of direct loans to cooperative producing or marketing associations is there any requirement as to security. Such direct loans must be upon live stock or commodities and must not exceed 75 per cent of their value. These limitations are not applicable to paper rediscounted for banks, rural-credit corporations, live-stock loan or farm-credit companies, or cooperative credit associations.

A farm-credit corporation could invest ten times its capital in crop-mortgage paper, with all its hazards and uncertainties. A cooperative credit association, without a dollar of capital, could make unlimited loans to its members without any security whatever. And such paper, discounted with a farm-credit department, could form the security for debentures issued under Government auspices and sold to investors.

It is apparent, therefore, that the most elementary principles of sound finance have been overlooked in drafting the bill. In its national banking laws the United States Government has set up a standard of sound banking which is regarded as a model among the States. Through the Federal Reserve Board it endeavors to promote sound banking practices on the part of State banks which are members of the system. In its Federal farm-loan system it has set a standard of conservatism and soundness which has won the confidence of investors. It is difficult to conceive that Congress should now stand sponsor for a system which violates every sound banking principle and contains not even the rudiments of safety.

II. THE ADMINISTRATIVE FEATURES OF THE BILL UNWORKABLE.

The discussion heretofore has been of the financial features of the bill. Even the soundest financial plan, however, must depend upon good administration for its success. It is important to examine, therefore, the administrative structure which the bill contemplates, both with respect to the management of the farm-credits departments and with respect to their supervision by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Nominally, the new powers conferred by the bill are vested in the Federal land banks. These are corporations organized under the farm loan act for the exclusive purpose of making mortgage loans upon farm lands. The last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury showed that the Government on October 31, 1922, owned somewhat over $4,000,000 out of a total of approximately $35,000,000 of the capital stock of these banks, the remainder being owned by local farm-loan associations and to a small extent by individual borrowers. Under the farm loan act the temporary management of these banks is placed in the hands of five directors appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board. The permanent management was to be in a board of nine directors, of which six, known as local directors, were to be selected by the stockholding farm-loan associations and three, known as district directors, were to be appointed by the Farm Loan Board. In fact, however, the permanent organization has never been effected, a joint resolution, approved January 18, 1918, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase farm-loan bonds from the Federal land banks, and continuing the temporary organization as long as any such bonds are held. The Strong bill, recently reported by the House Banking and Currency Committee, provides for termination of the temporary management and substitution of a permanent board composed of three local directors chosen by the farm-loan associations, three district directors appointed by the Farm Loan Board, and a seventh director appointed by the Farm Loan Board out of three nominees selected by the farm-loan associations.

These boards of directors, whether permanent or temporary, are authorized to elect the president, vice president, secretary and treasurer, and other officers and employees of the Federal land banks, to define their duties, and to dismiss them at pleasure.

Upon this existing structure the Lenroot-Anderson bill superimposes an auxiliary organization designed to exercise the powers conferred in the bill. It is provided that each Federal land bank shall establish "under the supervision of its temporary directors and, after the establishment of the permanent organization, under the supervision of its district directors," a farm-credits department. During the temporary organization, therefore, the five directors appointed by the Government to carry on the farm-loan business will also operate the farm-credits department. Under the permanent organization the three directors appointed by the Government will act, apparently, as a separate board of directors in charge of farm credits. There will, therefore, be one corporation with two boards of directors. Such a situation can hardly promote efficient administration, since the same set of officials and employees will be subject to the orders of two boards of directors.

The most serious objection to the plan, however, is that in either event the operation of the farm-credit rediscount system will be placed in the hands of men who have no special qualifications for the positions. The temporary directors of the Federal land banks have already been selected and are now in office. They were selected, it may be assumed, because of their experience in passing upon real-estate mortgage loans, and not because of their familiarity with loans upon live stock, agricultural products, or growing crops. These directors are to be required to undertake the administration of an entirely new business, enormous in scope, technical, and difficult in its details, and very much more hazardous than the mortgage-loan business which they are now carrying on.

If the Strong bill is adopted at this session—it has not yet passed the House, and has not even been considered by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee—it will be possible to organize the system under the direction of the three "district directors" to be appointed by the Farm Loan Board. These same district directors, however, will constitute the Government representatives upon the board of directors in connection with farm-mortgage loans. Unless an entirely new set of district directors should be appointed, it would be necessary to find among the existing directors of the Federal land banks men who combine the qualifications necessary for both positions. It is by no means certain that such men can be found.

The same difficulty of adapting an existing institution to new and unfamiliar uses will be encountered when we consider the provisions made for supervision of the farm-credits departments. The supervision is placed in the hands of the Federal Farm Loan Board. It has power to make rules and regulations governing the execution of the act, and has virtual control over the operations of the farm-credits departments and their debenture issues. The executive officer of the board has stated at a public hearing that the board does not want to administer the act. None of its members were appointed with a view to their qualifications in administering a rediscount banking system. Nor is it contemplated, in the present draft of the bill, that any new members be appointed for the purpose.

Apart from the difficulty of personnel, the bill contains administrative features which even with the best possible personnel would appear to be unworkable. The provisions of Title I of the farm loan act, relating to the preparation and issue of farm-loan bonds, are made to govern, "so far as applicable," the preparation and issue of debentures issued by farm-credits departments. Under Title I the following procedure is prescribed in connection with issuance of farm-loan bonds: Land banks must first, through the "registrar" of the district (an official appointed by the board), make written application for approval of an issue, tendering with the application the collateral security to be offered.

With the security there must be a schedule and description thereof. It must be checked by the "registrar" and forwarded to the Federal Farm Loan Board. The board is required to "cause to be made such investigation and appraisement of the securities tendered as it shall deem wise" and grant or reject the application in whole or in part. The registrar then attends to the issuance and execution of the bonds and assumes custody of the collateral. The bonds are engraved by the Treasury Department according to prescribed forms.

It is apparent that this machinery, while perhaps appropriate in the case of farm-loan bonds, is not adapted to the needs of short-term or "intermediate" farm credits. It contemplates that the Farm Loan Board shall itself, through agents and inspectors, satisfy itself as to the safety and adequacy of all collateral. A bank in Idaho or a loan company in Oregon may desire to discount a block of paper with the local land bank. The land bank, for fear of tying up its capital in unacceptable loans, will generally be unwilling to discount the paper until it receives the approval of the Farm Loan Board. The paper, comprising perhaps the notes of a hundred or more farmers, is put into shape, financial statements are executed, chattel mortgages and crop mortgages are analyzed and described, and the material delivered to the land bank. It is checked by the registrar and shipped, with his report, to Washington. The board sends out its appraisers, analyzes the hundred or more statements, inspects the chattels and crops, has the debentures prepared, and ships the material back with its approval. By the time the loan is approved and the debentures issued several months may have expired. Such an amount of centralization is not, in the long run, workable in a business in which promptness, flexibility, and adaptation to local needs are as essential as they are in the business of rediscount banking. It is doubtful whether the sponsors of the bill realize, moreover, that it will necessitate a permanent credit and clerical staff in Washington of several hundred men. The War Finance Corporation, doing a similar business on a smaller scale than is contemplated and with an effective field organization, required a staff of 300 employees in Washington. The 12 land banks may do a business of more than a billion dollars. It is impracticable to operate such a centralized system upon sound lines and yet give satisfaction to the agricultural communities.

III. THE SYSTEM WILL BE INELASTIC.

A fundamental defect in the Lenroot-Anderson bill, from the point of view of the farmers whom it is intended to benefit, will be in its inelasticity. The Federal reserve system is based upon the theory of an elastic currency. As long as reserve requirements are met the Federal reserve banks can issue all the currency that is required for legitimate commercial or agricultural needs. The farm-credits system created by the Lenroot-Anderson bill, however, depends upon the sale of debentures in the investment market. In a time of difficulty debentures may be unsalable. Yet, it is in periods of stress that the farmer is generally most in need of credit. During the collapse in agricultural prices in 1921 the situation was greatly aggravated by a general calling of loans on the part of the banks, due to reduced deposits. A bank has a strong incentive to accommodate its customers in a time of stringency. The investors holding farm-credit debentures will have no such incentive. They will expect that the debentures be paid when due, regardless of the needs of the farmers. To protect their debentures the land banks will be compelled to liquidate their paper, to press it for collection, regardless of the hardships to the farmer. Far from supplying a reserve facility in times of deflation and stringency, the Lenroot-Anderson bill will, therefore, tend to accentuate the stringency and accelerate the contraction of credit.

IV. THE SYSTEM RESTS UPON TAX EXEMPTION.

In its promise of cheap money to the farmer the bill relies mainly upon exemption of debentures from Federal and State taxes. Yet the House has recently passed a resolution for a constitutional amendment prohibiting the issuance of tax-exempt obligations. A proviso exempting farm-loan bonds from the prohibition was rejected. It is difficult to see how the House could consistently within a few weeks authorize the issuance of a large amount of new tax-exempt securities, nor is a possible additional billion of tax-exempt securities to be contemplated without grave concern.

V. OTHER DEFECTS.

There are other defects in the Lenroot-Anderson bill, largely due to faulty draftsmanship, which will be alluded to only briefly:

(a) By providing that debentures shall be payable only out of the assets of farm credits departments the bill might render them nonnegotiable, in view of the provisions of the negotiable instruments law.

(b) The bill provides that discount rates shall not exceed by more than 1 per cent the rate borne by the last preceding issue of debentures. (Sec. 202.) It also contemplates that collateral may be segregated, so that high-grade paper, e. g., warehouse receipt paper, may be made the basis of a separate issue, and thus obtain the benefit of the lower interest rate to which its credit standing entitles it. (Sec. 201 (b).) If the last previous issue was based on such high-grade paper, this would set a standard for discount rates for all paper, whether high grade or otherwise. In a period of rising rates the banks might find their operations paralyzed by this limitation.

(c) Moreover, the makers of the high-grade paper would not get the benefit of the lower rate to which their paper is entitled, since discount rates must apparently be uniform to all.

(d) The provision which purports to limit to 1½ per cent the amount which a discounting institution may charge for its indorsement is inaptly drawn. Any paper upon which the borrower "has been charged" more than 1½ per cent in excess of the discount rate is ineligible. There is no criminal penalty for any evasion of the act. Moreover, a bank which has paper upon which a greater rate has been charged can not make such paper eligible by rebating the excess to the borrower. Unless the discount rate is high there will, therefore, probably be but little eligible paper in the Western and Southern agricultural States, where interest rates are often as high as 10 and 12 per cent.

(e) The provision relating to distribution of earnings is incomplete. No disposition is made of earnings above dividends and above the 25 per cent to be used to retire stock.

(f) There is no provision for liquidation of farm credits departments or administration in the event of insolvency.

(g) No provision is made for suits by or against farm credits departments.

(h) Agricultural paper is not correctly defined. Only paper the proceeds of which have been used for an agricultural purpose is eligible. Paper "issued" for an agricultural purpose, such as fertilizer notes or notes evidencing purchase of live stock or farm supplies, is apparently not eligible, since "proceeds" of such notes are not generally used for an agricultural purpose. The corresponding definition in the Federal reserve act covers both types of paper.

FUNDING OF FOREIGN DEBT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert the obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922, with Senate amendments thereto, and I move that the Senate amendments be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill H. R. 14254, with Senate amendments thereto, which the Clerk will report.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, there are four amendments to this bill which were added by the Senate. Two of those amendments pertain to form merely, and two to substance. The first amendment was made necessary by the fact that the report of the commission to the President, which was by him transmitted to the Congress, was not clear in its statement of the interest to be paid upon the bonds to be given by the British Government. To correct this an amendment was proposed while the bill was under consideration in the House, and that amendment was adopted. When it was adopted, however, it was not in line with reference to the report of the commission and the message of the President, so the first amendment strikes out the reference to the report and to the message and independently states the terms of settlement with Great Britain.

The second amendment is merely one of quotation marks.

As the bill originally passed the House double quotation marks were required, because there was one quotation and in that quotation was a quotation of other material. It was made simple.

The third amendment, however, goes to the substance. Instead of the House provision, that—similar settlements, but not more favorable in terms, with other governments indebted to the United States are hereby authorized to be made, subject to the approval of the President—

The provision is made—that there may be settlements with other governments indebted to the United States upon such terms as the commission created by the act approved February 9, 1922, believe to be just, subject to the approval of the Congress by act or joint resolution.

In other words, the commission does not have the power to conclude any settlement with the approval of the President. Whatever settlements it judges to be proper and just must be submitted to the Congress for approval by joint resolution or by act. I may say that the commission has no objection whatever to this amendment. There is, however, one objection which might assume considerable importance. We have just made a settlement with Great Britain, which is a favorable one, and that would naturally act as a spur to other governments to conclude settlements. Action upon such possible settlements is now postponed until Congress meets again next December. However, I do not regard that as a very serious objection. It will be remembered that the House voted by about 180 to 130 on the 24th of October, 1921, against bringing back these settlements to Congress for approval; but in our consideration here a couple of weeks ago I think it worked well to leave it to the House, because the Members, instead of tearing the settlements to pieces, took it up as a general proposition, as an entirety. Then there is one other thing which I think is very much to the credit of this body; there was a nonpartisan spirit manifested, and a large majority of those on the other side voted in favor of the settlement. I think those who voted against it did it more as a perfunctory act, with the view that in so doing they were performing the duties of a minority.

The fourth amendment, which is also one of substance, changes the commission in its membership from five to eight, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be ex officio a member and that the other seven shall have not more than four of any one political party. That leaves on the commission the present members and requires the appointment of three others, whom I fancy it is intended shall be of the Democratic Party. That will evoke the applause of some, and personally I have no objection to it, though I really think five a better number for such a commission than eight. The controlling fact in favoring acceptance of the amendments is this: This is a great international settlement which has to do with the stability, financial and political, of the whole world. When the proposition was put up to the British cabinet, the Chancellor of the Exchequer arriving from this country on Friday night, the British cabinet on the following Tuesday, only three or four days later, agreed to it; and it is well for us to agree to it promptly without any delay such as would be incident to the appointment of a conference committee, and without any further discussion in the Senate, where discussion, free to all, has already expanded to what some think—and I share that opinion—to unreasonable limits. One other point: I trust, Mr. Speaker, if similar settlements with other nations are referred again to Congress there will be an absence in the discussions here and in the other body of those attacks upon the country with which we are dealing, which characterized some of the discussion of the settlement with the British Empire. Such attacks as were made, if they were taken seriously in diplomatic circles, might strain our relations with other countries.

We are not doing credit to ourselves as a legislative body when any of us gives free rein to these expressions of criticism and expressions of dislike of other countries. There are certain standards of politeness and comity between nations which we should preserve in all our transactions. I trust if the commission should agree upon other settlements to be brought back here the discussion will be free from the animadversions which developed in another body in the discussion of this subject. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker. [Applause.] This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means to agree to the Senate amendments and it is very gratifying, I may say, in the brief time at my disposal this morning, to us who in October, a year and some months ago, fought so hard to have the final disposition of this matter referred to the Congress to find that this has now been done. I also want to congratulate the country that there has been a return to some semblance of fair play by bringing in a provision whereby three Members of the minority may be represented on the commission charged with the duty of making settlements in which thousands of American people who belong to the minority are interested. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD]. [Applause.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill passed the House on February 9 I made an argument on the floor in opposition to its terms. I felt then that I made a legitimate argument against the bill and feel so yet. The crux of my argument was that the British taxpayers should pay the same rate of interest on the bonds they issue, with which to pay their obligations to us, that our taxpayers must pay on the bonds we issued when we loaned the money to Great Britain. As I said, I feel that this is not only a legitimate argument but a reasonable and sound argument. I was taken severely to task by the Wall Street Journal of date February 10, and was criticized and abused by this great representative of Wall Street financiers and international bankers, and I shall place this article in the RECORD to show how the representatives of Wall Street interests abused me for my attitude.

[From the Review and Outlook.]

CRITICS OF BRITISH REFUNDING.

Representative OLDFIELD, of Arkansas, speaking of the British plan for refunding the debt to us, is reported as declaring, "While it is said that this settlement comprises the best terms possible, I do not know whether they are or not." There is not space in this column, or perhaps in this whole newspaper, to discuss so vast a subject as what Representative OLDFIELD doesn't know. What he does know could be dismissed in about three lines, after deducting the things he knows which are not so. He speaks of taking the "people's" money at 4½ per cent to lend it to the British at 3 per cent. He estimates this difference at some figure approximating $1,000,000,000, apparently by multiplying 1½ per cent by the extreme limit of the period, and doing it incorrectly.

But the American people are buying their own 4½ per cent bonds in the market through the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is doing his necessary new borrowing at lower rates. To exact a usurious interest from the British for more than half a century, on the theory that we once paid 4½ per cent ourselves, may sound like good finance in the Ozarks and it would be popular in Hester Street, New York. But whatever we may have paid for money under the pressure of war, we can not charge more than the rate of interest on a credit as good as that of the British, which credit will be at less than 3 per cent long before the first 10 years are over.

And what Mr. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas, did not learn at the crossroads grocery, where he obtained his conceptions of international finance, is that the period he uses with which to multiply the difference of 1¼ per cent in interest includes the complete amortization of the loan. (Amortization means the provision for repayment, Mr. OLDFIELD.) One of the greatest weaknesses of popular government is that it is average government and never expert government. It is necessary to get it down to the intelligence of a Congress of OLDFIELDS. But the OLDFIELD has always the first characteristic of ignorance. It by turns despises, distrusts, and fears what it does not understand. Thus Congress adds another interest limitation to the refunding bill, totally unnecessary and operating as a bar to settlement with other nations, exactly as the meddlesome and unintelligent limitation of 4¼ per cent over 25 years acted in the present case.

Nothing could have done more to stimulate international good will and also to relieve the burdens of the American taxpayer, with their hampering restrictions upon American business and credit, than a unanimous acceptance of the Debt Commission's terms by a rising vote. This was the gracious thing to do. The American taxpayer will not lose a penny by the difference in bond interest, because the Treasury can buy Liberty bonds in the market and refinance at whatever the current rate of interest may be. To what a point have we come when we confuse boorish insolence with democracy?

When you have read this article you will realize that the Wall Street Journal made no argument in refutation of the argument which I made, but confined its statement to the lowest sort of criticism and abuse. In my reply I shall not stoop to the level of the Wall Street Journal. I have no desire to enter into a controversy with this paper, but my advice would be that when they criticize a Member of Congress they should refute the arguments of the Member of Congress, instead of descending to the low level of this article. Mr. Speaker, I have been in Congress now 14 years. I was born and reared in my district within 25 miles of where I now reside. No better people live than the people of my district. I did not come here to represent the ideas of Wall Street, the international bankers, or the Wall Street Journal, but, on the contrary, I came here to represent the plain people of my district and State, and the honest taxpayers of the country. I still contend that we should not be any more generous to the taxpayers of a foreign country than we are to the taxpayers of our own country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if this commission that made this settlement with the British Government had not been lenient and generous, how could the British Government pay these £100,000 gratuities to these big admirals and generals and lesser gratuities to these lesser officers? We had to make some kind of provision out of the American exchequer so that these gratuities could be paid in England.

Mr. OLDFIELD. In answer to the gentleman I will say that in the speech that I delivered on the 9th I used practically this language, that I thought if there had not been so much drum beating around the world by England she would probably have more money with which to pay her debts. I have heard the statement made in regard to this piece of legislation that we are helping our own people indirectly when we are giving a generous treatment to Great Britain, because then they will have money with which to purchase our surplus products, and it would thus be of indirect benefit. In the language of my friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], I would be very glad to see Congress begin to help the people directly instead of helping them indirectly. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. STEAGALL. If we are going to start out showing favors at the expense of this Government to the other governments based on the idea that it will revive international trade, had not we better get busy and pass the bills now pending in both Houses of the Congress to provide for the lending of a couple of billions to Germany in order that they may begin to pay?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Well, the one argument is just about as sound as the other. I will say to the gentleman, however, I would not be in favor of lending any more money to foreign governments. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House [applause], the two principal amendments to this bill do two things. First of all, it retains to the Congress of the United States the right finally to approve future settlements made by the commission with foreign governments. Secondly, it removes absolutely from the commission any possibility of politics. I hope that the amendments will be agreed to unanimously in the House. And, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks a statement recently made by a Presbyterian minister of Toronto, Canada, a very dear and long-time friend of mine, in which is pointed out the differentiations between socialism, communism, Bolshevism, anarchism, and nihilism, and such "isms." It is information to me, and it is a very clear explanation of the sentiments found in those different "isms," and I would like to have it printed for general use for the public because it is valuable information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in 8-point type for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does this Presbyterian minister condemn these "isms" or adopt them?

Mr. FORDNEY. He condemns them where they are un-American.

Mr. BLANTON. That is, he condemns them?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; he condemns them severely.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the document referred to:

THE MENACE OF BOLSHEVISM, ITS CAUSE AND CURE.

[A sermon preached in the First Presbyterian Church, Victoria, British Columbia, Sunday evening, April 6, 1919, by Rev. John Gibson Inkster, B. A. The first of a series of sermons on "The crisis and the Christ," or "Reconstruction and religion."]

"Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." (Matthew, 16–24.)

"And one of the company said unto him, Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." (St. Luke, 12–13.)

"We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." (Romans, 15–1.)

"For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead." (II Corinthians, 5–14.)

"In discussing this subject it is well for us first to give the definition and meaning of the word 'Bolsheviki' and also the word 'soviet,' for a good deal of confusion exists in the public mind on the meaning of these two terms.

"The term 'soviet' means 'the council of workers, soldiers, and peasants'—it is a political institution by means of which an empire, province, city, town, or village may be governed. The term 'Bolsheviki' means 'those of the majority'—it is a political party in the soviet—that party which controls the government of Russia to-day. Bolshevism is the principles, methods, and rules which dominate this party. As the word implies, it represents the great mass of the Russian peasantry, than which there is no finer peasantry in the world.

"Russia for the first time in her history has a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. This is the thing which the socialists of America, Britain, and Germany, the communists of France, and the anarchists of Russia have been trying to get for many years. In this sense Bolshevism is simply a new name for an old movement. It is in reality anarchy realized which means the abolition of existing institutions—social, industrial, and political—and the substitution therefor of government by the majority.

"Now, some may wonder why I, a Presbyterian minister, should discuss this subject in a church on Sunday night. My answer is: This is a subject which is vitally interesting and affecting the people in the church, and I consider it my duty to deal with such a subject in the light of the teaching of God's word. I am dealing to-night with the great theme of 'The crisis and the Christ' or 'Reconstruction and religion,' and surely it is necessary to discuss Bolshevism in the light of that theme. For that reason my address to-night is not a disquisition on philosophy, economy, or society, but a sermon on religion.

"As already hinted, in dealing with Bolshevism we are really dealing with a phase of socialism—a phase which is largely determined by the influence of time and place. As a rule socialists believe somewhat differently from Bolshevists, but they have this in common at least—as Pat is reputed to have said—'We are agin' the government'; both are thoroughly dissatisfied with the present order of private ownership. And let me say in passing, there are millions who are neither socialists nor Bolshevists who are dissatisfied and disgusted with this present order of things. As we witness the selfish avarice, the unscrupulous profiteering, and the consequent vulgar display on the one hand, and on the other the intolerable inconveniences, the grinding poverty, and the unbearable suffering, no one with an atom of human feeling can remain silent or inactive under the present order.

"It so happened in Russia that the people got an opportunity of dealing successfully with these conditions, and at the same time with the persons large responsible, namely, the landowners, the aristocrats, and plutocrats. When the people of Russia got that chance they dealt with these conditions and classes in one tremendous blow. They had a real, live revolution, turned things upside down and inside out. Their act was extreme, but their answer was: We have suffered for centuries under these conditions and at the hands of these tyrants.

"This last remark suggests that we should now consider the causes which brought Bolshevism into existence. In order to do that, let me in a word differentiate between socialism, communism, anarchism, nihilism, and Bolshevism.

"Socialism is an economic theory which proposes the abolition of private capital and the substitution of collective ownership in carrying on the industrial work of the world. Communism advocates the collective ownership of all wealth. Anarchism advocates in addition the abolition of all government, by force if necessary. Nihilism is an extreme form of anarchism, if that were possible, and advocates the violent abolition of all existing institutions, social and political. It is difficult to determine just what Bolshevism advocates. Some say it is simply 'Marxian socialism plus machine guns.' We do know that it advocates all that socialism advocates, and in addition demands the abolition of all class distinctions and all government by the classes. The constitution of July, 1918, may be summarized thus: 'They demand not reform but reconstruction. Regeneration of the individual is useless, for the cause of the evil is not sin but poverty. Therefore, the present material conditions must be changed.'

"The cause which brought Bolshevism into existence is existing wrongs, and Bolshevism in Russia is a successful protest against these wrongs. In so far as Bolshevism is a protest against existing wrongs, the protest of Bolshevism is the protest of all organized, vital Christianity. Further, where no organized, vital Christianity exists there is not, never has been, and never can be any protest. I will not permit, so far as I am concerned, organized, vital Christianity—which is the church of the living God—to be identified with or tied up to any political, social, economic, or other party. The church of God must not be the slave or even servant of capital or labor in any of its organized forms. She must make her own protest, and when alive she does make it.

"Not only is the protest at the heart of Bolshevism the protest of the Christian church, but, further, many of the principles of Bolshevism are the principles of the church—principles which Christ propounded when on earth—e. g., liberty, fraternity, and equality. But when the socialistic alliance 'declares itself atheist and demands the abolition of all worship, of marriage, of classes, and the right of inheritance'; when the Soviet of Saratoff, Russia, declares that 'from March 1, 1919, the right to possess women of the ages of 17 to 32 is abolished'; when H. G. Wells declares 'the socialist no more regards the institution of marriage as a permanent thing than he regards a state of industrial competition as permanent'; when Bebel, another socialist, declares 'the idea of God must be destroyed; atheism is the root of liberty, equality, and fraternity'—when such representative men and institutions proclaim such pagan perversions of principles, I, as a minister of the church of Jesus Christ, repudiate such teaching, denounce such leaders, and, in so far as any community is misled by them, I absolutely disassociate myself from them.

"But I am now at the point where I must state, as I understand it, the position and attitude of the church of God to Bolshevism in all its aspects and phases. And in doing so I want to do it in as kind, firm, and unmistakable a fashion as I am capable of. My whole-hearted sympathies are with the workers among whom I was born, among whom I have lived, and among whom I hope to die, and all my feeble efforts have been and will be put forth on behalf of that class. In doing this, I pray God to help me to be kind and fair to all men, but my sympathies and efforts are with the struggling, suffering, sorrowing common people.

"Having said that, let me proceed to say the church of God must, in these days of reconstruction, place far greater emphasis on the social principles of Jesus Christ. She must never neglect the great salvation of the immortal soul but she must reaffirm 'the sacredness of the state and the truth that government is a divine institution; this means a new emphasis in the duties of Christian citizenship.' Further, the church must proclaim anew the teaching of the stewardship of wealth. There are many so-called Christians and church members who persistently demand a 'simple gospel' and are uneasy when anything is said about money and stewardship. The fact is the church has been allowing hundreds—yes, thousands—to steal and thieve and rob not only from their fellow men but also from God himself, and she has never even uttered a protest. No wonder the world and the workingman say the church has failed. As a minister belonging to the church, I know the church has not failed, but I can easily understand how the man in the street or even the man in the pew (whose religion consists in going to church once a Sunday when the weather is fine and he has nothing else to do) would not only think so and say so but believe so.

"But when we are allowing fair criticism of the church what shall we say by way of criticism of Bolshevism? In so far as Bolshevism expresses the protest of the people of Russia against the injustice and oppression of the autocrats I have only words of commendation to offer. On the other hand, when the Bolsheviki place themselves in the hands of or allow themselves to be led by such men as Lenin and Trotski, then I have a different matter to consider. These two men, when my country was in a death struggle with an unscrupulous enemy and gasping for existence, were plotting with the enemy or conspiring against my country; therefore I must denounce these men and repudiate the party which is following them. These men can not be trusted, and the Bolsheviki whom they lead—in so far as they follow—can not be trusted. This is a matter which admits of no compromise. As at present constituted the Bolsheviki in Russia are not only the enemies of the empire, they are the enemies of the church of Jesus Christ and of God himself. Therefore I resist them to the limit of my power.

"Another matter which makes Bolshevism a menace is its teaching and practices regarding marriage. Some may say the rank and file of the Bolsheviki don't seek to abolish marriage. I answer: 'Their leaders do, and they follow their leaders.' Further, the teaching of the leaders on marriage is the only logical outcome of their first principles. If there is to be no private ownership, we can not stop at a certain point; we must go the whole way and, as Wells says, abolish marriage as we abolish industrial competition.

"The most serious criticism which I have to offer against Bolshevism—and Marxian socialism which lies back of it—is the avowed and practical denial of God. It is a most serious matter when it is deliberately declared that 'the idea of God must be destroyed—atheism is the true root of liberty, equality, and fraternity.' We who are believers must resist this with might and main.

"If there be no God, then man is without hope and is indeed lost, with all the awful meaning of that word. Not only so; but, if this doctrine can be successfully propagated, instead of liberty we will get lawlessness, instead of equality we will get inequity, and instead of fraternity we will get fatalism. If these are to be the principles of our future democracy, then we must begin at once to make the world safe not for but from democracy. By God's help I shall not only resist but denounce and seek to destroy all such doctrines to the limit of my ability. If the workers, soldiers, and peasants identify themselves with such doctrine, then the old corrupt order is infinitely to be preferred.

"The question may now be fairly asked: 'Has the church any positive constructive contribution to make in this crisis?' I answer: 'Thank God, yes! The church has still enough vitality to make a tremendous contribution.'

"The State can do something in this crisis—but acts of parliament can not reconstruct society. The problem with which Bolshevism is struggling to-day—the problem which is facing us, for we have a similar problem here in Canada—is a political, economic, and educational problem, it is true. But it is far more. It is first and foremost a religious problem. It must begin with the individual, and the first lesson which the individual must learn is the lesson which the Master taught Nicodemus—'You must be born again.' That must be man's starting point, and upon that he must proceed. In other words, the old and almost forgotten doctrine of conversion must be revived and enforced. Unless church people and other people believe in and demand regeneration as a sine qua non of reconstruction there can be no stability for the present nor hope for the future.

"Thank God, there are men to-day in every walk in life who still believe in the necessity and possibility of conversion. A short time ago the Wall Street Journal (a financial paper) declared: 'What we need to-day more than railway extension, western irrigation, a low tariff, a bigger wheat crop, and a merchant marine is a revival of piety—the kind that mother and father used to have, the kind that counted in good business.' That conversion is possible has been made abundantly clear from a scientific viewpoint in a recent book on psychology by Professor Ward, of Cambridge, in which he states that 'Conversion is a fact and is common in human experience.' That conversion is possible and necessary has been made more abundantly clear in that wonderful book on 'Twice Born Again,' by Harold Begbie. There he tells of 12 men who, by the grace of God and through the Salvation Army, were born again—converted.

"A selection from the record of one will suffice. He is taken from the class to which Bolshevism is making an appeal and is supposed to minister. Begbie calls him 'the plumber.'

"At 16 years of age he was 'earning a tradesman's wage; an income sufficient to provide for a family, but not enough to satisfy his craving for drink after he got married. Every Saturday night meant a drunken bout and a beating for his wife and young family. In despair his poor wife entered the bar where he was drinking and tried to get him home. Maddened with drink he cried: 'For God's sake, woman, go * * * or I'll sign the pledge.' 'You've done that often enough already and you've wetted it every time.' For some reason the retort brought him to his senses. That night he sought out a converted chum and went with him to the Salvation Army meeting. 'Charlie,' he said, 'I want to get out of what I am in.' Said his chum, 'Well, just get down and tell God that; tell God you are up again it and He's got to help you or you are doomed and will shortly be damned.' The plumber knelt in prayer and was gloriously saved. When his drinking chums heard it they turned against him. When sneers and jeers failed they demanded and got him discharged. For months he hunted a job, but failed. The only thing which encouraged him so far as human help was concerned was the kiss and affection which he got from his wife and children. At last, in despair, he cried, 'Oh, God, don't forsake me. You know I love you and I am going to do my best.' By the help of God he won against the world, the flesh, and the devil. Begbie tells us: When he went to visit that home he found a neat, clean place and a happy family. The plumber said: 'I used to hang pictures on my wife's face that were heartbreaking to look at; I have taken them off and instead I have put smiles on her face and lovely pictures on the wall.'

"This story will illustrate the possibility and necessity of conversion in reconstruction. As Begbie concludes: 'Surely this story must bring home to the politician and sociologist the great truth that the one hope of regeneration is in the Christian religion—the one guaranty for a noble posterity—and there is really no other hope.'"

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the Senate amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

ASTORIA, OREG.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means may have two days in which to file a minority report on House Joint Resolution 449, which was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means yesterday; two days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means may have two days in which to file a minority report on House Joint Resolution 449.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What is that resolution?

Mr. COLLIER. That is the Astoria bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

READING WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the adoption of the rule to be presented by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, it may be in order for the Speaker to recognize some Member of the House to read Washington's Farewell Address.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that immediately after the adoption of the rule to be presented by the chairman of the Committee on Rules it may be in order for the Speaker to recognize some Member of the House to read Washington's Farewell Address. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question. What rule does he refer to?

Mr. MONDELL. The rule that will be presented immediately by the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RAYBURN. On what?

Mr. MONDELL. I believe the rule relates to the Alien Property Custodian's office.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly what I intended to remark about. I do not think there are more than two or three members of the committee that had any idea that this bill was likely to come up. We had a session of the committee this morning, and nothing was said about it. It is of tremendous importance. We should certainly have liked to have received a day's notice.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, that has nothing to do with my request. My request was simply with regard to the reading of the Farewell Address of the Father of the Country.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know; but I thought the time was a little short; a rule presented here when the minority has had no notice whatever of what was coming up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 514.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14222) entitled "A bill to amend the trading with the enemy act." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled between those for and against the bill, it shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of such consideration, the committee shall report the bill back to the House and the previous question shall be considered ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the consideration of what is known as the Alien Property Custodian legislation. In short and in substance the bill provides for the return of property belonging to alien Germans seized during the war to the amount of $10,000. If an entire estate seized amounted to $10,000, the entire estate will be returned under the provisions of the bill, and otherwise $10,000 of any estate will be returned to the owners.

At present it does not seem wise to give four hours of general debate to a matter that must be decided to-day. The bill contains some 15 pages. General debate rarely settles anything with respect to the provisions of a bill, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to change the time for general debate provided in the rule, as agreed upon by the Committee on Rules, from four hours to two hours.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the rule by inserting "two" hours instead of "four."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas: Page 1, line 7, strike out "four" and insert in lieu thereof "two."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman, when he offers an amendment, loses the floor, and that I or some one else is entitled to recognition in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see why; but the Chair will hear the gentleman on that. If he yields the floor to another to offer an amendment he loses the floor, but not if he offers the amendment himself.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is not the gentleman entitled to be heard against the amendment? Can the gentleman take the floor, offer an amendment, and move the previous question on that amendment?

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman is entitled to be heard if the House wishes to hear him, if the House votes down the previous question; but the Chair thinks the House has the right to decide whether it will hear debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course I yield to the decision of the Chair. I just want to say this——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I just want to say this, that there will not be any two hours gained by this sort of procedure.

Mr. BLANTON. May I call the attention of the Chair to a direct precedent on the matter? During the Sixty-sixth Congress——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like the gentleman to cite the precedent.

Mr. BLANTON. I will cite the precedent. In the Sixty-sixth Congress, when I had certain resolutions of inquiry before the House and on one of them I offered an amendment, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] claimed the floor, and Mr. Speaker Clark held that by offering the amendment to the resolution I lost the floor, and he recognized the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not see any logic in such a decision.

Mr. BLANTON. But that is the precedent, and Mr. Speaker Clark stated that it was based upon a long line of precedents.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Clark was not Speaker in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. At the time I offered the resolution Mr. Clark was Speaker and was in the chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ansorge	Dyer	Kreider	Ryan
Arentz	Elliott	Kunz	Sanders, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seven Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. LAMPERT be given indefinite leave of absence because of a death in his family. He went to Wisconsin yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. LAMPERT] be given indefinite leave of absence. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to make a statement that I think will satisfy the gentleman. When I offered the amendment cutting down the time for general debate from four hours to two hours it was with a view to securing action on the bill to-day. It was stated on yesterday that the House would recess somewhere around 5 o'clock this afternoon until 8 o'clock in the evening to consider bills on the Private Calendar. That would give only in the neighborhood of an hour for the consideration for amendment of a bill of 15 pages covering very important legislation; but I understand that it is agreeable to gentlemen to remain in session until as late as half past 6 in order to secure final action upon this bill. In view of that I withdraw the amendment that I offered.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman from Kansas say that all debate would be closed at half past 6?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I said that the resolution provides for four hours of general debate, and we hope to have the bill concluded by half past 6.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves one of the most important subjects that has been before this Congress, and, so far as I know, there has been no disposition among members of the minority either on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or on the Committee on Rules to try to prevent in any way the consideration of this measure. Its consideration to-day did come as a surprise to the minority members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There had been an agreement in the Committee on Rules, after discussion with members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, both formally and informally, that there should be four hours of general debate. I think the importance of the subject, compared with other subjects that I know are scheduled, justifies four hours of debate, and it was for that reason that I felt disposed to take the course I did.

Now, let me say, speaking for myself and myself only, I have no objection to remaining in session until 6.30, but I do not profess to try to bind others to that agreement.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair will designate the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] to read Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. HAWLEY read Washington's Farewell Address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority, of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home: your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding of them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religon and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation.

It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

[Applause, Members rising.]

AMENDING THE TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14222) to amend the trading with the enemy act.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in general the major purpose of the bill before us is to make partial return of alien enemy property seized during the war by the Alien Property Custodian under the trading with the enemy act.

The Great War broke out in Europe the forepart of August, 1914. From that date on and until April 6, 1917, the United States was a neutral power and as such enjoyed certain rights under international law and also by virtue of certain treaties theretofore made with the German Government. The first of these treaties was a treaty of "amity and commerce," concluded between the United States and Prussia in 1785. I quote from article 12 thereof, as follows:

> If one of the contracting parties should be engaged in war with any other power, the free intercourse of commerce of the subjects or citizens of the party remaining neuter with the belligerent power shall not be interrupted. On the contrary, in that case, as in full peace, the vessels of the neutral party may navigate freely to and from the ports and on the coasts of the belligerent parties, free vessels making free goods, in so much that all things shall be adjudged free which shall be on board any vessel belonging to the neutral party, although such things belong to an enemy of the other; and the same freedom shall be extended to persons who shall be on board a free vessel, although they should be enemies to the other party, unless they be soldiers in actual service of such enemy.

The next treaty was concluded in 1799 and was entitled "A treaty of amity and commerce." I quote article 23 thereof:

> If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments, and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

Next was the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded in 1828. Article 12 of this treaty adopts article 12 of the treaty of 1785 and articles 13 to 24, inclusive, of the treaty of 1799. This treaty was likewise with Prussia. Both Germany and the United States have held that the German Empire succeeded to all of the rights set forth in those treaties and accepted all of the responsibilities and obligations contained therein. Therefore the treaty of 1828, confirming the treaties of 1785 and 1799, remained in full force and effect when the Great War broke out in Europe on August 2, 1914.

It is a matter of history now as to just how Germany kept its obligations. It is unnecessary to go into the details of her conduct which finally forced us into the war. We can all recall the ruthless manner in which Germany treated our own citizens and their rights of persons and property, and especially upon the high seas. Several hundred American citizens, including women and children, lost their lives and millions upon millions of dollars worth of property belonging to our citizens was destroyed. Article 23, you will note, makes specific reference to the right of women and children. They "shall not be molested in their person." What a mockery Germany made of this provision! Article 12 of the treaty of 1785 provided for intercourse and commerce of the neutral nations which was to be permitted to navigate freely to and from the ports of the belligerent parties. This portion of the treaty was torn into shreds, and the whole world knows it. Finally, she became so bold in her violations that she made us stay off the sea, excepting as to certain zones in which we were to be permitted to operate one ship a week or something of that sort.

War came. The official recognition of that fact was given on April 6, 1917. On December 7 of the same year similar recognition was given by a declaration of a state of war existing between this country and Austria-Hungary.

On the 19th of April, 1917, Germany passed an alien property custodian act, which will be found on page 363 of the Imperial Laws. Under it she seized property of American citizens aggregating over $100,000,000 in value.

We waited. Finally, on October 6, 1917, Congress passed the trading with the enemy act. This act made it unlawful for any person in this country, except upon certain conditions, to trade with an alien enemy or ally of that enemy. The office of Alien Property Custodian was created, with the power to seize all money and property in the United States belonging to an alien enemy or an ally of an alien enemy. Under this act and certain amendments thereto, the Alien Property Custodian came into possession of property belonging to nonresident enemy aliens aggregating in value about $550,000,000. The law authorized the seizure of all alien enemy property. As a matter of fact, the seizures were confined to alien enemy property where the alien enemy was a nonresident. There were some exceptions, but these were applied to residents who were interned or who were in some way or other guilty of misbehavior.

Of this amount, about $200,000,000 has been returned, by virtue of certain amendments made to the act. For example, property belonging to Alsatians or citizens of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and so forth, have been returned. The trusts now number about 31,000. Almost all of them are small claims. Claims that are under $10,000 in value number 28,144. Under the terms and provisions of this bill, we propose to return to each and every claimant, providing his claim amounts to that much, the sum of $10,000. If this idea is adopted we will turn back in full 93 per cent of the claims. The value in the aggregate will be about $45,000,000. Of this amount, 50 per cent will be covered by claims under $10,000 in value per claim, while the remaining amount will be payments on account, so to speak, on claims larger than $10,000.

Let me say this at this particular time: The law as it was amended shortly following its enactment authorized the Alien Property Custodian to sell under certain circumstances and conditions. In this event the proceeds realized from the sale were to await the disposition of Congress. Sales were made. This was particularly true as to patents. Some of these sales have been criticized most severely. Many are in litigation. I think that several thousand patents are in litigation growing out of the sale of these patents by Mr. Mitchell Palmer, the first Alien Property Custodian. I want to stress the fact that there is no intention whatever upon the part of the committee to in any way validate these sales by the enactment of this or any other legislation. There is absolutely nothing whatever in the bill now before us which can be construed in any way as validating any one of these transactions. Furthermore, we have expressly reserved from the distribution under this act all patents and patent rights which have been licensed or sold or which are in litigation to which the Government is a party.

The armistice was signed November 11, 1918. This was followed by peace negotiations between the belligerent countries, ultimately resulting in certain agreements which were embodied in the treaty of Versailles, concluded on June 28, 1919; the treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, concluded September 10, 1919 (this was the treaty with Austria); and the treaty of Trianon, which was concluded June 4, 1920 (this was the treaty with Hungary). This country, however, refused to ratify these treaties, which thereby resulted in our continuing in a technical state of war with Germany, Austria, and Hungary.

To end this technical state of war pending the negotiating of separate treaties of peace with these countries, Congress passed the peace resolution on July 2, 1921, which terminated the war between this country and Germany, Austria, and Hungary.

In the treaty of Versailles (and similar provisions were set forth in the treaties with Austria and Hungary) Germany agreed to make reparation for and to indemnify the citizens of the allied and associated powers who had sustained damages to either persons or property growing out of the unlawful acts of the German Government either during the war, or as in the case of the United States, before our entering into the war. So far as we were concerned, the principal reason why we entered the war was due to the violations by Germany of the rights of our citizens as to their persons and property.

The combined losses of the citizens of the allied and associated powers were so great that Germany could not pay the bill then and there. It was impossible. She was unable to pay the just claims of American citizens growing out of the unlawful sinking of our ships, the killing of crews and passengers, the destruction of cargoes, and the destruction and confiscation of the property of American nationals in Belgium. There was one particular instance submitted to the committee in the hearings. An American concern had a large industrial plant in Belgium. The property was taken over by the Germans after Belgium was occupied. The equipment of the plant was carried away. The place was dismantled. This was not due to shell fire but was due to the fact that this large plant was a successful competitor of German industry. It was to the advantage of their German competitor that the place be put out of commission and destroyed.

There is not any question but what it was the duty of our commissioners at Versailles to acquaint the German commissioners with the losses of our citizens growing out of these unlawful acts of the German Government and demand restitution. A glance through the treaty of Versailles will show provisions indicating clearly that that is what our representatives did. What was Germany to do? She could not pay in cash the great bill that the allied nations presented to her. Her sins had been to great. Neither could she pay in kind. She could not bring back the dead to life. Neither could she return the hundreds and hundreds of ships that had been destroyed nor replace the millions upon millions of dollars' worth of cargoes that had been sent to the bottom of the sea. The only remaining thing, therefore, for Germany to do was to admit her inability to then and there pay the loss either in cash or in kind, but to tender security for the ultimate payment of the claims. She was in the position of a debtor that was either insolvent or nearly insolvent. She was without cash or property that could be liquidated into cash. The available assets consisted of property, real and personal, located in Germany and in real and personal property located outside of Germany but belonging to German nationals residing in Germany. In other words, the real and personal property situated in the United States, but the title to which rested in German nationals, was an asset of the German Government. As a sovereign power she had control over her nationals and the right that any government has over the personal property at least belonging to her nationals, no matter where that personal property may be situated. The right of a sovereign nation is exercised in the power of taxation, which our great Chief Justice has said is the power to destroy. In other words, the right to tax is the right to tax so greatly as to take it all. Then there is the right of eminent domain.

Therefore, when Germany found itself unable to then and there make restitution for her wrongs, she made provision in the treaty of Versailles for the allied or associated powers to retain the property of her nationals as security for the payment of all just and lawful claims.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HAWES. Is not the gentleman mistaken in the statement that we presented any claim to Germany? As I understand it, the American Government has not yet granted any claims to Germany of any kind.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Our peace commissioners did not ask of Germany as a Government the payment of anything to us as a Government, but it is my understanding, and I should hate to think otherwise, that our commissioners of peace did present to Germany the fact that our nationals had claims against the German Government growing out of violations of international law and treaty obligations, and that the United States would expect the German Government to make restitution for that damage. With that in mind the President of the United States and those associated with him had embodied in the treaty of Versailles, article 297, and annex (4), the provisions I have described.

Mr. HAWES. As a matter of fact no claims have been presented against Germany by the American Government. No claims can be presented until the Mixed Claims Commission has reported.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman is talking about the presentation of a detailed statement and claim of a particular individual or number of individuals. I am talking about the general proposition that our commissioners presented the German commissioners at Versailles, that they were in duty bound to protect the rights of our citizens and that they expected Germany to make proper restitution. The details were to be carried out later and provision was made for doing so. The gentleman from Missouri will not deny that our commissioners and the President of the United States subscribed to the very proposition which is in the treaty.

Mr. HAWES. I do deny that statement most emphatically.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have a very vivid recollection of seeing it and all you have to do is to refer to the treaty of peace with Germany to see the signature of the President of the United States, and article 297 and annex 4 is a part of that treaty. I insert them in the RECORD as follows:

Section 4, article 297, paragraph (b):

Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present treaty, the allied and associated powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals or companies controlled by them within their territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, including territory ceded to them by the present treaty.

Annex 4:

All property, rights, and interests of German nationals within the territory of any allied or associated power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation, or other dealing therewith may be charged by that allied or associated power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that allied or associated power with repard to their property, rights, and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that allied or associated power entered into the war.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has asserted that our commissioners made representations to the Government of Germany that we would expect the Government of Germany to take care of these claims involved in the violation of international law. I want to ask the gentleman if our commissioners took the position in their negotiations that the private property of nationals of Germany located in this country would be held answerable for the payment of those claims?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Absolutely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the majority of the committee take the position in this controversy that it is a correct principle, either in international law or of international morals, to confiscate the private property of German nationals to enforce the settlement of a debt of the Government of Germany itself?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The majority of the committee takes the position that it is the duty and the obligation of this Government first to look after the interests of its own citizens. Our Government did so when it presented the matter to the German Government for settlement. Germany then said, "This is all we have to offer." Our commissioners felt that was the best they could do, and these provisions were then embodied in the treaty.

Our commissioners at Versailles, with a knowledge of Germany's condition and her ability to make payment therefore in the future, must have figured that the only sure way to secure the payment of these claims was by impounding the property of German nationals in this country and retaining it for the purpose of eventually securing the payment of the claims of our citizens. These terms certainly must have met the approval of Congress for the peace resolution specifically refers to the rights and privileges we acquired by virtue of the treaty of Versailles and reserves those rights. I quote from section 2 thereof as follows:

That in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals any and all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages, together with the right to enforce the same, to which it or they have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof; or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States of America by reason of its participation in the war or to which its nationals have thereby become rightfully entitled; or which, under the treaty of Versailles, have been stipulated for its or their benefit; or to which it is entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers; or to which it is entitled by virtue of any act or acts of Congress; or otherwise.

I feel that it is the duty of the American Congress in all matters of legislation pertaining to this property to bear in mind that our first duty is to safeguard and protect the rights of American claimants until the German Government shall have satisfied them in full. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will permit another question, I think it is important for us to clarify the respective attitudes on this proposition, because it involves a fundamental question, pursuing the policy the gentleman has stated to its legitimate conclusion, if a settlement were not made by the German Government, say, in the course of 50 years because of its inability to raise the cash to pay it, this property would be held in trust by the Alien Property Custodian for that period and the real owners denied its possession for that period of time.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Why, certainly, that is my own position upon it. We did not confiscate this, but Germany, with all the power of a sovereign nation, with the right of eminent domain, with the right in its own constitution of expropriation, has said, "We are going to take for the time being the property of our own nationals and place it as security for the payment of debts which we justly owe." In addition to that they also say, "We ourselves will compensate our own citizens for any damages that may result to them by reason of our seizure for that purpose." This provision will be found in paragraph (1) of article 297 of the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, followed to its ultimate analysis, it resolves itself into this, that if the German Government per se can not pay these obligations when they are established, then these private properties of German nationals in America shall be held and confiscated for the purpose of paying the public debt of Germany. Is not that the logical conclusion?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. We would have the right to do so—certainly—and in accordance with the practices of nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. In accordance with the usage of nations?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Why, certainly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is that the gentleman's interpretation of our stand and the stand of civilized nations?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Why, there is no question of the right of a nation to take the property of its citizens in accordance with its own laws and devote it to a particular purpose. This is what Germany has done.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman contend that that is the usage under international law?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; and I say to the gentleman, as the gentleman knows, that in our treaty of peace with Spain there was a similar provision regarding the claims of our own citizens against Spain.

Mr. RAYBURN. That was an offset of a claim against a government—against a claim against a government—and it did not involve——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It was an appropriation by this Government of an asset belonging to an American national consisting of a claim against Spain. We appropriated it for our own use. Then we became obligated to our own citizens to make restitution therefor. A provision was made authorizing him to go before the Court of Claims. You will find a case of that kind in Meade v. United States, 2 Court of Claims, 224.

Mr. RAYBURN. Exactly. That is an offset of a claim against a claim. We would be willing to offset a claim against a claim with the German Government, but here is a specific confiscation of the private property of citizens of other governments.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There is no distinction.

Mr. SWEET. But the gentleman does not contend that this bill is in accordance with the policy that he announces here, or in accordance with the policy this bill was framed upon?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Only to a degree, but if we have the right—we are talking about the abstract right—by reason of Germany's action in the treaty, to take and hold a part, we have the legal right to take and hold all.

Mr. SWEET. But neither does the gentleman contend that position is in accordance with international law?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman contends he is on solid foundation so far as international law is concerned.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman from Minnesota does not place reliance upon the treaty of Versailles because we have not ratified that treaty.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I was about to proceed to that when these numerous interruptions followed. Germany in an agreement with our allies granted this right to us as well as to them. We did not have to sign ourselves. To avoid any doubt, however, we reserved all rights when we passed the peace resolution.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman said peace resolution. In the peace resolution we reserved our rights in reference to this property, but did not mention the Versailles treaty, but in the Berlin treaty which was negotiated we reserved our rights under the Knox-Porter resolution, but the Knox-Porter resolution did not mention the Versailles treaty.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman, who is usually correct, is not in this one instance; section 2 of the resolution has reference to the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am sorry I was inaccurate in my statement, but the Berlin treaty expressly does include the Versailles treaty.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And the Knox-Porter resolution.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; and the Knox-Porter resolution.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Does the gentleman contend that the German Government as a sovereign power, exercising the rights of a sovereign power over its own citizens, has set aside this property as security for the payment of the debts of that country?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. And if confiscation ultimately results it will be confiscation by the German Government, and not by our own Government?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is the case exactly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am glad the gentleman [Mr. LINEBERGER] who has just taken his seat has made that point. It is not a question of international law. Germany does it for its own people by domestic law.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. The action taken, call it what you will, is the action not of the United States, but of the German Government. I was trying to bring home to the Members of the House this fact: That this procedure by Germany, and which we have approved by congressional enactment and by treaty, is not unusual. In so approving it, we merely followed out previous practices and customs heretofore in effect among the nations of the world.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would like to bring out a little more fully our rights as defined by a treaty to which we were not a party—the treaty of Versailles. As I understand it, the treaty of Versailles was ratified by Great Britain and several other powers to bring it into operation as between those powers. In that treaty there was a provision that certain territory should be ceded to the principal associated and allied powers, naming the five of them, in which the United States is concerned. We have the rights of a third party in a compact to which we are not a party. Germany agreed to grant Great Britain, France, Italy, and other powers—five powers—certain rights, and we claim those rights, not because we are a party to the treaty but it is a treaty direct between Germany and those other powers in which we have an interest.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. In addition to that, following the passage of the peace resolution, we signed the treaty of Berlin, in which we entered into an agreement with Germany wherein they confirmed the rights that we had acquired in the treaty of Versailles, so that our rights rest upon two propositions. This will be found in section 5 of the treaty. Similar provisions exist in the other treaties as to Austria and Hungary.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Did not the peace treaty specifically refer to this property?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. You mean the treaty of Berlin?

Mr. LONDON. Yes. Did it not specifically refer to this property?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. If the gentleman will turn to section 5 of the treaty of Berlin, between the United States and Germany, and the similar treaty with Austria, he will find that provision. I will read it:

SEC. 5. All property of the Imperial German Government, or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of, or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, and all property of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government or its successor or successors, and of all Austro-Hungarian nationals which was on December 7, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of, or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States of America and no disposition thereof made, except as shall have been heretofore or specifically hereafter shall be provided by law until such time as the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or their successor or successors, shall have respectively made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims against said Governments, respectively, of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America and who have suffered, through the acts of the Imperial German Government or its agents, or the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its agents, since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, whether through the ownership of shares of stock in German, Austro-Hungarian, American, or other corporations, or in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war, or otherwise—

It is not necessary to read further. The section is set forth in entirety in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time indicated by the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield myself five minutes more.

Mr. LONDON. The question, then, of taking possession of the property of individual nations in consonance with international law becomes an academic question in view of the specific terms of the peace treaty relating to that subject?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. It is a matter of contract.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman in revising his remarks, especially in the colloquy between himself and the gentleman from Alabama, should, I think, give attention to this, because I believe in that colloquy he propounded a doctrine that he would not wish to maintain here. He should make it appear that all he meant was that such rights as we claimed, we claimed by reason of a treaty with Germany, and that we claim the right to take the property of individuals.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I did not understand that the question of the gentleman from Alabama involved the subscribing by me to any doctrine of confiscation by our Government. Under this arrangement, if there is confiscation, it is by Germany, not by us.

Mr. TILSON. I was afraid the gentleman's language would indicate that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I thought that I had made it clear that I was merely calling attention to this particular practice, which practice has been heretofore used by nations in settling similar differences following a war.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman does not advocate the idea that the Government has the right to confiscate the property of nationals?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Our Government? Certainly not.

Mr. LONDON. Governments as a rule protect the property of noncombatants even in the territory of the enemy. Is not that true?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. But the gentleman does subscribe to the doctrine that the German Government, having exercised the right of eminent domain over the property of its nationals or citizens, has the right to hypothecate that property as security for the amounts contained in this treaty?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Articles 7 and 153 of the German constitution so provide. There can be no question about it. I quote therefrom the material portions, as follows:

ART. 7. The Federal State has jurisdiction over: * * * matters concerning expropriation.

ART. 153. The constitution guarantees the right of private property. Its nature and limitations are defined by law. Expropriation shall take place only for the common good and shall be subject to due process of law. There shall be appropriate compensation, unless otherwise provided by Federal law * * * property rights impose certain duties. The use of property shall serve for the common good.

Mr. LINEBERGER. The question of international law right here is purely an academic one and does not enter into this transaction?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So far as this particular transaction is concerned, no.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HAWES. It seems to me it is important to clear up this point. The gentleman does not assert that Germany by any act of hers has segregated the property of her nationals in this country for the payment of her war debt or any other debt?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HAWES. She has simply given the United States the option, if the United States exercises that option, but by no act of hers has she taken any such position.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The German Government has set this property aside as a pledge for the payment of those claims.

Mr. HAWES. The gentleman can not point to a statement in the hearings before our committee on the part of the State Department or any other witness that sustains that contention.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. All the gentleman has to do is to refer to the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of Berlin. It will be found first in the treaty of Versailles and then in the treaty of Berlin.

Mr. HAWES. I have read those treaties, but the only thing that Germany has done or that the United States has done has been to appoint a mixed commission. Germany has not decided that her nationals' property in this country should be used, and the United States has not so decided.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Oh, well, the gentleman has simply gone back to the position which he had taken before. The Mixed Claims Commission has been agreed upon by this country and Germany in order to carry out the details of the provisions of the treaty of Versailles as confirmed by the treaty of Berlin.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am sorry I can not yield further. I must conclude and let my colleagues have an opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield myself five minutes more.

The gentleman from Missouri has referred to the Mixed Claims Commission. This is the result of an agreement entered into by Germany and the United States following the negotiating of peace with Germany as embodied in the treaty of Berlin. Germany appoints a representative to that commission. We appoint one. The two agree upon an umpire. This commission is now engaged in the hearing of the claims of American citizens against the German Government growing out of her unlawful acts preceding our entry into the war. This commission is the court or tribunal agreed upon by Germany and the United States to pass upon the questions of law and fact pertaining to all the claims that may be submitted before it. It is up to this tribunal to say just what particular claims shall be paid and the amounts to be paid. Several thousand of these claims have been already presented. They are still coming in. On the 1st of January the face of the claims amounted to about $500,000,000. The present estimate—and it is only an estimate—is about $1,000,000,000. We have so drafted this bill as not to in any way impair the security and thereby prevent the ultimate collection of all just American claims that may be agreed upon by this Mixed Claims Commission.

I quote from article 1 of the Mixed Claims Commission treaty, reading as follows:

The commission shall pass upon the following categories of claims, which are more particularly defined in the treaty of August 25, 1921, and in the treaty of Versailles:

(1) Claims of American citizens arising since July 31, 1914, in respect of damage to, or seizure of, their property, rights, and interests, including any company or association in which they are interested, within German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914.

(2) Other claims for loss or damage to which the United States or its nationals have been subjected with respect to injuries to persons, or to property, rights, and interests, including any company or association in which American nationals are interested, since July 31, 1914, as a consequence of the war.

(3) Debts owing to American citizens by the German Government or by German nationals.

In conclusion, the treaty of Versailles provided for the retention of this property by the United States. This Congress approved that by expressly reserving that right in the peace resolution. When peace was negotiated with Germany by the signing of the treaty of Berlin specific reference was made to the peace resolution, and the portion regarding the retention of property was set forth in the treaty. In addition, it was further provided that this property should be retained until Germany "shall have made suitable provision" for the satisfaction of all claims against the United States of all persons who owe permanent allegiance to the United States and who have suffered damage through the acts of the German Government.

What provision has Germany made? None whatever. She has agreed to the appointment of a Mixed Claims Commission to ascertain the amount of the claims against her, but she has made no provision whatever for the payment of those claims. If, then, we are to perform the first duty of a government—and that is to protect the interests of its own citizens—we ought not to return this property, which Germany placed with us as security, and which, in accordance with her laws, she had a right to so place with us, until the claims of our own citizens are paid.

As a matter of abstract right, we are under no obligation to return any part or portion of the property at the present time. However, there are a large number of these claims. Many of the claims are small; 93 per cent of them are less than $10,000 in value. Many instances of distress have been submitted to the committee. Some of these are set forth in the hearings. The amount that will be returned under this bill is but a little over 10 per cent of the total amount of the property held by the Alien Property Custodian. Your committee, therefore, feels that property up to the amount included in this bill can be returned without in any way impairing this security.

While the amount of the claims before the Mixed Claims Commission is in doubt and they are still coming in, we are not in a position to recommend to the House the return of any greater amount than included in the terms of this bill. Furthermore, if we should do so, the danger of impairing the security would be such that we feel certain that it would meet with most serious objection in another legislative body. Let us remind those who feel that we should return all of the property that we can that we have this practical question to determine and decide. If we seek to return more than what we have returned in this bill, we will in all probability prevent the return of any property for months to come. Therefore we feel that until Germany makes "suitable provision" we should continue, for the present at least, to retain all property held except that which we recommend in this bill to be returned. Only in this way can our Government carry out the obligations that it has to protect the interests of its own citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ELLIS. How will we meet the point that this bill is premature at this time?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The cost to the Government in time and trouble involved in fooling around with any number of these smaller claims is such that that is an item to be considered. And then, the committee, after going over the matter with the State Department and the Alien Property Custodian, felt that there is no danger whatever of impairing our security by turning back this amount.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am sorry, but I must conclude.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HAWLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House Joint Resolution 460, accepting the sword of Gen. Richard Montgomery.

AMENDING THE TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of course we are all surprised—I think I may include every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—that this matter has come upon the floor to-day. At 12 o'clock we came over here and found that this measure was to come up for consideration in a few minutes. We had been given to understand that it would not come up this week and that we would all be given ample time to prepare ourselves for the debate. Some gentlemen who are vitally interested in this measure have left the city with what they thought was the assurance that this measure would not come up to-day.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman be sure to make it clear, as I know he wishes to make it clear, that it was a surprise to all the members of the committee, on this side as well as on that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I began my statement by saying, as I now repeat, that no member of the committee on either side of the House had any idea that this matter would come up to-day. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], who reported the first bill to take over this property, is vitally interested in this matter. He is out of the city, not knowing it was coming up. Mr. HOCH of Kansas, one of the able Representatives on the majority of this committee, who feels as I do upon this question, believing this measure would not come up to-day, is also out of the city. But we may expect anything now, it seems.

Mr. Chairman, in all my life I was never more certain of the ground I take than I am upon this bill. Following every precedent of international law, following every Secretary of State of the United States from Jefferson down to Knox and Lansing, following every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States from its beginning to now, I know that in honor there is only one thing for this Congress to do, and that is to do the clean thing, the thing that will be understood the world over, and that is to return all of this property, and return it at an early date. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Minnesota allowed himself to be backed into the compromising position that any man will allow himself to be backed into who straddles an issue. I say this, that no civilized nation in this world to-day will countenance for a moment the doctrine that private property should be taken for the satisfaction of a public obligation. [Applause.] Every member of the committee in the hearings and in the consideration of this bill protested loudly that he did not intend that any of this property should ever be confiscated. But they use the term "security," they use the term "pledge." What is the difference between them? If a man owes me a debt and I take his property as security for that amount, and if the man does not pay the money I will take the property in satisfaction of the debt. I say that when any man here says that he is against confiscation in one breath and in the next breath says that he is for holding private property as security for the satisfaction of public obligations, he is for confiscation and it can mean nothing less.

Every Secretary of State that we have had from Jefferson to Lansing has announced the doctrine that no country should confiscate private property of enemy nationals. Mr Hughes's representative came before our committee and sought to create the impression that Mr. Hughes also believed that, but Mr. Hughes in one of his letters to the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee was unfortunate in the use of the following language:

It is understood that this bill has been introduced upon the assumption that it would require the return of a relatively small amount of property and that the security for the settlement of American claims would not be substantially impaired.

Why hold this property as security if you say you never intend to confiscate it? If this Congress announces the doctrine that it does not intend to confiscate this property under any conditions, then it is not security at all. The majority of the committee claim that they do not intend to violate the precedents of international law by confiscating any of this property, and yet an amendment offered in committee providing that it should be the declared policy of the United States that this property should never be confiscated was voted down by 10 to 7.

I hold also to the doctrine that an unlimited holding, that a continued holding, of property that is not your own, property being withheld from the rightful owner, is in itself confiscation. The gentleman from Minnesota allowed himself, by the questions of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], to be placed in the position by his direct answers that he would be in favor of confiscating this property if the German Government did not pay the claims of the American nationals. That is the only logical ground that any man can take who stands to-day for holding this private property as security for a public debt.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. In view of the situation in Germany to-day and, as we all know, probably will be for 50 years to come, is there any likelihood of Germany's being able to pay these debts—so would it not be confiscation?

Mr. RAYBURN. I doubt if I have an opinion upon that subject. My contention in this matter goes beyond men that claim against individuals for claims against the Government. My contention goes to this: I want the honor and the tradition and the glory of this Republic upheld by the vote in this Congress upon this occasion. [Applause.] Nothing except a compliance with our unbroken customs will do that.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it or not our unbroken tradition, and have we not made a positive pledge in our treaties with Germany and our allies to protect their property?

Mr. RAYBURN. I was coming to that. These people came to America, invested their money, not only upon their own volition but upon the earnest solicitation of the American people, under laws that we held up to every man in this land of the hope of equal rights and equal opportunity. Shall we at this time set a precedent that means confiscation of private property—and it can mean nothing else—when more American money is going to-day to foreign countries to be invested than ever before? Do we, if war should come between our country and those countries, want to be met by having those countries assert the savage doctrine of confiscation that we to-day will assert if we do not vote for the amendment which I will offer to return all the property? [Applause.]

Why do we not recognize Mexico to-day? What reason does the State Department give that we do not recognize Mexico and the Soviet Government of Russia? It is that the Government of Mexico and the Government of Russia have not yet given assurances that they will regard the interests of American citizens. Do we want the United States of America to be placed in that kind of a compromising position before the civilized world? I say our precedents have been unbroken. To go back in the history of this country to its earliest days, we call to the attention of the House the minority report. As early as 1796, in the case of Ware v. Hilton (3 Dallas, 199), the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court said that the doctrine of confiscation had been exploded and was frowned upon by all the civilized world. Another justice said confiscation has long been considered as disreputable.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] talks about the power of Congress to confiscate. Nobody denies that a great, strong Government like the United States can confiscate the private property of nationals of a Government like Germany when it is on its back. It has the power, but I assert that under every rule of international law, under every rule of our courts, under every rule of decency it has not the right to do it and should not do it. [Applause.]

Mr. John Marshall in one of the leading and celebrated cases said that the Government had the power but that long since the practice had been looked upon with obliquy. Let me read to some of you Republican Members who believe in confiscating this property what your patron saint said upon this question more than a hundred years ago. Alexander Hamilton, in commenting upon this very thing, used the following terse language:

No power of language at my command can express the abhorrence I feel at the idea of violating the property of individuals which in an authorized intercourse in time of peace has been confided to the faith of our Government and laws on account of controversies between nation and nation. In my view every moral and every political sense unites to consign it to execration.

Mr. John Bassett Moore is to-day our greatest authority on international law. Speaking on this subject, he sums up with this statement:

Property belonging to enemy nationals which is found by a belligerent within its own jurisdiction, except property entering territorial waters after the commencement of war, may be said to enjoy practical immunity from confiscation.

Yet these gentlemen who stand up here and take the compromising position that they will not return all of this property, that they will return the paltry amount of $44,000,000 out of $350,000,000, not including the $200,000,000 worth of ships, fly in the very face of every decision of our courts that I have referred to and many more, of the statement of every writer on international law that I have referred to and many more. They put themselves away and above any interest—and we might as well say it here and now—of American claimants, and I understand that when the thing is sifted 70 per cent of the American claims against the German Government will be by the American insurance companies who grew richer during the war than in any time in all of their history.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. If there is a principle which justifies or demands the release of a part of this property, would not the application of the same principle justify or demand the release of all of the property?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is what we ask in our minority report. If $10,000, why not $20,000? Why not $50,000? Why not $100,000? Why not all? As a matter of putting this country right before the nations of the world, I would rather this Congress would return none of the property than to return the paltry amount that it is returning.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. When does the majority of the committee promise that it will deal with the excess over $10,000, and on what conditions? Does it state any time or fix any conditions upon which it promises to deal with the excess?

Mr. RAYBURN. It does not. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] indicated that it might run on for 50 years, but if this matter runs on for even 25 years it will be confiscation as far as the people who now own it are concerned, for more than half of them will have died within 25 years.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman want the claims of American nationals against Germany to run on for not only 50 years but possibly 100 or more years before they are settled?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am going to settle one of these questions at a time, and I am going to settle the first one we take up right, if I have my way about it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think the claims of Americans should be settled first?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. I think the claims of American citizens against the German Government should be settled at the same time the claims of German citizens against the American Government are settled. These are not war claims. This is the concrete property that these people made here, having worked and invested on the faith of this Government.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WURZBACH. I understand the gentleman from Texas takes the position that a national of Germany has a right to claim his rights under international law without the intervention of his own government, that international law in itself guarantees to the national his rights, and that his government can not foreclose him in the assertion of his claim.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do contend that; and it would be the most savage doctrine ever announced in any civilized government if it were otherwise.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Upon what basis have they made this arbitrary choice of $10,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will tell the gentleman what made it, in my opinion. It was made because it covered a majority of the individual claims, and that is all. If the political end of this thing had not got to pinching so hard, they would not have returned even the $10,000, if they had been listening to these insurance companies and to other people who have piled up claims amounting to about a billion dollars. It is the history of war claims that not more than 8 per cent of them are ever allowed.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HAWES. The property under discussion is the property of individuals.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Mr. HAWES. Under the jurisdiction of the United States, brought here at the invitation of the United States, and no act of Germany can remove the responsibility of the United States to return that property. She is not bound by anything that Germany does, is she?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. HAWES. It is our responsibility.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is what I contend.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] as well as the statement of the gentleman who now has the floor, it is claimed by both the majority and the minority that there is no serious intention upon the part of the Government of the United States to ever confiscate this property.

As I understand the statement of the gentleman, it is his contention that so long as our Government holds this property as a pledge or security that we are in a way or in effect confiscating it for a period of time which we so hold it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Not only are we confiscating it for the time we hold it, but when such high authority as the Secretary of State says we must hold it as security I contend that those who stand with him stand for confiscation.

Mr. ROACH. This in a sense is not confiscation——

Mr. RAYBURN. We say in our minority report, and I repeat again what I repeated a moment ago, that the indefinite holding of private property from its rightful owner is confiscation; and in the case of these people even holding for 25 years, much less 50 years, will be a confiscation as far as they are concerned.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In respect to property held as security the only way you can realize on the security is to sell it and does it not mean that we are to sell?

Mr. RAYBURN. I say if this property is held as security and it is security, then it can mean nothing but that we are going to confiscate it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Because you can not realize otherwise.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. ROBSION. I understand that the British and Italian Governments and other Governments of our allies took over property of German nationals. What disposition have these other Governments made; what action have they taken?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I do not know.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can answer the question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wish the gentleman would answer.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is going through a process of liquidation. In pursuance of the provision of the treaty of Versailles they are liquidating those claims by a liquidating commission; it is a sort of clearing house.

Mr. ROBSION. Is that on the same basis?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Not the same basis as this; it is an international clearing house, that is what it is.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If it is the contention of the entire membership of the gentleman's committee that this country will never subject the property of these nationals to the payment of debts against the German Government, what is the reason for wanting to hold any of this amount, even to the extent of $10,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, the gentleman will have to ask them.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was just wondering.

Mr. RAYBURN. They asked the gentleman from Minnesota some time ago, and before he was extricated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and others he had admitted that he would be in favor of confiscating this property ultimately unless the claims of Americans were met.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. I ask this question in absolutely good faith. During the San Francisco fire, when hundreds and hundreds of acres were devastated, when people were standing in bread lines and drinking hot soup out of tomato cans, when all they had in the world were claims against the German insurance companies, these same companies walked out of the State of California with their claims unpaid. Should not those claims be paid before the insurance companies have handed back to them their funds?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know whether Congress had the power to go back of the statute of limitations——

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. They walked out of California; simply walked out and said, "You can come to Germany and sue if you want to get the money."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In reference to the gentleman's reference a moment ago to "confiscation" and in connection with the colloquy with the gentleman from Alabama, there was no other "confiscation" in mind than that which is involved in carrying out the principles of this legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will read his remarks carefully, I think he will agree with me that he probably inadvertently answered that he would be in favor of confiscation.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman keeps referring to our retention of this property and has made the statement that our retention of the property is confiscation. Now, if the gentleman will read the books on international law and treaties that this country has engaged in, and where it is discussed he will find the term "confiscation" is never applied to the appropriation of private property of a citizen of one country for the payment of claims of citizens of another by treaty agreement. Not one time is it called confiscation, and not only that but the gentleman will find, if he reads the books on international law, that the term "confiscation" includes the appropriation of the property for the use of the government.

Mr. RAYBURN. Exactly; and that is what I read, the decision of the courts. I have read the treaty; I have read books on international law, and that is why I am contending against the doctrine of confiscation here to-day, which the gentleman by voting for not returning this property is contending for.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman understands that we are not taking this property for the use of the Government if we do it. That is confiscation. That is what confiscation always means.

Mr. RAYBURN. Who can take this property from its rightful owners except the Government of the United States?

Mr. DENISON. The Government of Germany can, and has done so.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Why do we quibble here about this word "confiscation"? Is not the proper word "robbery"?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I think the word "confiscation" is savage enough. I think it is enough in violation of all that we have ever stood for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will allow myself five minutes more.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who spoke just a moment ago, if our Government is taking the ships of Germany for Government use and not to satisfy private claims?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the term that should be applied to the disposition of millions of dollars' worth of German patents sold for so grossly an inadequate price that the President himself said that the inadequacy of price constituted a badge of fraud? It was a sale made by this Government, and a sale which was attempted to be ratified and confirmed and maintained forever in the peace resolution. What was that but confiscation pure and simple?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so, and I think the courts of the United States are going to set that sale aside. I think they ought to, so far as I am concerned. I think when they sold those patents to this Chemical Foundation for a small amount, a nominal amount—I forget just how much; I think it was $250,000 only, many, many patents, one of which is conceded by everybody to be worth $10,000,000—I think it was one of the most disgraceful things that has ever happened in this country, and I think our courts will set it aside. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] seems to think this is not confiscation, because this property was not taken for the use of the Government itself but was being taken for the use of private individuals. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that is a worse form of confiscation than if it were taken for the use of the Government?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I think so.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I think we are all agreed that this private property should not be taken to satisfy Government claims. I think we are all agreed on that.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know, but I doubt that; I am agreed to that.

Mr. HUSTED. What I would like to ask the gentleman is this: What has the gentleman got to say against the propriety of taking private property of German nationals to protect the claims of American nationals against Germany?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have got this to say: How are you going to protect them unless you confiscate and sell this property and apply the money to those claims?

Mr. HUSTED. Well, if you sell this property and apply it to those claims, you do not apply the money in satisfaction of any Government claims.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and it is less justifiable; it is worse than to apply it in satisfaction of a Government claim. For the Government to take the property of an individual and give it to another individual is incomparably worse than taking the private property of an individual to satisfy an obligation of the Government.

Mr. DENISON. That statement would be entirely true if the Government did not take it in pursuance of a solemn treaty. But when the Government takes that action in pursuance of a solemn treaty, of course the gentleman from Texas can not complain.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are legislating here now. I said of the Knox-Porter resolution when it passed that it was a monstrosity, and I say so yet. You talk about a treaty with Germany. Germany had not anything else to do but sign it when they showed them where the dotted line was. They could not do anything else.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Taking the property of an individual by superior force amounts to conducting war against an individual, does it not?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. And that is wrong, whether it applies to the payment of a Government claim or an individual claim?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Has the gentleman pointed out during this debate that the private property which the Government seized for its own use and which it is now using is much more than adequate to take care of the private American claims?

Mr. RAYBURN. There is no doubt in the world about that.

Mr. SABATH. Some gentleman on the other side a moment ago asked the question, What is being done by Great Britain with the property that Great Britain has seized? and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] answered. I would like to know what has been done by the Austrian Government with the property that the Austrian Government seized belonging to American citizens.

Mr. RAYBURN. Austria never seized the property of American citizens, and I intended to call attention to that. This committee refused to return the property of Austrian nationals. Germany has returned all the property it ever seized from American citizens. She has only retained some money, and the only reason for delay in returning that is the disputed value of the German mark.

Mr. HAWES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. The gentleman from Texas wants to be accurate, I know. Austria-Hungary never took over any American property. All American property taken over by Germany, excepting certain bank accounts which are in dispute as to the value of the mark, have been released by Germany.

Mr. RAYBURN. That was my statement.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wish to ask the gentleman whether alien enemy property is not really being confiscated now by the shrinkage in value and wastefulness in its use?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I close with this extract from the minority report:

> Congress is confronted with a plain, simple, and understandable proposition. Will it scrap all precedents of international law? Will it repudiate the uniform decisions of our courts? Will it repudiate all of the Presidents from Washington to and including Wilson? Will it repudiate all our Secretaries of State from Jefferson to Knox and Lansing? Will it support the march of civilization or support Secretary Hughes in his demand that private property should be held and used as security for the payment of public debt?
> Shall we in this age of our Republic take a backward step and hold ourselves up to obloquy and scorn the world over? We can not afford to even be mistrusted, much less commit an overt act that will lose for us the respect of the civilized world. If we are not to do this we must by our action show to the world that we expect to live up to our own traditions and up to the high standards of modern civilization.

[Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the hour remaining to this side be assigned to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have been very much interested in the discussion of this question, especially the discussion by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. RAYBURN].

The whole question of the treatment of property of citizens or subjects of an enemy country by a belligerent which finds that property within its own boundaries at the outbreak of war is interesting, and it has had a development that we have not the time here to review, except to say that the treatment of such property has been growing more generous as civilization advanced. As to our own precedents, I think the gentleman who said we had never confiscated any enemy property has forgotten that when the Revolutionary War was going on 11 of the 13 Colonies confiscated the property of those of their citizens who remained loyal to Great Britain, and that after the war was over Great Britain appropriated money to compensate the loyalists and sent a court over to this side of the Atlantic. This court met in St. John, New Brunswick, and in Quebec, and in Montreal, and as far west as Niagara.

The minutes of that court—"minutes" is the word used of these records—the manuscript minutes are in the Congressional Library. The Canadian Government has had them printed. I have spent a great deal of time in analyzing some 1,700 or 1,800 cases considered by the court.

T. J. Lawrence, the author of an exceedingly valuable discussion of international law, says that only one instance of such confiscation can be found in the history of warfare since Napoleonic times, and that was in the heat of a civil war which we in America would like to forget, and consisted of confiscation by the Confederate Government of the property of those living within its borders who remained loyal to the North.

The United States Government in dealing with the property of German and Austrian nationals within the boundaries of the United States did not at first do anything that looked like confiscation. We provided an Alien Property Custodian to act as trustee.

I am very happy to say that I voted for that bill when it passed the House during the war, and I am also rather proud to say that I worked and voted against the amendment to that law afterwards that authorized the Alien Property Custodian to sell the German patents. [Applause.] That was in the heat of war.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. When was that amendment passed?

Mr. TEMPLE. I think it was in 1917. It was legislation in one of the appropriation bills. We could not avoid voting for the bill after that language was put into it, because we could not run the Government without passing the appropriation bill. If we voted for the appropriation bill, we were forced to vote for that item, but I did all I could to keep that item from getting into the bill.

Private property is not, however, sacred under the customs of war. Private enemy property at sea is subject to confiscation. An enemy ship—that is, a privately owned ship, owned by an enemy—is subject to confiscation simply because it is enemy property. Enemy cargo on an enemy ship is also subject to confiscation, no matter who the private owner may be. War is hell. International law has attempted to restrain some of its barbarities, but you can not get rid of them. Killing itself is contrary to all our moral senses, and yet it is one of the essential necessities of war.

Property within our own boundaries, however, does occupy a different position from property in an enemy country or enemy property on the high seas. The customs of the nations had grown lenient, had grown civilized to such an extent that enemy property within the boundaries of any belligerent would be respected; always, however, remembering that when the enemy government does unlawful things, reprisals are lawful.

Many millions of the American claims are for property sunk with the Lusitania, an unlawful act of Germany. There is no way to compel a government to make reparation for its unlawful acts except by doing what force gives the opportunity to do. The treaty of Versailles is not binding upon us, because we did not ratify it, but it is binding on Germany as a contract between that Government and the Allies that did sign it—England, France, Italy, and others. That treaty provides that the privately owned cables—not only the cables owned by the German Government but the cables owned by German corporations, German private property—shall be turned over. The United States will get its share of those cables.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I regret that I must confine myself to the one line that I am discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. TEMPLE. The privately owned property found in our territory is not to be confiscated; it is to be retained. The gentleman asks how long. Let me read from the treaty to show how long it will be retained. I am speaking of the treaty of peace between the United States and Germany, not the treaty of Versailles. In section 5 it says:

> It is further provided that the property of all German and Austro-Hungarian nationals coming into the possession of the United States following the declaration of war should be retained by this Government, except as provided by law, until the enemy Governments shall have made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims arising against said Government on behalf of American citizens who had suffered damages to their persons or property through the acts of the German or Austro-Hungarian Government.

The question is not whether we are going to turn back all of this property. That question is not before us. If the amendment turning all of the property back should be put into the bill the whole bill will be lost. Men whose consciences require them to return this property now rather than to follow out the terms of the treaty will kill the whole project.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think the United States Government has acquired for its own use enough property to care for these private claims?

Mr. TEMPLE. I presume that was taken into consideration during the negotiation of the treaty and when the treaty was drawn up, but the German Government evidently did not think so, for it agreed to the provisions I have just read.

The question is whether to turn back the claims under $10,000 or to turn it all back. Why do we propose to turn back the small claims under $10,000? They amount to 95 per cent in number, but not 95 per cent in value, of all the claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. TEMPLE. We turn back the small claims; why do we not turn back the larger claims? All these claims, large and small, become a question between the German Government and its own nationals. What is the German Government to do about privately owned property of its citizens which it has turned over to this Government under the terms I read from the treaty a few minutes ago? If the time should come when we would have to sell the property to make good the claims of our people against Germany, then the German owners would hold the claim against their own Government. Our people now have a claim against the German Government. This treaty authorizes the United States Government to hold the property of the German owners until the German Government pays the American claims. If we should even sell the property the German nationals would have a claim on their own Government. The small owners whose claims are under $10,000 may not be able to put much pressure on the German Government to hasten the time specified in the treaty, but the large owners can put pressure on that Government, and they are doing it. If they learn definitely that we are going to hold this property until the claims are settled, the German Government will come to time as soon as possible. That is the point. It is not a question of the confiscation of that property by the American Government. If we sell it the owners have a claim against their own Government.

I would rather the Germans would have a claim against the German Government now than leave the American citizen without any guaranty to collect a claim against the German Government. [Applause.] They will deal with their own people in a way they might not deal with the people of our Government. I am not raising the question of good faith, but their own people, powerful influences in Germany, will be able to put a pressure on the German Government for the settlement of these claims of the American citizen which might not otherwise be paid for a very long time. There is no dishonesty in what we are doing. Reprisals, in the first place, would be recognized in all systems of international law. If it was taking property in compensation of unlawful acts committed by the German Government, the policy of it might be questionable, but it would not be a departure from the principles of reprisals. We did not do that. But the German Government has agreed that we may hold the property until the German Government makes good. I am in favor of the bill. I shall be opposed to the amendment that will turn the remainder of the property over. I think such an amendment would kill the bill. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can make much of a speech on this bill. Really, I have not the patience to discuss it. I never have had much heart for a sham battle.

I trust that the Members of the House will not think me ill-mannered to again refer to this Congress as a "bunk Congress"—always pretending to do something, never really doing anything; always stalling; always grand-standing; always playing for political advantage; never responding to the public interest or dealing courageously and patriotically with the issues that come before it. Feeling this way, surely instead of being ill-mannered I am polite in restraining myself to such a moderate expression as "a bunk Congress."

There is not the slightest chance that this bill will pass the Senate. Those who put it forward know that it can not become a law. There is to be no honest effort upon the part of the administration to put it through the Senate. It is brought here merely as a little partisan play to satisfy certain elements that feel that this situation ought now to be dealt with.

Instead of dealing with the final disposition of the seized property of German subjects in a courageous, whole-hearted way, we find merely a straddle, a palliative, a hedging, a compromise. Instead of taking the property and confiscating it and applying it to the payment of American claims in full, which, whatever one may think of its morality, would be a consistent and logical policy, the administration proposes to give back a little of it in order to hush up some of the clamors that are being made. Instead of giving all the property back to its true owners and ending the matter, those who are in political power are afraid to do it, even though they wanted to do it.

They are afraid to affront the Lusitania claimants and other American claimants who want the money on their claims against Germany. Therefore they propose this compromise. Bunk!

If it is right to give any of this property back to its owners it is right to give it all back. If it be moral to confiscate a part of the property of private citizens of Germany and apply it to the payment of claims against that Government, then we should take all of this property and make that application of it. But with characteristic cowardice the administration proposes a middle course which will hush up the largest possible number of German claimants and their friends and at the same time not frighten those Americans who have claims against Germany into thinking they are about to lose their debts. Bunk!

I am amazed that gentlemen should argue upon this subject as though it were a mere question of law. They juggle with legal quips and subtleties—they point to the treaties of Versailles and Berlin—they quote the cold letter of the law like attorneys for the plaintiff in an action on a promissory note. They seem to think it is a sufficient answer to moral arguments to point to our agreement with the conquered German Government and say, "it is not so nominated in the bond," and therefore we will confiscate the private property. The Shylockian philosophy of these gentlemen is indeed surprising in dealing with questions which involve our Nation's honor and the integrity of the Republic.

I am surprised that gentlemen should argue this question wholly from a legalistic standpoint, as though it were a mere question of law. Pardon me, my friends, but from my point of view the legal aspect of the subject is the least of all its aspects, and of the very least importance. It is a matter of great national policy, touching our relations in the future with all of the nations of the world. That is its first important aspect. The other is that it is a matter of our national honor and of our Nation's integrity.

Oh, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Doctor TEMPLE, for whom I have great respect, knows a lot about theology, so I am told, and, of course, he knows that the old rule of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth was abolished by the New Dispensation. It makes no difference to me what Germany has done or what Germany is. The things with which I am concerned is: What has my country done? What shall my country do? What shall my country be? [Applause.] I am not willing to test the standards of American national honor by the standards of Germany, Great Britain, or of any other nation of the world, whatever they may be, and without disparagement to any of them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] thinks that it is not immoral to take this property!

Of course the gentleman is entirely conscientious in that view, and far be it from me to assert that he is wrong. I must speak only from my own standpoint and express only my own opinion. I never have any trouble in deciding what is the honorable thing for my country to do. It has never troubled me to determine what the standard of integrity for my country should be. All I need for my own satisfaction to do in such cases is to ask, What would my personal honor require of me as an individual under the given circumstances—what should be my personal standard of integrity as applied to the situation? The principle is old. It is not at all modern. The standard of honesty has been laid down for a long time. I do not have to invent it. Thank God there is authority—authority old as the hills—it comes to us in the divine commandment, "Thou shalt not steal!" It is just as wrong for nations as it is for individuals to steal.

That is the way I determine what my country ought to do under such circumstances. We were engaged in war with Germany. We declared through our official spokesmen time and again, as it was also declared upon this floor, that our war was not against the German people as individuals but against the Imperial German Government. We assured the people of Germany even when the war was near its hour of closing that if they would overthrow their autocratic Government and inaugurate a rule of democracy we would be ready to accept them back upon terms of peace as friends. Oh, I suppose we were liars when we told them that, were we? Very well, then, in that case of course we do not have to be consistent.

We declared war against the Imperial German Government. We did not declare war against private German citizens and individuals. Under our declaration of war against Germany it was honest and permissible for us to take the property of the German National Government, but it was not moral that we should take advantage of the fact that citizens of Germany had invested their money and their property in this country, to confiscate it merely because we were at war with their country. "Thou shalt not steal" is as applicable to governments as to individuals.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has referred to the "bunk" of the present administration.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, yes; and I called this "the bunk Congress."

Mr. BRITTEN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one thing. The word "confiscation" is used. The present administration is attempting to return at least a margin of its so-called confiscation. What has the gentleman to say about the former administration, which confiscated property and then under a "bunk" sale sold something worth hundreds of millions of dollars for a paltry few dollars? That property can never be returned.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The former administration did not confiscate property. If the gentleman means to ask me what I think of the transaction with the Chemical Foundation, I will say to him that I think everyone who participated in that deal ought right now to be in the penitentiary. Is that sufficiently direct to satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. BRITTEN. That satisfies me. It was done by the gentleman's administration.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why does the gentleman lug in that kind of partisan stuff? It is bad enough to have a "bunk" administration on hand now. For God's sake let us forget, if we can, the "bunk" of the past.

Mr. BRITTEN. I was trying to draw a comparison.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Surely, with this administration in front of us and with this Congress in front of us, the gentleman ought not to be talking about past administrations and past Congresses. The Chemical Foundation steal to which he refers and condemns did have in it a certain element of courage, which is a thing that neither this administration nor this Congress has had. I have some sort of respect for the highwayman who meets me on the road and holds a pistol to my head, much more than the cowardly sneak thief who slips behind me and dives his hand into my pocket. [Applause.]

Now, we had a treaty when we went to war with Germany, a mere "scrap of paper," of course, and article 23 of that treaty reads as follows. This is the treaty which came down from 1799 and was in effect with Germany when war was declared on April 6, 1917.

If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employment and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

Then as the closing sentence of the next article I find this:

And it is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever, shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article; but, on the contrary, that the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature and nations.

Mr. HUSTED. What has the gentleman to say to the provisions of section 5 of the existing treaty between Germany and America—that is, the treaty which terminated the war? This provision, as I understand it——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am entirely familiar with it.

Mr. HUSTED. Permitted the doing of everything that is proposed to be done under this legislation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I must have been very obscure and confused in the beginning of my remarks in which I devoted myself to those gentlemen who take a purely legalistic view of this situation—those who say "the letter of the law gives the right to take this property and therefore we will take it." I regret my argument was entirely lost on the gentleman from New York. Surely I ought not to be expected to go back and repeat what I said from the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. HUSTED. I am not asking the gentleman to do that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. From the beginning of this debate gentlemen have been making the same legalistic argument which the gentleman now puts forward as against the moral argument I am presenting, and making it with the same art with which the gentleman from New York now seeks to place the letter against the spirit of the law, legal quirks and subtleties against the morals of the situation. They also have sought to obscure the aspects of national honor and policy that we have the legal right to confiscate.

Mr. HUSTED. I have not put forward that argument at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will acknowledge the gentleman has not presented any argument at all. Will he not allow me to proceed?

Mr. HUSTED. I asked a question, which the gentleman did not answer.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I answered the gentleman. He must not expect me to make him understand my answer.

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think anybody else understood it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is in error to assume to measure the understanding of others by his own.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The provision the gentleman read in the Prussian treaty applies to merchants in this country. The seizure by the Alien Property Custodian was the property of nonresidents of enemy aliens. That is the property involved in this legislation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Really these fellows who argue these superfine legal points make me laugh. They seem unable to comprehend that morality and good faith are more worth while. I read the articles from the treaty merely for the purpose of indicating some idea of the liberal and enlightened spirit of that time and the spirit which characterized the treaty. Yet the gentleman returns to drive through a legal wilderness and wriggle in and out between the trees in the effort to find some safe course for what he wants to do. I am appealing to the spirit of the treaty. I have no doubt that had there been such conditions existing when the old treaty was written as there was in 1917 it would have covered by its clear letter every situation that has been pointed out. I submit that we ought not to approach this subject like a special pleader in a case in court and to undertake by these legalistic arguments to dull the qualms of good conscience before the nations of the world. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to make my point——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will permit me to make my point, then I will yield.

We had Germans in this country who were interned without trial upon a mere suspicion. Those Germans had their property seized by the Alien Property Custodian and it is still withheld from them. They were strictly within the protection of the letter of this treaty. No good lawyer who examines the subject will deny this statement, yet we are holding their property now. That is the fact.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In a moment. But I have just asked that I be let alone for a moment or two.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman does not care to yield I hope he will not scold.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How can I help scolding at gentlemen who take the position the gentleman takes? I have no patience to answer the stuff they put out. I really have no heart for this discussion. I am merely trying to oblige my friends on the committee and take up a little time. [Laughter.]

As I said, here is our treaty of 1799. We made a solemn agreement. We deliberately made it applicable to a condition of war. What is the spirit of the treaty? It is that we invited the people of Germany to come to the United States and locate among us and do business here. We invited them to make their investments here. By this treaty we called upon every German subject to come to the United States and buy property, whether he wanted to live here or not. After we got them here and got their money invested and got them to help us develop our great new country, along comes a war, and, forsooth, because we think there is some sharp legalistic ground upon which we may confiscate their property, we do it. Such a proceeding must be shocking to the enlightened conscience of mankind.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think the gentleman has perhaps covered the proposition I had in mind. But I think the truth to be that if there is an obligation standing between you and me I can not get away from that obligation by making an agreement with some other party. And so if we have had a moral or legal obligation with German nationals individually we can not nullify that or evade it by entering into a treaty with the German Government.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is true. I am in full harmony with the gentleman's statement. But what is the use to argue with the Republican majority, with its evasive policies? It always faces both ways. Go ahead with your bunk Congress and pass your bunk bill. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has one minute remaining. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] has 46 minutes, and one hour remains in opposition to the bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question before he enters on his speech?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It appeals to many of us that the soundness of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] depends on this question: Gentlemen on the other side, including the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], contend that Germany had no right, in representing its own nationals, to make this treaty of peace as to its own nationals in this country. Now, it appeals to us on this side that, prima facie, Germany represents its nationals, and we can not go back of that representation at all. We are bound by their representations that they act for them, and they have a right to act for them, and we can not inquire into their rights. And so they are bound by the treaty.

Mr. DENISON. That question anticipates a matter that I was going to discuss. And I want to say, gentlemen, that I have looked into this matter very carefully from the international and legal standpoints.

I am not going to discuss the so-called higher and moral propositions, because I do not think they are pertinent to the question here. So long as we do what is legally right, the moral proposition takes care of itself. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] speaks to the House in the way I have often heard lawyers speak in trials at court when they say to the jury it does not make any difference what the law is, but the question is whether you ought to do this or do that. He appeals to Congress and says, "I do not want to pay any attention to this treaty or the legalistic questions," as he calls them, "but I am talking about a higher moral principle." That is what is called an "argumentum ad hominem" instead of appealing to the intelligence of Members of Congress.

In reply to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] I am going to ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including some references to legal authorities and precedents.

Briefly stated, here are a few of the principles which I have developed, and I hope that the Members, if they have time, will follow them in the RECORD as they may appear: The first is that we have seized this property as a war measure, and we had a perfect legal right under the rules of war to seize it; we seized it for the purpose of preventing its being used by our enemies in the war against us. That was the justification for it, and that was the reason for it.

Now, another principle is that all that the German citizens have, as a result of that seizure, is a claim against the Government. The alien property law authorized the Alien Property Custodian to dispose of this property as he saw fit, and he has disposed of a great deal of it and has converted it into money and the money has been turned into the Treasury, and all that these citizens now have that is recognized by international law is a claim for the value of that property.

The same is true with respect to the American property seized in Germany and Belgium by the German Government and the claims of the people whose property or families were destroyed on the Lusitania. They have what is known in international law as a claim against the Government for the value of property taken.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman referred to the wisdom of sequestrating this property so as to prevent its use against us in the war. The gentleman will recall that the principal argument made in favor of the act creating the Alien Property Custodian was that we were going to take the alien enemy property and hold it in trust for the rightful owners and in due time return it to them.

Mr. DENISON. I know you heard of it, but you never knew of any nation holding alien enemy property simply for the benefit of the enemy. We took the property to prevent its being used against us by our enemies, and that is the only reason we had a right to take it.

Here is another legal principle: There are no such things as claims of the citizens of one country against another government that are recognized in law. I mean by that there is no such thing as a collectible claim.

Governments do not deal with the citizens of other governments except by express consent. That is well settled in international law. This Government does not deal with the citizens of Germany as citizens, and the German Government does not deal with the citizens of this country as citizens. All these matters are arranged by the Governments between themselves, and if the citizens of America have claims against the German Government or any other government, they can not collect them. They must depend upon this Government to collect them for them, and the same is true as to the claims of German citizens and the citizens of Austria and other nations against the United States. These claims of individual citizens against other governments are matters that have always been and always will be, so far as we can now tell, matters for discussion and settlement between the governments themselves as governments.

So we have this situation, that the citizens of Germany have claims against our Government which they can not collect except through their Government. The citizens of the United States have claims against Germany and Austria which they can not collect, which are not recognized in international law, except as they may be collected by our own Government. These are matters for disposition between the two Governments themselves.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I am afraid I will not have time. I will yield a little later if I may have the time.

Mr. Chairman, the soundness of any argument by which we reach our conclusions must depend as much upon the truth of the premises with which we start as upon the accuracy of the reasoning we pursue. I have found that our differences of opinion on important questions of public policy result not so much from fallacies in our reasoning as from errors in the facts we assume as a basis for our reasoning.

Gentlemen assume as a fact that our retention of this property of our German and Austrian enemies or the appropriation of it for the payment of just claims of our own nationals against those countries amounts to a confiscation of the property. Of course, if we admit that fact to be true, then it reasonably follows that to retain it or so appropriate it would be at least unconscionable if not illegal.

But therein lies the error and the fallacy of the whole argument. I deny that we are confiscating any of this property. Whether we simply retain it or a part of it as security for the payment of American claims, or appropriate a part of it for the payment of such claims, we would not be confiscating it within the accepted meaning of that term. If it would not amount to confiscation, then what becomes of the arguments we have heard that are based upon that assumption?

Now, what constitutes "confiscation" of private property? The term has but one definition in the textbooks and judicial decisions.

In domestic law confiscation means taking private property for public use without due process of law or without just compensation. Due process of law means in accordance with the recognized procedure and principles of the law of the land, and just compensation means just what the words imply.

In the law of nations "confiscation" means seizing or taking the property of an enemy State or its subjects and appropriating it to the public use.

In Pope's Legal Definitions of Words and Phrases, the term "confiscate" is defined to mean "To appropriate to the use of the State. Especially used of the goods and property of alien enemies found in a State in time of war." And that definition is taken from Kent's Commentaries (Vol. I, p. 52).

Rapalje and Lawrence's Law Dictionary defines it as "appropriation to the use of the State. As where the State seizes property belonging to another State or its subjects and appropriates it."

Corpus Jures says "confiscation" means "in international law, where a State seizes property belonging to another State or its subjects and appropriates it to public use."

Now, I contend, and, if I have the time, can prove, I think, that we are in no sense confiscating any of this property within the meaning of that term in international law.

First, we seized the property lawfully.

Second, we are holding it and can use so much of it as may be necessary to pay American claims, according to the provisions of our treaties of peace with Germany and Austria, and in accordance with a usage well recognized in international law and in the precedents of our own Government.

Third, we are not holding and will not appropriate the property for public use, but rather for the use of private American claimants against Germany and Austria, who have by treaty authorized us to do so.

So whether we merely retain this property as security, or ultimately use a part of it for the purpose indicated, there is not one single element of confiscation involved in our action.

Preliminary to further discussing the subject, I want to pause long enough to refer again to certain incidental questions that are merely incidental, but that may nevertheless be confusing and obscure our understanding of the real questions involved.

I have said we seized or took possession of this property lawfully. It was seized while we were at war as a war measure, and we were justified in doing so for one purpose only, namely, that we might prevent its being used by the enemy against us, and that we might thereby cripple the enemy and the more easily defeat him. We took this property just as we took the enemy's ships and just as we would have taken the money or other property of his nationals if our armies had captured the enemy's possessions or had invaded his home territory. Nations at war are justified under the rules of war in seizing the enemy's resources so as to deprive him of the means of carrying on the war and thereby the sooner end the conflict. The method of taking over the enemy's property is a mere incidental and not an essential factor in the question involved.

In this war it happens that our Government followed a new procedure heretofore practically unknown in the history of warfare. Instead of taking the enemy's property and destroying it or using it, Congress provided for an official whom we called the Alien Property Custodian, to take possession of it and hold it until such time after the conclusion of peace as Congress should dispose of it. And whether we choose to designate the Alien Property Custodian as a mere common-law trustee or simply as an agent of the Government to hold and conserve and manage the property is wholly immaterial.

Some who testified at the hearings referred to the discussions in the Congress when the trading with the enemy act was under consideration to show that this Representative or that Senator stated that we were taking over the enemy's property merely to conserve it and save it from loss or deterioration, and argued from those statements that we were merely holding this property as a trustee or agent for the German nationals, and that we have no right to deal with it from any other point of view. It may be true that some Members of the House and some Senators had that thought in mind and were governed by that purpose.

But others believed and so expressed themselves that we were taking over this property as the property of our enemies and for the purpose of preventing its being used against us by the enemy. But whatever may have been the view of one individual Member of Congress or another, or whatever may have been the purpose of a majority of the Congress at that time, the fact remains that we did take possession of this property of our enemy as a war measure; that we were wholly justified in doing so, and that we now have it in our possession as a result of the exigencies of war, and we have the right to and must dispose of it in accordance with our duty to our own citizens as well as the citizens of Germany and Austria, and in accordance with the recognized principles of international law.

There are certain fundamental facts which we must admit, as I have stated.

One is that the German and Austrian nationals whose property we seized have only what is known in international law as claims against our Government for the value of the property seized. The Alien Property Custodian is not now in possession of all the property that was seized; much of it has been liquidated; part of it has been converted from real estate and personal property into money; other parts of it have been sold and the proceeds turned into the Treasury. All of it might properly have been converted into money. The form in which this property now exists in the hands of the custodian is a mere incident. His duty was to conserve it, and he had the right under the law to convert any part or all of it or dispose of it if he thought it wise to do so. So all the German nationals have to-day for the property that was seized is a claim against our Government for its value. Now, this claim is a mere chose in action. If it is a valid claim, it is a vested property right. That question has been adjudicated many times by the courts of last resort in this country.

In 1828 Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Comegys v. Vasse (1 Pet., p. 193), held that the just claims of American citizens against foreign governments for property taken or destroyed are choses in action and are vested property rights, which may be assigned or transferred. Of course, the government against whom the claims exist may not recognize such assignments if it chooses not to do so, and in our trading with the enemy act Congress made such a provision. The decision of Justice Story in the case just cited has been since that time recognized as the law, so far as this Government is concerned, and has been followed in numerous decisions of the Supreme Court.

On the other hand, during the war Germany took possession of the money and the factories and the real estate and other property of American citizens in Germany and in Belgium and in parts of France, and during the period preceding our entry into the war Germany sank American ships and destroyed American lives on the high seas. And as a result of all these acts American citizens simply have claims against the German Government for the value of the property taken or the damage inflicted, and these claims are mere choses in action, although they are recognized as vested property rights.

So, in dealing with this question we must keep in mind the fundamental fact that we are not dealing with the specific or identical property of the German citizens seized or destroyed by our Government or with the specific or identical property of American citizens seized or destroyed by Germany. We are dealing with certain claims of the German nationals against our Government and with certain claims of our nationals against the German Government for the value of property seized or for property or lives destroyed.

Another fundamental principle that I have already referred to and should be kept in mind is that while the claims of the nationals of one country against a foreign government are recognized as vested property rights, they are not such claims as can be enforced or collected by the nationals themselves without the consent of the foreign government. Citizens of Germany or other countries can not enforce their claims, however just, against the United States without the consent of the Congress. Our courts are not open to them. They can not even be presented unless Congress by legislation gives its consent, nor can our own citizens present or collect their claims against Germany without the consent of the German Government.

Congress has at various times by express legislation consented for citizens of foreign countries to present their claims against the United States through the Court of Claims or through mixed commissions or arbitration tribunals, but this has always been done by treaty agreements between the two Governments. Sovereign nations do not deal with the citizens of other governments in their individual capacity. There is no principle more universally recognized in the law of nations and more frequently stated by law writers than this.

If our citizens have claims against foreign governments or if the citizens of other governments have claims against the United States, they can not themselves take them up for adjustment with the governments. They must do so through their own government, and claims of this kind are always adjusted between the respective governments and not by the governments and the citizens of the other government.

It follows from the principle just stated that in the adjustment of claims of the citizens of one country against the government of another the governments themselves may make such disposition or adjustment of the claims as justice and their mutual interests may require. They may provide by treaty agreement for the arbitration of the claims before an arbitration tribunal or may provide for their adjudication before mixed claims commissions, or the governments may, by treaty, absolutely destroy the claims of their own citizens against the other government or may provide for the mutual cancellation of such claims where there are existing claims of the citizens of each government against the other.

In Volume II of Butler's work on the Treaty Making Power of the United States, page 293, the author says:

> Notwithstanding the fact that these claims are property rights, on numerous instances claims of citizens have been absolutely destroyed, so far as they existed against the foreign government, by the action of the Executive in making a treaty and of the Senate in ratifying it. In such cases no further action of Congress appears to be necessary so far as the complete extinguishment of the claim against the other government is concerned, but congressional action is necessary in order that the American citizens whose property has been confiscated may prove their claims against the United States and be indemnified for the loss they have sustained.

So our Government can properly, by treaty, completely extinguish or destroy the claims of American citizens against foreign governments, and the German Government may likewise do so. For more than a hundred years this practice has been recognized and followed among the nations of the world and it is now well settled in the admitted principles of international law.

I could, if I had the time, refer to many instances in which our Government by treaties with other governments has provided for the mutual adjustment of claims of their respective nationals against the other governments, and I could cite a few instances in which such treaties have provided for the absolute extinguishment or destruction of such claims.

In John Bassett Moore's History of International Arbitrations more than 50 instances are cited, I believe, in which the United States has entered into treaties with other governments providing for the disposition of claims of our citizens against such governments, or the claims of their citizens against the United States. Several of these treaties provided for the adjustment of claims arising out of or connected with wars in which our Government was involved.

I might refer first to the treaty of the United States with France, made on the 31st of July, 1801, and ratified by the Senate on the 21st of December following, in which our Government settled what has subsequently been known as the French spoliation claims.

During the French Revolution the French men-of-war destroyed many ships of commerce belonging to American citizens on the high seas and appropriated their cargoes to their own use. And more especially during the later years when Napoleon rose to power, Great Britain and many other governments of Europe declared war on France and announced that they would starve the French nation into submission. At that time, as in the late war, Great Britain employed her navy to drive the French from the high seas and starve her into submission by a blockade. The French seized American ships wherever they could be found and appropriated their cargoes of foods bound for other countries in Europe, and out of this situation, which continued through a number of years and which came near resulting in a declaration of war against France by the United States, American citizens had just claims against the French Government for the loss of life and property taken or destroyed.

On the other hand, France had claims against our Government growing out of the violation of the treaty of 1778, under which we guaranteed the French possessions in America and growing out of the loans which France had made us during the Revolutionary War. In brief, this treaty provided that the claims of the citizens of the United States should be set off against the claims which the French Government had against the United States for the money it had loaned us and for our failure to fulfill our treaty obligations whereby we guaranteed the integrity of the French possessions in America. The United States by this treaty used the claims of American citizens against France, amounting to many millions of dollars, to settle admittedly just claims of the Government of France against the United States, and thereby relinquished and destroyed them.

The result of this settlement of the claims was that in 1864 and at later dates Congress considered legislation for the payment by this Government of all those claims of American citizens against France which our Government had by treaty canceled and which were known as the French spoliation claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. And the United States has not paid her citizens that lost those ships yet.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to say that the United States made that solemn treaty and agreed to cancel all of the claims of American citizens, and did so—just wiped them right out—in consideration for France agreeing to cancel the debt that we owed her. That is the way we got rid of that debt for the money which France had loaned and the other debt that we owed her.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman want to use that precedent of alleged repudiation on the part of our Government as a precedent to follow here?

Mr. DENISON. Not in the way the gentleman from Alabama states it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The construction which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] put upon it, and which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] acceded to, certainly puts us in that light.

Mr. DENISON. Do not understand me as acceding to anything unless I say so. I am using it as a precedent to show how our own Government settled its claims against France and the claims that France had against our Government.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The question whether we have paid our own citizens or not is an entirely different matter.

Mr. DENISON. That is an entirely different question.

The report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, prepared by Senator Sumner and filed April 4, 1864, reviews the history and the disposition of the French spoliation claims. The Members, I am sure, would enjoy reading this report, for it is historic and contains a very learned discussion of the whole subject, and can be found in part 1 of Senate Document 231 of the Fifty-sixth Congress, second session. Speaking of the treaty between this country and France, Senator Sumner said:

> Thus closed a protracted controversy where each power was persistent to the last. Nothing could be more simple than the mode of adjustment and nothing more equitable if we regard the two nations only. The claims of each were treated as a set off to the claims of the other, and mutual releases were interchanged, so that each, while losing what it claimed, triumphed over its adversary. But the triumph of the United States was at the expense of American citizens. Nothing is without its price, and new duties, originating in the triumph, at once sprang into being.

I might also refer to the treaty of Washington, concluded in 1871 between United States and Great Britain, in which the two countries agreed to settle by the Geneva tribunal all claims of American citizens against Great Britain growing out of damages caused to American commerce by the depredations of the Confederate cruisers Alabama and Florida which had either been built or sheltered in British harbors during the Civil War.

And if time permitted I could refer to a number of other treaties between the United States and foreign governments in which the United States disposed of claims of her own citizens against foreign governments, either by requiring payment of the claims by foreign governments or by releasing or destroying such claims and assuming them, or agreeing that they should be paid by our own Government.

The point I wish to emphasize, and that would be made clear if the Members could but hastily review the many treaties between the United States and other Governments in which the claims of American nationals against foreign governments and of foreign nationals against the American Government were settled, is that it is entirely in harmony with the past history of our Government and with well-recognized principles of international law for the governments to settle by treaty the claims of their citizens against foreign governments; and that it has been a not infrequent custom in such treaties for the governments to mutually release and destroy the claims of their nationals against the other governments.

Let me cite the treaty between the United States and Spain at the close of the Spanish-American War. As a result of that war, citizens of Spain in Cuba and in the Philippines had many claims against the United States for property commandeered or destroyed, and many citizens of the United States had claims against Spain for property destroyed in Cuba, both before and after the declaration of war, including the claims of those who were injured and the dependents of those who lost their lives on the battleship Maine. Article 7 of the treaty of peace between this country and Spain contained the following provision:

The United States and Spain mutually relinquish all claims for indemnity, national and individual, of every kind of either Government or of its citizens or subjects against the other Government that may have arisen since the beginning of the late insurrection in Cuba and prior to the exchange of ratification of the peace treaty, including all claims for indemnity for the cost of the war. The United States will adjudicate and settle the claims of its citizens against Spain relinquished in this article.

Thus the United States by treaty canceled the just claims of American citizens against Spain for lives lost and property damaged and destroyed and agreed to adjust and pay them herself, and Spain did the same with reference to the claims of her citizens against the United States.

Now, when the World War was formally closed by the treaty of Versailles, what provision was made for the payment of private claims growing out of the war?

Part 10, chapter 5, section 4, article 297, page 369 of the treaty of Versailles was as follows:

The nationals of allied and associated powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damage or injury inflicted upon their property, rights, or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested, in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the annex hereto. The claims made in this respect by such nationals shall be investigated, and the total of the compensation shall be determined by the mixed arbitral tribunal provided for in section 6 or by an arbitrator appointed by that tribunal. This compensation shall be borne by Germany, and may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory or under the control of the claimant's State. This property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the annex hereto. The payment of this compensation may be made by the allied or associated State, and the amount will be debited to Germany.

And, on page 373, the treaty provided as follows:

Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property, rights, or interests in allied or associated States.

And on page 379 thereof is found the following provision:

All property, rights, and interests of German nationals within the territory of any allied or associated power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation, or other dealing therewith may be charged by that allied or associated power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that allied or associated power with regard to their property rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that allied or associated power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, if he is willing, or if no such appointment is made by him, by an arbitrator appointed by the mixed arbitral tribunal provided for in section 6. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such allied or associated power with regard to their property, rights, and interests in the territory of other enemy powers, in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied.

Now, while the United States did not sign or ratify the treaty of Versailles, yet we afterwards, by the treaty of Berlin, signed August 25, 1921, and the treaty of Vienna, signed August 24, 1921, in which we made peace with Germany and Austria, received all the benefits with respect to the claims of our citizens against Germany that we would have received under the treaty of Versailles.

The purpose and intention of our Government to secure a just settlement of the claims of American citizens against the German and Austrian Governments has been made clear and precise from the beginning.

In the joint resolution of Congress, approved by the President July 2, 1921, known as the Knox-Porter resolution, we provided as follows:

That in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals any and all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages, together with the right to enforce the same to which it or they have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof; or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States of America by reason of its participation in the war or to which its nationals have thereby become rightfully entitled; or which, under the treaty of Versailles, have been stipulated for its or their benefit; or to which it is entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers; or to which it is entitled by virtue of any act or acts of Congress, or otherwise. * * *

SEC. 5. All property of the Imperial German Government, or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals, which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, and all property of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its successor or successors, and of all Austro-Hungarian nationals which was on December 7, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of, or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever shall be retained by the United States of America and no disposition thereof made, except as shall have been heretofore, or specifically hereafter shall be, provided by law until such time as the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or their successor or successors, shall have respectively made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims against said Governments, respectively, of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America, and who have suffered through the acts of the Imperial German Government, * * * and until the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or their successor or successors, shall have respectively confirmed to the United States of America during the war, whether in respect to the property of the Imperial German Government or German nationals or the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government or Austro-Hungarian nationals, and shall have waived any and all pecuniary claims against the United States of America.

This resolution reserved for the United States and its nationals the rights accorded them under the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of St. Germain. Nowhere in either treaty, however, was any right given to any American citizen to enforce Congress to use enemy property held by the Alien Property Custodian in payment for, or as security for, his claim for damages against the German or the Austrian Government. The very statement of such a proposition is its own answer. The power of Congress after the war to dispose of this property as it should direct remained untrammeled as far as the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of St. Germain were concerned.

And in the treaty of Berlin, signed on August 25, 1921, in which he made formal peace with Germany, article 1 thereof provided as follows:

Germany undertakes to accord to the United States, and the United States shall have and enjoy all the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages specified in the aforesaid joint resolution of the Congress of the United States of July 2, 1921, including all the rights and advantages stipulated for the benefit of the United States in the treaty of Versailles which the United States shall fully enjoy, notwithstanding the fact that such treaty has not been ratified by the United States.

And in the treaty of August 24, 1921, in which the United States made formal peace with Austria, article 1 thereof was as follows:

Austria undertakes to accord to the United States and the United States shall have and enjoy all the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages specified in the aforesaid joint resolution of the Congress of the United States of July 2, 1921, including all the rights and advantages stipulated for the benefit of the United States in the treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, which the United States shall fully enjoy, notwithstanding the fact that such treaty has not been ratified by the United States. The United States, in availing itself of the rights and advantages stipulated in the provisions of that treaty, will do so in a manner consistent with the rights accorded to Austria under such provisions.

So by solemn treaties between the United States and Germany and Austria we are entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of St. Germain with reference to the claims of American citizens against Germany and Austria, and with reference to the property of German and Austrian citizens now held by the United States and the claims of those citizens resulting therefrom.

The German and Austrian Governments have agreed by treaty to pay the just claims of American citizens against them, and for that purpose have agreed that the United States may retain the property now held by us belonging to the German and Austrian nationals until such time as the claims of American citizens against those Governments can be satisfactorily adjusted and paid; and they have agreed by treaty that this property of their nationals may be used to pay the just claims of American citizens against them, and have agreed that they would themselves compensate their nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property rights or interests held by the United States.

No one can deny that the German Government had a perfect right to enter into that kind of a treaty.

No one can deny that such a treaty was in accordance with precedents and well-recognized principles of international law applicable to such cases.

The United States had entered into similar treaties with other governments before that.

The principle involved in our treaties with Germany and Austria follows the precedent of our treaty of peace with Spain following the Spanish-American War. Spain and the United States agreed each to compensate their own nationals for the claims they had against the other. In this case Germany and Austria agreed to compensate their own nationals in such amounts as should be found necessary to meet the just claims of American citizens against them.

It is true that where a government by treaty destroys or relinquishes the claims of its own citizens against a foreign government it thereby exercises the high right of eminent domain. It confiscates the property of its own citizens; and where the United States Government takes that course it should, in turn, compensate its own citizens for the property rights which it has destroyed, because in this country there is a constitutional limitation on the right of the Government to take the property of its citizens without due process of law and without just compensation.

When the United States in the treaty of peace with Spain agreed to cancel or relinquish the claims of our citizens against Spain it had to agree to pay such claims itself because of this constitutional limitation.

And when the United States by the treaty with France in 1801 agreed to mutually cancel and set off the just claims of American citizens against France against the claims of France against the United States that amounted to a confiscation by our Government of the American claims, and under our Constitution the Government was bound to itself compensate American citizens for their claims which had been sacrificed. And that was the view taken by Congress, the result of which was we paid out of our own Treasury all of the French spoliation claims.

Germany and Austria have by these treaties agreed that the property of their citizens now held by this Government may be used to pay the just claims of American citizens against them. The execution of those treaties may result in a confiscation of this property by Germany and Austria, but it is not a confiscation of it by the United States. Following many precedents and in harmony with international practices, we have the right to retain this property as security for the payment of American claims and, if necessary, to appropriate it for that purpose; and in doing so we are not confiscating it.

We have by solemn treaties entered into with the German and Austrian Governments secured from them their solemn agreements that they will themselves compensate their own nationals in such amounts as may be necessary to use their property to pay just American claims. That is not confiscation by the United States. It is in international law the substitution of the guaranty and agreement of their own Governments for the obligation of our Government in favor of their nationals, to the extent to which the appropriation of their property may be needed to satisfy just American claims.

The fact that the German Government may be in a faltering or failing condition financially does not make any difference so far as legal principles are concerned. If a man brings suit against a railroad for damages due to personal injuries received in the service, the trial is conducted under the same procedure and judgment is rendered according to the same principles, regardless of whether the railroad is prosperous or is in a bankrupt condition.

And the treaties between this Government and Germany and Austria, touching these property rights of American citizens and of German and Austrian citizens, is just as solemn, just as binding, and entitled to just as much respect as they would be if Germany and Austria were the victors instead of the vanquished. Germany and Austria have solemnly agreed to pay their own nationals for the loss they may sustain by the use of their property to pay the American claimants. They have the same security for the fulfillment of that obligation as have France, Belgium, and the other Allies for the fulfillment of Germany's other obligations to them.

This bill provides for the payment of a certain amount and a very large number of the claims of German citizens against our Government. We should understand that we are doing this in a manner not heretofore followed by the nations of the world in international dealings. We are doing this voluntarily and, as a matter of grace, without any request or any treaty requirement with the Governments of Germany and Austria. We are holding the balance until the claims of American citizens against Germany and Austria can be adjusted and determined and satisfactory arrangements made for their payment. If satisfactory arrangement is not eventually made by those Governments for the payment of the American claims, then we will have the right without confiscation, but in accordance with precedents and principles of international law, as I have shown, to use such amount as may be necessary to pay American claims. Personally, I hope that may never be necessary, as a matter of course.

But right there, be it understood now, that if we should not do so, if the United States should eventually release this property and return it or its equivalent to the German and Austrian nationals and thereby deprive our Government and our citizens of the security which Germany has pledged for the payment of their claims, we will thereby come very nearly depriving our own citizens of their property rights without just compensation, and claims for every dollar of the American claims against Germany and Austria will sooner or later be filed against our own Government, and more than likely they will have to be paid from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. HAWES. Shortly after the United States entered into the war with Germany and Austria it was proposed by the executive department of the Government that the property of German nationals should be placed in the custody of an official called a custodian. The object of the creation of that office was twofold—one was to prevent the use of that property against the United States and the other was to preserve the property for its owners.

Mr. Lansing, Mr. Redfield, and every witness that appeared before the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate stated that such was the intention. The property was to be returned to its original owners. In the debate in this House Mr. COOPER, Mr. HILL, Governor MONTAGUE, Mr. STAFFORD, and without a single exception, all stated that it would be the policy of the Government to temporarily conserve this property, and that it would be returned to its original owners. In making these statements they were carrying out the American policy enunciated by Thomas Jefferson, carried down through all the Secretaries of State to and including Mr. Knox and Mr. Lansing.

Now, what is the situation to-day? It is not what the German Government has done nor what the treaty contains. All the officials that came before our committee stated that this property was taken over by the American Congress, and the manner of its return should be decided solely by the American Congress.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would it disturb the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. HAWES. No, sir.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Can the gentleman state in what connection Secretary Knox may have enunciated that view?

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Knox not only made a statement but he joined with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] in presenting the resolution of peace, and on the 11th day of June, 1921, Mr. Knox wrote a letter, and I hope every Member will absorb every word of it:

Prof. EDWIN M. BORCHARD,
Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

MY DEAR MR. BORCHARD: I am in entire sympathy with your views relative to the seizure of German property during the war. I have expressed on the floor of the Senate the opinion that in order to follow our traditions and be decent this property should be returned; that our only proper function was to conserve it during the period of hostilities, and in the peace resolution I introduced there is a clear indication that our retention of such property shall continue only until the adjustments of the terms upon which we are to live with Germany in peace are satisfactorily determined.

Very sincerely yours, P. C. KNOX.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is in the report of the minority of the committee and relates to the discussion which Senator Knox entered into on the floor of the Senate. My question in regard to the proposition is whether Mr. Knox as Secretary of State was ever called upon to express his views in this matter.

Mr. COCKRAN. No such question ever came up while he was Secretary of State.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman said that the policy had been followed by every Secretary of State, including Mr. Knox and Mr. Lansing. I want to know when Secretary Knox enunciated the policy. I know he so stated on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRAN. He was still the same man.

Mr. HAWES. He was the same Mr. Knox that drew the treaty of peace.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Most any sane person would interpret that letter to mean that if he had been asked while he was Secretary of State he would have been of the same opinion.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As to the matter of sanity——

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, I did not mean to apply that to the gentleman from Illinois; I never mean to be offensive.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There might be some question as to the value of a man's opinion in a legislative debate where he discusses the matter and his opinion when he was called upon as an official.

When it is said that this policy has been followed by every Secretary of State, if the gentleman had some act which occurred during the incumbency of office of the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, that would be more in point, would it not, than the letter which he wrote to a private citizen?

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can place his own construction upon the letter of Mr. Knox. My opinion is that it is very clear. He states in very understandable English what he thinks, and it is related to exactly this subject which, of course, had not arisen while he was Secretary of State. I assert again that there is not a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that will uphold the theory of the confiscation of private property to pay a public debt; that there is not a writer on international law who has ever written on the subject who has not positively denied the right of a government to confiscate private property for a public debt.

The first thing to be made clear is that we are not dealing with the property of Germany. This is the property of private citizens who were invited to make their investments in the United States. The investments were made many years ago, in most cases upon the solicitation of friends and relatives living in this country. The established policy of our Nation was known to the people of the world. It was known to the people of Germany. We find in the first place that Austria-Hungary never took property from any American during the war, and in the second place we find that all the private property taken over by Germany during the war has been returned to American nationals excepting certain sums of money now in dispute in balancing bank accounts between the banks of Germany and the United States. If you will read the record, you will find that the Alien Property Custodian says they are fast approaching an adjustment of that subject, agreeing on 18 cents for the mark.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I will put the question to the gentleman from Missouri that I propounded to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], which he declined to answer. What effect, if any, does the gentleman think the provisions of section 5 of the existing treaty between the United States and Germany have on the moral side of this question?

Mr. HAWES. My opinion is that under the provisions of that treaty, if the United States desires to take possession of the property of these enemy nationals, it has the right to do so. The treaty gives our Government that right. There is no doubt about it; but while it gives us the right, we are not directed to do it, and it is a matter of option for Congress alone to decide.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. In just a moment. We can under that treaty seize the property, but there is nothing in the treaty that makes it compulsory upon us to seize it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does it give us the moral right or the legal right?

Mr. HAWES. The legal right. The moral right is simply this: The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], we will say, visits my place of business, and he leaves some of his property there in my custody. He goes away, and a claim is presented against me, and I confiscate his property to pay my debt. That is the moral proposition as I see it.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman be gracious enough to yield further?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think that the framers of the treaty between Germany and the United States, which terminated the war between that country and the United States, when they inserted the provisions of section 5, had this very identical situation in contemplation?

Mr. HAWES. No.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman does not think they had?

Mr. HAWES. I am confident they did not. They and Germany signed up quickly, and left that question for our Congress to decide. I do not think it was contemplated, certainly not by Mr. Knox, whose letter I have read, that we would ever confiscate this property or hold it as security, because security means ultimate confiscation, with which statement every lawyer will agree.

Mr. CRISP. Does not my friend think that makes the difference? A large part of this property was invested here under a treaty made in peace times and that treaty provided that if we ever went to war with Germany, the nationals of Germany would have the right to leave this country and have their property here protected, whereas section 5 of the treaty of Berlin, which our friends insist gives the legal right to confiscate this property if we see fit to do it—and I agree with them that we have the legal right—was made after a war when Germany was defeated. In other words, does the gentleman not think duress had something to do with the terms of the treaty, and is not a treaty made in time of peace, when the contracting parties are equal, of higher moral dignity than a treaty made under duress?

Mr. SNYDER. But the gentleman would have to recognize that there was not peace until the treaty was signed.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, as we proceeded with the war with Germany Mr. Wilson repeatedly issued messages stating that we were not at war with the German people; that we were warring with the military autocracy of Germany. Our military intelligence branch of the Army dropped thousands of tons of literature over the battle fields into Germany promising the German people proper treatment. It was a question which would break first, the military or the civil morale of Germany, and it is a disputed question to-day which did break first; but it was our continued promise, and in July, 1918, the commander of the American forces in France repeated the old Prussian treaty, written by Benjamin Franklin and presented by Adams and Jefferson, as to the rights of civilians, and it was ordered read on the battle fields of France by General Pershing. There is a clear, undisputed record in law, in history, in the promises on this floor, and in every conceivable way, that the American Government was acting as custodian.

So far as I am concerned, the amount of money to be returned is of secondary importance, whether it be $10,000 or 50 per cent or all of it. I shall ask, even if you vote for the return of the $10,000, to place somewhere in this bill the statement that there will be no ultimate confiscation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Answering both the gentlemen a moment ago regarding section 5 of the Berlin treaty, does not the gentleman think it was not a matter of duress so much, after a great war, as it was a matter of confidence in America by the German Government, just as it was confidence in America when she said:

> You, America, name the umpire in this Mixed Claims Commission; we do not care to name him, we have confidence in you to do the right thing.

Does not the gentleman think it was a matter of confidence that went into that section 5 and not duress or fear we might not be fair with them?

Mr. HAWES. I agree with the gentleman, and that is an interesting incident. When the question of the amount of these claims was to be ascertained, the United States and Germany agreed upon what was called a Mixed Claims Commission. One member of the Mixed Commission was selected by the United States and the other member was selected by Germany, and Germany waived her right to select a citizen of a neutral country and permitted the appointment of Judge Day. So on this Mixed Claims Commission there are two Americans and one German, and nobody can make me believe that when the Mixed Claims Commission makes its report of awards but that Germany will pay them. She dare not resist. It is the one thing she can not do.

Now, let us examine some of these claims for a moment. The total loss of life on the Lusitania was 128. Three or four more lives were lost on the Essex and Sussex. If we allow a total of $100,000 for each one of these claims, and then put in the one big claim we have for the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. of a million and a half, the total American claims would only approximate $14,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAWES. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to say to the gentleman in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations the other day we had the American agent of the commission before us, and he testified they had 10,000 of such claims before the commission and the aggregate amount of the claims on their face amounted to over a billion dollars.

Mr. HAWES. I am glad the gentleman brought out that point. I have stated the two characters of claims—loss of life, loss of property in Belgium—and the total, approximate, is about $15,000,000. Now, what are the other claims? The other claims are by marine insurance companies. I know that one of the necessary agents of civilization is insurance, and we know that the insurance company will gamble on a man's life; it gambles on the act of God, on the storm, on the tornado, on the wreck at sea; it gambles on sickness, gambles on everything; and it charges a certain interest upon the risk it assumes, and during the war it charged an enormous risk, and I assert that from 75 to 80 per cent of the claims before the Mixed Claims Commission are for insurance companies who have collected their premiums and made money out of the war.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. I will.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman kindly tell the House the extent of inquiry he has made to substantiate the statement as to the nature of the investigation?

Mr. HAWES. Yes, sir; and I will say that when the matter came before our committee one or two witnesses stated the character of claims to be even higher than I have put them, at 90 per cent, and that the chairman of our committee did not summon a single representative of insurance companies to testify, and I asked at the conclusion of the hearings, and before we passed on the bill, that insurance men should be brought in to substantiate or deny the statement I have just made, and no insurance man appeared before our committee. I wanted them to appear because I desired to show that the man who shipped, for instance, a bale of cotton from Texas added to the bale of cotton the cost of insurance. He did not lose money; and if the cargo got through, it was not the man who got the bale of cotton but the man who wore the shirt or the woman who wore the gown who paid for this insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAWES. I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield the gentleman an additional five minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman kindly permit me to refresh his memory as to the nature of my question, as a good deal has been said since I asked the question, but the gentleman has not answered the question?

Mr. HAWES. I have answered the best I may. I have stated that one or two witnesses made that statement, and it is in the record and is not to be contradicted.

Mr. WINSLOW. I will not contradict that; but I understood the gentleman to say gentlemen were prepared to assert that the claims were so-and-so, and I asked if he would kindly tell what investigation the gentleman made to verify the statement.

Mr. HAWES. I made an attempt to carry on the investigation, as the Chairman well knows, and I was not assisted by the Chairman to make one.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am not getting into a wrangle over it——

Mr. HAWES. It is a fact.

Mr. WINSLOW. Then the gentleman does not know what investigation he has made to which he referred?

Mr. HAWES. Everything I have stated here is from witnesses that came before our committee, and one of those witnesses made the statement that 90 per cent of all these claims were insurance company claims, and in the matter of Austria I asked the Alien Property Custodian what was the character of those claims and he said insurance company claims against Austria. That is in the record.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think the gentleman wants to be perfectly fair and will bear in mind the statement——

Mr. HAWES. Well——

Mr. WINSLOW. I merely wanted to make sure that we got the facts.

Mr. HAWES. I am speaking from the record, I am bound by the record, and I talk from the record.

Mr. SNYDER. I desire to ask the gentleman a couple of questions, if I may. I have been very much interested in what the gentleman has had to say; he seems to understand the question fully. As I understand this proposition now there are certain properties in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian against which there are certain alien German claims against the custodian and this Government.

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. This bill proposes to pay back to certain of them $10,000.

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Is that going to affect the validity of any claimant receiving $10,000 on account or receiving $10,000 in full?

Mr. HAWES. This is the first time I have heard of an American Congress drawing a distinction between $5,000 and $50,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Is any claimant injured in any way by reason of receiving $10,000 either in full or on account?

Mr. HAWES. I understand the gentleman now.

Mr. SNYDER. I think that is all there is to it. I think there is nothing more involved in it right now than that, unless somebody can show it.

Mr. RAYBURN. This bill does not close it.

Mr. HAWES. Now, I want to use some of my five minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. I can not see that there is anything more in it than that.

Mr. HAWES. I think the gentleman is disposed to be perfectly fair.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; I like to be fair.

Mr. HAWES. We now have in our possession $350,000,000 of alien money, and ships to the amount of $200,000,000 more, making the sum of $550,000,000, approximately, and we are returning under this bill only $44,000,000, and we are holding all the balance. The question that I want to see determined is, whether we turn back 10 per cent or 50 per cent, a clean-cut declaration on the part of Congress that it is not going to confiscate the rest of it.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman hopes to add that to the measure?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Now, I have tried to answer questions. I would like for you to look at this map [indicating]. It is a tragedy. This region marked in red was originally Austria-Hungary. The blue spot is Austria-Hungary to-day. She was a nation of 52,000,000 people. She is now a nation of 6,500,000 people. Out of her territory have been carved six different nations [indicating], and when the question of the return of this property was taken up with the Alien Property Custodian I asked him the question whether he favored the return of that property, and he answered that he did.

Mr. MADDEN. We have no agreement with Austria on this question, have we?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; identical with the German treaty.

Mr. HAWES. In withholding this property there is no criticism of the Alien Property Custodian; but all of the people who lived in this portion of Serbia, Rumania, Poland, and Czechoslovakia have had their money returned to them by the Alien Property Custodian.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. HAWES. But we are holding that little strip of blue, containing 6,500,000 people, responsible for the act of 52,000,000, and it can not be justified on any ground whatever. [Applause.]

The Alien Property Custodian, if you will read his statement, will tell you that there are thousands of claims for loss of life out West that he wants to give back, and there is nothing left of Austria but 2,000,000 people in its capital of Vienna and a region of mountains. The agricultural country is gone. And yet the Great United States, violating all its great principles of 100 years, is holding 6,500,000 people responsible for the conduct of 52,000,000 people.

Gentlemen, I realize that I have not been permitted to discuss this matter with any degree of logic, but it all ultimately gets down to the question of whether the Congress at this time will violate all American theory regarding confiscation of private property; that is, provided that we, as lawyers and business men, agree that the ultimate end of security means confiscation. [Applause.]

We are not dealing with the property of the German Republic, but with that of private citizens who accepted our invitation to make their investments here.

There is absolutely nothing in the Knox-Porter resolution which attempts to prescribe the course of Congress. Congress is an independent body now attempting to return the property which it took over as custodian, and to return it to whom? Is it intended that it is to be taken away from the private citizens who invested it here at our invitation and given to the German Government to pay its debts? Have we forgotten our provisions in the Constitution relating to due process of law and opposing the passage of ex post facto laws?

Our duty is one existing between the American Government and the citizens of foreign nations who made their investments here. It is not a relation existing between the American Government and the German Nation but between our Government and the private citizens whom we invited to make investments.

One reading the letter of the Secretary of State will be impressed by two things:

1. The demand that the private property of citizens should be held as security for a public debt.

2. That he places the responsibility solely upon Congress.

No other branch of the Government has taken this position. The opposition comes exclusively from one source—the Secretary of State's office.

Read the testimony of the Alien Property Custodian; the testimony of Mr. Galloway, representing the Attorney General's office, and you will find that with the single and sole exception of Mr. Carr, speaking for Mr. Hughes, this is the one opposition; and if the English language remains understandable, we find that Mr. Knox, who helped draw the treaty, who helped promulgate it, and whose name it bears, is in direct opposition to the views entertained by the present Secretary of State.

There is not a single authority on international law in the United States who agrees with the conclusion of the Secretary of State. There is not an opinion of our Supreme Court—and a number of them are written by John Marshall—which does not disagree with the doctrine of confiscation, because security carried to its logical conclusion means confiscation.

Even in the statement of Mr. Carr, illustrated by the following questions and answers, given very reluctantly, we find that for the first time in American history all of our traditions of the past are to be violated.

I insert the following questions and answers:

Question by Mr. HAWES. Well, I will repeat my question, Mr. Carr, and you can refuse to answer if you want to. I think it is perfectly clear. You are here representing an important branch of the Government, and what you say will have great weight in my determination of this subject. If we hold this property, to be paid either for an enemy's debts or damages, or hold it as security, do we not, for the first time in our history, change an established American policy of international law?

Mr. CARR. Perhaps we may; but if we do, it has been done because Congress has directed that it should be done.

Mr. HAWES. No; Congress has not decided that question, and under the peace resolution, while we have the power to retain it, there is nothing in the treaty that directs us to assume that policy; and I again ask you, if we do take the action intimated by you and hold the property of these nationals, do we not violate all American precedents on that subject?

Mr. CARR. But Congress has directed that the property shall be held temporarily, and until Congress says to the contrary the property has to be held.

Mr. HAWES. Will you decline to answer that question?

Mr. CARR. I think I have in effect answered the question.

Mr. HAWES. Well, I will state it again: Suppose Congress does act and does hold this property as security, or does hold it subject to litigation, then does not Congress for the first time in the history of the American Congress violate an established principle?

Mr. CARR. I do not know whether for the first time exactly in the history of our country or not. Perhaps it is, but——

Mr. HAWES (interposing). Are you not quite sure that it is?

Mr. CARR. It is, so far as I now recall.

Mr. RAYBURN. What is your interpretation, then, of the word "guaranty"—holding this property as a guaranty?

Mr. CARR. I did not use the word "guaranty." I merely used the word "security." The Secretary used the word "security."

Mr. RAYBURN. What is your interpretation of the meaning of "holding this property as security"?

Mr. CARR. As a pledge.

Mr. RAYBURN. What do you mean by the word "pledge"?

Mr. CARR. To be held until the other Governments have satisfied these claims in accordance with the purpose of the Knox resolution.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, "guaranty" and "pledge" and "security" in a debt are about the same thing, aren't they?

Mr. CARR. They are related to each other very closely.

Private property is respected even in the theater of war itself, where actual combat takes place. There are certain rules of civilized warfare found in our traditions and conventions, and especially in The Hague agreements, providing for the protection of private property. If private property has this protection in the actual scene of war, where necessity seems to be the first rule, how much more important and how much more compelling should it be when it relates to private property of nationals thousands of miles away from the theater of war?

Immovable private property can not under any circumstances be appropriated by an invading belligerent. Should he confiscate and sell private property and buildings, the buyer would acquire no right whatever to the property. All private railroad stock, ships, carts, horses, and so forth, seized for military purposes by an invading belligerent, must be returned at the conclusion of peace or compensation must be paid for them.

Alexander Hamilton made this statement:

Will justice sanction, upon the breaking out of a war, the confiscation of a property which during peace serves to augment the resources and nourish the prosperity of the State? The property of a foreigner placed in another country by permission of its laws must justly be regarded as a deposit of which the society is the trustee. How can it be reconciled with the idea of a trust to take the property from its owner when he has personally given no cause for its deprivation?

President Taft, in his annual message of 1909, in considering whether American enterprise should be encouraged in a particular war, said:

The Government should give full weight to the fact whether or not the government of the country in question is in its administration and in its diplomacy faithful to the principles of moderation, comity, equity, and justice, upon which alone depend international credit in diplomacy, as well as in finance.

In the hearings before our committee there will not be found a single witness, excepting the representative of the State Department, who is demanding the holding of this property as a matter of security.

The position of the Alien Property Custodian is described in these questions and answers:

Mr. HAWES. And I understand, Mr. Miller, that you do not believe the United States Government should take the position that property seized by the Alien Property Custodian from private individuals should be used by the American Government in the enforcement of its claims against Germany?

Mr. MILLER. I have stated here to-day a number of times that personally I would be opposed to the confiscation of private property to pay claims against the enemy government.

Mr. Herman J. Galloway, representative of the Attorney General's office:

Mr. HAWES. Upon the successful prosecution of the suit to whom will the property be returned?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Our authority is that the property should be put back where Congress intended it should be, namely, in the custody of the Alien Property Custodian, to let Congress dispose of it as they see fit. That was the intention of the original law, and that is the way we look at it.

Mr. HAWES. So that the object of the suit, then, is to take from this Chemical Foundation these patents and restore them to the possession of the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. GALLOWAY. That is right.

Mr. HAWES. For him to decide, subject to enactment by Congress.

Mr. GALLOWAY. Well, I don't think he has any decision as to what should be done with them. I think Congress is the sole judge of that. The law was intended according to my theory of the original law, and that must determine what shall be done.

Mr. HAWES. And it is your opinion that all of these patents ultimately are to be restored to the original German nationals who own them, is it not?

Mr. GALLOWAY. I should not like to express my official opinion on that, but my personal opinion is that it is contrary to enlightened policy of international law to confiscate private property, of course.

The following questions and answers made by the Alien Property Custodian throw the calcium light upon the question of property now held by him belonging to the Austrian-Hungarian Republic:

Mr. HAWES. So the status of the Austria-Hungary portion of this bill is this: In the first place, they did not seize the property of Americans during the war, and, in the second place, what was Austria-Hungary is now six different republics or monarchies; and we are trying to hold the Austrian Government responsible, in an indirect way, for the conduct of five other governments over which they have no control.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir. That is the situation, and I have recommended to the chairman, in response to his letters to me, as chairman, action on the Austrian-Hungarian property as I have outlined.

Mr. HAWES. And you would recommend an amendment in this bill which would release all property of the former Empire of Austria-Hungary that is held?

Mr. MILLER. I do; and a number of those cases are pathetic cases. We hold hundreds of death benefits which we have collected on account of their nationals who were killed out in the steel mills and in the mines of the West, and we would like to give that back to them.

Mr. HAWES. So we are violating the traditions of international law, the opinion of Marshall and the dictates of humanity and all spirit of equity in holding these claims?

Mr. MILLER. May I put in there so anyone reading this testimony will understand my position? I am willing to recommend this, but, on the other hand, if the State Department comes to the hearings and through their representatives say that there are claims against Austria, I do not want to be criticized for suggesting this, but I have done it personally.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HAWES. As to the character of those claims against the Austrian Government, are not nearly all of these made by insurance companies?

Mr. MILLER. I think they are, sir; but I am not certain.

Former Austria-Hungary comprised an area of 261,107 square miles and had a population of about 52,000,000 people.

The present Republic of Austria has an area of only 32,400 square miles and a population of about 6,500,000 people.

These questions and answer prove conclusively the following things:

1. That Austria-Hungary did not seize any American property during the war.

2. That Austria-Hungary has been reduced from a population of 52,000,000 to 6,500,000, and that all property formerly held by the Alien Property Custodian of those people composing the 45,500,000 taken from the whole empire of Austria-Hungary has been returned.

3. That if this property is held, it is holding 6,500,000 people responsible for the acts committed by 52,000,000 people.

4. That the original sum seized from the Empire of Austria-Hungary was approximately $30,000,000; that $20,000,000 of this has been returned to the citizens of the new States carved out of the old empire; and that $10,000,000 is still retained by the custodian.

5. That there are practically no American claims against Austria-Hungary excepting those of insurance companies, and these are in dispute.

If American precedent, if the opinion of our statesmen, if our national policy and all appeal against the brutal, savage, and medieval doctrine of confiscation apply to Germany, how much stronger are the equities and justice in the claim for the restoration of the Austria-Hungarian property?

If Congress announces the new doctrine of holding private property for security for public debt, what is to prevent any other nation from adopting the same policy, and even in time of peace will some one not arise and urge that we take over the private property of French citizens in this country for the purpose of liquidating French obligations, that we shall take over the private property of Italians in this country to liquidate the Italian obligations, take over the private property of the English in this country to liquidate the English obligations?

Once we start a new precedent we do not know where it will stop.

We must remember that this property was not seized on the battle field but as the private investment of the peaceful citizens in a country which had invited them to invest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield the five minutes that remain to me to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, how many minutes will that give me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman practically has 51 minutes, including the five minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. WINSLOW. I will yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the act "to authorize the improvement of Red Lake and Red Lake River, in the State of Minnesota, for navigation, drainage, and flood-control purposes," authorized the Red Lake conservancy district of the State of Minnesota to construct the improvements authorized to be deepen, widen, and straighten the Red Lake River and tributaries thereof, and specified that the work should be of a nature—indicated and outlined in the report of the Chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War on March 28, 1919. (House Document 61, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.)

The act further provided that unless the drainage and conservancy district, to which authority to do the work was granted, should within—two years from and after the date of the approval of this act submit to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, satisfactory detailed plans and agreements covering the works authorized to be constructed hereby, then, and in that event, all rights hereunder shall cease and terminate.

It is greatly to be regretted that the drainage conservancy district has failed to comply with the provisions of this act. This is indicated by the decision of the district court of the State of Minnesota, which is printed herewith, and also by the letter of the Secretary of the Interior. This project concerns chiefly the Red Lake Indian Reservation, and consequently legislation in regard thereto, in order to receive favorable consideration of Congress, should have his approval. It is indicated by the Secretary that he does not approve of an extension of time until the plans have been altered to comply with the purposes of the act of Congress, but that at any time in the future when there is a prospect that the work can be done as originally planned the extension can be granted.

It is now more than 15 years since I first secured legislation in Congress looking toward the initiation and completion of this project, which work culminated in the act of February 21, 1921, above quoted. It is now up to the State authorities and the drainage conservancy district to show that they are prepared in good faith to carry out in spirit and intent the act of Congress above cited, and when they are the extension of time required can no doubt be obtained.

COURT DENIES PETITION TO RED LAKE PROJECT—JUDGES GRINDELAND AND STANTON ISSUE ORDER DENYING PETITION IN SAID MATTER AND STATE REASONS THEREFOR.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
County of Pennington:

In district court, fourteenth judicial district.

In re petition of C. O. Elg et al. for the improvement of the channel of the Red Lake River, in the State of Minnesota, by deepening, straightening, and widening the same, regulating the flow thereof, and for the improvement of the Red Lake in said State by the construction of a dam at the outlet thereof into Red Lake River and the construction of such improvements as may be necessary to secure the control of the waters of said Red Lake River and Red Lake and the tributaries.

ORDER DENYING SAID PETITION.

Hearing having been duly had at the City of Thief River Falls, in said county, before the undersigned, Andrew Grindeland, one of the judges of the fourteenth judicial district, and C. W. Stanton, one of the judges of the fifteenth judicial district, both sitting, pursuant to notice duly given as required by law, upon the petition of the board of directors of the Red Lake drainage and conservancy district, filed in the above-entitled proceeding, at which said hearing Messrs. C. E. Boughton, Julius J. Olson, and E. E. McDonald appeared as attorneys for the said petitioner, the Red Lake Drainage and Conservancy Board; Mr. Daniel B. Henderson appeared as attorney for the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians; and Messrs. William J. Brown, Theodore Quale, and O. A. Naplin appeared as attorneys for a large number of objectors. And careful consideration having been given the reports of the engineers and viewers filed herein, the evidence submitted, the arguments of counsel and all of the files and the whole record herein, the court finds as follows:

FACTS.

1. That the actual benefits resulting from the proposed improvements will not be greater than the cost of the construction thereof and damages.

2. That the actual benefits, as shown by the report of the viewers, would impose a burdensome and unwarranted assessment upon many of the tracts of land involved.

From the facts as hereinbefore recited, and for the reasons stated in the memorandum appended hereto, which it hereby made a part hereof, the court finds as conclusions of law—

That the petition herein should be denied and this proceeding be dismissed.

It is so ordered.

Stay of 30 days ordered.

Dated February 10, 1923.

By the court.

MEMORANDUM.

It is with no little regret that we make the foregoing order of dismissal of this proceeding. The public improvement sought is vastly important, and much effort and a considerable expenditure of money has been devoted to preliminary work and in providing the means, through both Federal and State legislation, to make it possible to carry out the project.

It is our opinion, though, that the conclusion is inevitable from the record now before us that the establishment of the project can not justly be made in the manner now contemplated. It throws the burden of the entire cost upon the lands included in the viewers' report, while the conceded facts are that a considerable part of the entire assessment is for benefits which are not special to the lands assessed, but general to the large area tributary to Red Lake and Red Lake River, and that water-power interests and certain municipalities are to be specially benefited; and, further, that certain lands in the Clearwater River watershed, now subject to overflow from the Red Lake River and not included in the report, will be specially benefited.

In this connection it is pertinent and interesting to refer to House Document No. 61, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, which forms a part of the petition for this project. This document includes the report of the United States Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, approved by the War Department, from which it appears that the estimated cost of this project was $779,300, and the recommendation is made that the apportionment of cost among the "interests concerned" be as follows:

	Improvement.	Maintenance and operation.
Water powers	$240,000	$3,700
Indian lands	236,800	3,650
Lands outside Indian reservation	248,500	3,850
Municipal water supply	39,000	600
Federal Government for navigation	15,000	200
Total	779,300	12,000

And the report of George W. Freeman, United States district engineer, which also forms a part of this document, states:

"An equitable apportionment would be based upon the proportionate benefits to be received by the various interests. In paragraph 7 it has been shown that if the four developed water powers could utilize the whole of the increased low-water flow they would benefit by about $12,000 per month during months of natural low water. It would appear from inspection of the discharge record that such a saving would result in at least an average of three months per year, making a saving of $36,000 per year. This would be equivalent to a return of 15 per cent annually on an investment of $240,000, a return sufficient to pay off the bonds, interest on bonds, dividends, and an annual proportionate allotment toward maintenance and operation of the work of improvement. * * *

"Municipal water supply would receive benefits at Crookston and Grand Forks. As a tentative measure of benefit, take the 26,000 inhabitants as forming 6,500 families and assess their benefit at 10 cents per family per month for three ordinary low-water months per year, giving a charge of $1,950 per year, which for the 20 years the land-assessment bonds would run would produce $39,000 for the project."

At the hearing at which this petitioner, the Red Lake Drainage and Conservancy District was created, which was attended by several hundred of the settlers whose lands are now sought to be assessed for the whole cost of this project, it was stated and distinctly understood that the apportionment of the cost would be approximately as set forth in House Document No. 61. Now, however, the plan is to make no assessments against water powers, either developed or undeveloped, but instead to rely upon exacting rentals from the water-power interests for the use of water in the future. The trouble with this plan is that, under the law (sec. 15, chap. 13, special session laws of 1919) such rentals can not be applied on the assessments against the lands or in payment of the bonds. In other words, under the viewers' report the water-power interests are not assessed, but the assessment thereof is to be left to the judgment of the board of directors in the future. The court would have no objection to allowing the board to exercise this judgment, knowing that, with its present members, such power would be properly exercised. But conceding that after the improvement is made the water-power interests could and would be assessed, under the law as it now stands the money would go into the general treasury of the district. There is nothing in the law by which the person who paid the original amount could be reimbursed. True, remedial legislation could be enacted to that effect, but the court must deal with the situation as it now exists and not with what may happen in the future. If such proper remedial legislation is enacted, there is nothing to prevent the board from again bringing this matter before the court.

It is significant, too, that the fixing of the water levels of Red Lake is made with apparent disregard of the lands bordering the lake and its tributaries and wholly in the interests of water-power development. True, these lands are not reported as lands benefited, from which omission it can pretty safely be assumed that they are lands to be damaged, but no provision is suggested for the protection of the vested rights of these landowners.

It is a conspicuous fact that nearly all of the resident landowners whose lands are included in the viewers' report, except those residents in the town of Hickory and vicinity, are opposing the establishment of this project and many of them took the witness stand and made vigorous protest. Many of them are now burdened with ditch assessments and other indebtedness and are in bad financial condition. They ought, in justice, to have the controlling voice in saying whether the actual benefits to their lands to result from this project are such as to justify the imposition of its cost upon them. It is idle talk to say that only the interest will be exacted for the first five years. The fact remains that the total assessment will be a lien on the land until both the principal and accrued interest are paid.

This project, if ever constructed, must be fairly and equitably financed, requiring every interest concerned and benefited to come forth with its proportionate share. To require one of these interests to provide the cash for the enterprise and then await the volition of the others or the uncertainty of future legislative enactment for reimbursement would be as absurd and ridiculous as it is illegal and unjust.

To summarize briefly, it must be conceded:

1. That a large part of the assessment is for benefits which are not special to the lands assessed, but general to the community See in re Judicial Ditch No. 2, Itasca County (139 Minn. 332).

2. That the majority of the resident-owners of the land assessed are opposed to the project.

3. That the assessments of benefits and damages are not fair and equitable.

4. That to require the farmers and other landowners to bear the total cost and leave water-power interests and others exempt from assessment is to take the property of one for the benefit of another.

5. That in the present period of agricultural depression and high taxation it would be not only unjust but against public policy and interest to add to the financial burdens of the landowners unless the reasons for doing so are strong and convincing, besides clearly equitable and legal.

6. That the law under which this proceeding is authorized (ch 13, Special Session Laws, 1919) should be amended so as to provide: (1) For the application of the revenue from the use of water to the payment of bonds issued for the improvement made and refundment to the persons who have paid assessments; (2) for the limitation of the authority to levy a sum greater than 10 per cent in excess of the engineer's estimate of the cost of any project; and (3) for the issuance of bonds to run 30 years or more, all substantially as recommended by resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Red Lake drainage and conservancy district on December 29, 1922.

For these reasons, and others disclosed by the record, we feel impelled to deny the petition.

Dated February 10, 1923.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 10, 1923.

Hon. H. STEENERSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: Further reference is made to your communication of January 16, 1923, inclosing telegram addressed to you by Mr. C. G. Selvig, president of the Red Lake Drainage and Conservancy Board, of Crookston, Minn., relative to having section 5 of an act approved February 21, 1921, entitled "An act to authorize the improvement of Red Lake and Red Lake River, in the State of Minnesota, for navigation, drainage, and flood-control purposes," amended to authorize the drainage and conservancy district to submit to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, satisfactory detailed plans and agreements covering the works authorized to be constructed within a period of three years from the date of approval of said act instead of two years as now provided by law.

In view of information that I have and surrounding circumstances concerning conditions, I do not deem it advisable at this time to recommend the enactment of legislation as requested. It would seem the better plan would be to await final action by the State court and by the State legislature to amend the State laws as referred to in Mr. Selvig's telegram; and then should it be deemed advisable to proceed with the drainage scheme, the necessary additional legislation could, no doubt, be obtained.

Sincerely,

ALBERT B. FALL, Secretary.

THIEF RIVER FALLS, MINN., January 20, 1923.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have to-day received your favor of the 16th instant regarding Red Lake drainage project and inclosing copy of telegram from Mr. Selvig, of Crookston.

As you are perhaps aware, this conservation district was originally organized for the purpose of improving Red Lake River in accordance with Document 61 of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which document provided for payment of practically one-third of the cost by the water powers, one-third by the farm lands, and one-third by the Indian lands on the reservation. The conservation board has apparently made a muss of the whole proposition and brought before the court for hearing a plan where the whole cost is assessed as benefits against the farm lands and the Indian lands, and whereby it will become necessary that bonds be issued on these assessments for the construction of the whole project, the farmers' holdings and the Indian lands thereby financing the whole original cost. A visionary plan was outlined by Meyers, whereby in the future the water-power companies were to be compelled to pay rentals for the improved use of the water, but no provision is made for any reduction of the assessment of any farmer because of such expected payment by the water-power company.

Eight townships in Pennington County and a portion of a township in Marshall County are assessed for benefits, the assessments being as high as $8 an acre. Outside of a small segregated bunch down in the town of Hickory, in what is alleged to be the old Hickory swamp, the opposition to the project is absolutely unanimous, except for one party, so far as we are able to discover. The seven towns in Pennington County are fighting the proposition, as townships and every resident of the seven towns in opposition, and of the one town in Marshall County, are unanimous except one, and are unalterable in their opposition to the project.

I represent all the opposition, and we have had our hearing in court; and it does not seem to the writer even remotely possible that the court will establish the project. I am now advised that the decision of the court will be made early in February, and would have been made before this had it not been for the fact that there was great delay in presenting the briefs of petitioner to the court. The petitioner is the Red Lake Conservancy Board.

The writer did have a talk with Senator Cliff, wherein Senator Cliff asked the writer of his opinion if any adjustment could be made, and I told Mr. Cliff that I would have to consult the committee who represent the farmers and would express no opinion for them as to the possibility of a compromise, and Senator Cliff now and has at all times understood the matter that way, and will so state. I have consulted with the committee in regard to the matter, and they will listen to no compromise. One reason for this is that they advised me that they have lost all confidence in the conservancy board and do not desire any further proceedings to be taken by this board. I am writing Senator Cliff to that effect to-day.

Concerning the extension of the enabling act in Congress by further congressional legislation at this time is a matter of indifference to these people unless it will result in further activity by the conservancy board. In such case they would be strictly opposed to any such legislation.

Mr. Henderson has a copy of my brief in this matter, which outlines our views in regard to the whole proceeding, and I am sure that Mr. Henderson would be glad to send you his copy if you desire. I have not an available copy at this time, but will gladly supply you one later if you desire it.

I thank you very much for your courtesy in writing me in regard to the matter, and would further heartily thank you for information as to further activities of the conservancy board or others in regard to the matter.

Yours very truly,

WM. J. BROWN.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK BUILDING,
THIEF RIVER FALLS, MINN.,
February 17, 1923.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You are doubtless advised before this time that the court decided against the establishment of the Red Lake drainage project. A perusal of the opinion leads one to the belief that it is the acts of the conservancy board that were condemned by the court's decision. In other words, while the court expressed confidence in the personnel of the conservancy board, yet the opinion itself constitutes an indictment for poor management and bad judgment that should lead the chairman of the conservancy board to resign his office. * * *

* * * * * * *

The proposition of the board to load this whole cost upon the farmers and the Indian lands was so arbitrarily unjust that we felt impelled to use every method of defeating it. Now, that this proposition is out of the way, we again recognize the worth of the proposition for drainage if rightly handled, and would like to have matters in as favorable a condition as possible, to the end that when better times come, the project can be again initiated if those interested so desire.

Thanking you very much for your extreme courtesy in this matter, I am,

Yours very truly,

WM. J. BROWN.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill as it is written. I distinguish between our right and the question of what we ought to do. As I view the situation, there is no question about the right of the United States to apply this property to the satisfaction of claims of American citizens against Germany. We have that right by international law. It is true the exercise of that right has been denounced as immoral for several centuries. But as a legal right under international law America can lawfully confiscate the property in the custody of the Alien Property Custodian and apply it to the satisfaction of American claims. Regardless of international law that can be done, because that right is given by the terms of the treaty, by the provisions of the treaty of Versailles, embodied in the treaty of Berlin, which specifically gives us that right.

But I am entirely willing to meet this question from the broad standpoint of what is right, what is moral, and what is the diplomatic and appropriate thing for this Government to do. The treaty of Berlin gives us the right to establish the clearing-house system for the settlement of these claims. There is abundant authority for the clearing-house system. It was followed during the Revolutionary War. It was followed with France in 1831. It was applied in the settlement of the Alabama claims and in the settlements that followed the war with Spain. Under the clearing-house system Germany has agreed to compensate her nationals for their claims against this country, and she has conceded that the property now in the hands of our Alien Property Custodian shall be applied in satisfaction of the claims of American citizens against Germany.

For four years this property has been held under solemn agreement for this purpose, with a provision that it shall not be turned back until "provision" has been made for the satisfaction of American claims. Suppose we turn all this property back, what have we? It is a proposal that after having held this property for four years to secure the settlement of American claims we should turn it back without even having made an agreement on a plan by which American citizens are to be indemnified. It would be a course that could be explained only on the theory of incompetence, indifference to the rights of our own citizens who suffered outrageous indignities at the hands of Germany, or of trifling with the rights of aliens whose property we hold. We can never expect other nations to regard and respect the rights of American citizens unless our Government is jealous of those rights; quick and sure to defend those rights and slow to sacrifice or yield them.

What is international law and what determines our conduct toward other nationals? It is the rule of international conduct based on comity, on the practice of nations and agreements called treaties. International duties are based upon reciprocal rights mutually recognized. The rights we grant to others we claim for our own citizens.

We do not propose an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth as has been declared here. But if we turn this property back without any provision being agreed upon for the satisfaction of American claims it will be a case of Uncle Sam turning the other cheek.

So I believe that the diplomatic thing to do is to retain the bulk of this property until satisfaction or proper provision has been made for the settlement of American claims. That does not mean that we will confiscate this property. As to the property we do not now return, we simply maintain the existing status. If there be any offense it is only the continuation of an offense already committed. I am willing to concede that when we took the property of these aliens we assumed an obligation to them that is not fully discharged by turning them over to Germany, a bankrupt debtor. And for the purpose of this argument, I am willing to concede that we should not confiscate this property. But as a diplomatic proposition, and as insisting upon the proper treatment of our own nationals, I maintain that it is perfectly right and consistent with the practice of nations in their relations, so far as modern civilization has been known, for America to insist that before we surrender this security our own citizens shall be provided for. [Applause.] We may justly say to Germany, "We hold this property of your citizens. You have agreed we may take it and apply it to the settlement of American claims. We do not want to do that. We want to return it to your citizens at the earliest possible date, but before we do that we want you to provide for the settlement of the claims of our people." Can Germany complain at that?

When we return as high as $10,000 of each trust, as this bill proposes, we settle in full, 93 per cent of all the trusts in number; we ameliorate the hardships of retaining this property, and at the same time we will not substantially impair any purpose for which it is held.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have here a work of authority on international law. It is the Wilson and Tucker book—George Grafton Wilson, professor of international law in Harvard University, and George Fox Tucker, late reporter of decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, a volume used in Georgetown University and in many other of the great schools of the country as a textbook. I read from page 249:

> Many modern treaties provide that in case of war between the parties to the treaties subjects of each State may remain in the other, "and shall be respected and maintained in the full and undisturbed enjoyment of their personal liberty and property so long as they conduct themselves peaceably and properly and commit no offense against the laws." The most recent practice has been to exempt personal property of the subject of one belligerent State from all molestation, even though it was within the territory of the other at the outbreak of war. Of course, such property is liable to the taxes, etc., imposed upon others not enemy subjects.

I now invite attention to the rules of war issued by our own War Department:

> Instructions for the government of the Armies of the United States in the field.
> War Department, Adjutant General's office, April 24, 1863.

Here is section 38:

> Private property, unless forfeited by crimes or by offenses of the owner, can be seized only by way of military necessity for the support or other benefit of the Army or of the United States.
> If the owner has not fled, the commanding officer shall cause receipt to be given, which may serve the spoliated owner to obtain indemnity.

Under these rules of war, laid down by our own War Department, there can be no confiscation of private property.

In this book is also a copy of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes known as The Hague Convention of 1907. An annex to that convention is entitled "Regulations respecting the laws and customs of war on land."

One of these regulations is:

> ART. 46. * * * Private property can not be confiscated.

These statements of the law are in exact accord with the views of Senator Knox. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], with something of criticism in his tone, asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] if Secretary Knox meant what he wrote or if he would have said something different had he been Secretary of State instead of a United States Senator.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is not what I said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is precisely what the gentleman intimated.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is not what I said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman intimated that there might have been a different expression of opinion.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I asked the gentleman if he knew of any act of Secretary Knox while he was Secretary of State. If he did, I wanted to know it as a matter of information.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the gentleman from Illinois also asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] more than once if he knew whether if Knox had then been Secretary of State he would have said what he did.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not say that, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then I entirely misunderstood the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman said something very similar to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; something very similar, half a dozen gentlemen over here say.

Senator Knox wrote in his letter to Professor Borchard, of Yale University:

> I am in entire sympathy with your views relative to the seizure of German private property during the war. I have expressed on the floor of the Senate the opinion that in order to follow our traditions, and be decent, this property should be returned.

Our traditions! What traditions? The traditions of the Senate? No; not at all; but the traditions of the National Government—the great traditions of the State Department, of which he had been an illustrious Secretary. Our traditions and common decency, said the Senator and former great Secretary of State, demand that this property be returned. He declared also in the same letter that respecting the seized property, our only proper function was to conserve it during the period of hostilities and retain possession of it only until the adjustment of the terms of treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not yield, I regret, as I have only 10 minutes. I have here a letter from a friend in my district.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not unless I can get my time extended. Here is a letter, dated January 15 last, from one of my constituents. Let me read a part of it:

> The custodian has had investment interests and real estate turned over to him in the Fannie Kords matter aggregating nearly $37,000.
> Personally it would please me to have everything returned and the office of Alien Property Custodian abolished, but I suppose there are powerful influences who bought German patents from the custodian who would fight that desperately.
> The reason Mrs. Kords is still in Germany is that she has no money to buy transportation and the necessary clothing. I have advanced her nearly $4,000, which she used in paying debts contracted during the war and living expenses since 1918; but there is a limit to what I can do.

Let no person rise here and tell me that you and I have the right—not the power, but in justice and honor, the right—by our votes, to give to any man the authority to hold the property of that aged widow, a refined, delightful woman, as security for something which a government may owe to somebody else.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is this woman an American citizen?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Had she resided in the United States?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. I knew her.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. She went to Germany and was detained there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. She was caught there by the war and could not come to the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, she will get $10,000, and she will not only get $10,000 but the income on all the rest.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That makes no difference at all. You have no right to confiscate any part of that woman's property under the rules which for 100 years have governed civilized warfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have a minute more.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is now being done here is in accord with what has been before attempted. The original peace resolution—I hold in my hand a copy of it—after reciting that peace had come between the United States and Germany, provided, among other things, that "all fines, forfeitures, penalties, seizures, and sales imposed or made by the United States of America are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained."

That was a deliberate attempt to ratify the sales made by the Alien Property Custodian, A. Mitchell Palmer, when he disposed of the German patents, sales in which, as President Harding has declared, the inadequacy of price was so gross as to constitute a badge of fraud. That resolution (H. J. Res. 126) was introduced in the House on May 20, 1921.

Mr. ELLIS. Was it passed?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but it was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs after consultation with the present Alien Property Custodian, and plainly shows the custodian's attitude toward the property.

Under leave granted I desire to add a word that I was by lack of time prevented from saying to gentlemen here who demand that this Government do everything that it has the power to do in accordance with the letter of the law—gentlemen who insist on the letter of the bond.

These gentlemen this afternoon loudly cheered at the conclusion of the reading of Washington's Farewell Address; I wish now to invite their especial attention to a passage in that immortal document which may have escaped their notice:

> It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is little difference between us regarding the law. The United States has always stood for justice with regard to this class of controversies. The United States has always stood and insisted that when private property of aliens was taken in war that it should be returned or its value accounted for. The United States has often gone further than that. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, very early in the history of our country we tried to apply that proposition to the taking of property upon the seas as well as on the land. We stand committed to that doctrine. We have never violated it throughout our entire international history. We stand for it to-day.

Now, what is the situation that we have confronting us now? During the war with Germany, property belonging to German citizens in our territory was taken over by the United States Government. Gentlemen now say that it was wrongfully taken over. Gentlemen now say that we had no right to do it, and, strange to say, the gentlemen who most loudly proclaim that doctrine belong to the party of the administration that took over the property. It was not the present administration that was responsible for taking the property; it was the last administration.

This present administration is trying to do its very best to see that no wrong shall come because of that taking over, if any wrong was done, of the last administration, and I ask you gentlemen to remember this fact: That if wrong was done by the last administration, either in taking over the property, in handling it, or disposing of it, this administration is called upon to right the wrong and make restitution, because if property taken over by the last administration was sold for a price less than its value, then this administration will have to account for it, for the reason that it is not what the property sells for, it is what the property absolutely is worth that the National Government will be called upon to account for when it comes to final settlement.

What has this administration done with regard to the matter? The United States and its nationals have claims against the German Government for probably over $100,000,000. The German Government and German nationals have claims against the United States amounting now to about $350,000,000. We say to Germany, "Let us settle these claims in an amicable way," and we enter into negotiations with Germany, and a commission is appointed for the settlement and ascertainment of those claims. Is not that a good thing to do? Do gentlemen not agree to that? Within three years after the war had closed, not at a time when we could impose or sought to impose a treaty upon Germany, we made a declaration with regard to peace between this country and Germany, and entered into negotiations with Germany asking that the settlement should be deferred until there could be an adjustment of claims on both sides, and that the property should be retained until it could be settled on both sides. Was that a wrong thing to do? Gentlemen say that we are now holding this property and by that means are confiscating it. No; very far from that. By arranging to pay the claims, by entering into an agreement as to a means of paying them, we acknowledge our liability, not disclaim it. To adjust conflicting claims is an arrangement to pay them, not to repudiate them.

It is a reasonable thing, it is a fair thing. It is international law, and it will be respected in any international court. An arrangement has been made that pending ascertainment and adjustment of conflicting claims the United States shall hold the property until the claims of the United States and its nationals shall be ascertained and settled. That is not confiscation. And now we go further; we voluntarily say by this legislation that as we have more than enough to satisfy German claims we will relinquish a fair surplus to claimants. We offer to pay all claims up to $10,000. That will pay in full over 90 per cent of the claims, about 27,000 of the 30,000 filed. Gentlemen complain of that. They declare that by not paying all we declare a policy of confiscation. They declare that making a payment on 90 per cent of the claims in full and of $10,000 on all others is repudiation. They declare that a contract that an adjustment of conflicting claims shall be made is bad policy and that with German property in our hands which Germany agrees shall be held until our claims are fully paid we should surrender it all and trust the chance that a bankrupt and dismembered government may some time pay our claims. That is unreasonable. It is foolish. It is unjust. We are by this legislation not only doing the fair thing, we are acting generously. No man of any party can justify a vote against this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want that one minute to say that the whole argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was based on the statement that on this side we had asserted that the original taking of this property was unlawful or wrong. I have not heard a single soul make that statement.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad, indeed, that the gentleman from Texas corrected the statement of the gentleman from Iowa with reference to the attitude of the minority upon the question of the original right of our Government to seize this alien property. We admit that the Government had the right to do it. We admit that it was proper for the Government to seize this property, but upon what theory was it seized? Surely not to dispossess the owners of the title to their property. It was seized upon well-recognized principles of international law, in order that the property itself during the conflict might not be used by alien enemies, or its custody withdrawn from our territory to be used by the enemy elsewhere. It was seized upon that principle, and when it was seized what position legally did the Government of the United States assume with respect to it? Purely that of a custodian or a trustee.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I can not yield. I have only a limited time.

It was taken over also in order to protect it against waste and seizure, possibly, by those who had no right to take it in the absence of its owner. So that when it was seized the Government of the United States in its legal aspect assumed the position of a trustee to guarantee that it should be conserved and not destroyed for the period of the war. The war has been over for a number of years. This trustee, this Government of ours, still has possession of the property, but I have not heard any advocate of this bill so bold as to make the argument here that when we seized the property we acquired title to it and, therefore, the right to confiscate its use. We should look at this problem from the broad aspect of what is the proper moral, as well as the legal, disposition to make of it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Doctor TEMPLE] asserted a doctrine which I think would appeal to the gentleman from Alabama, in that the German Government had agreed that this arrangement should be made. Does the gentleman from Alabama think that the German Government had no authority to make such an arrangement with the United States with respect to this property?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it had the right to make an arrangement with the United States undoubtedly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If it had, then it becomes responsible to its own citizens for the claim.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But because the now existing Government of Germany made an arrangement with the Government of the United States in a treaty of peace, it could not, either by international law or in good conscience or morals, thereby deprive the owners of the property of the inherent right they would have as owners in the property.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Without its becoming liable to those owners.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In no event, as I look at the proposition.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I call attention to the fact that in order that article 5 of the Berlin treaty may prevail against German nationals it is necessary to treat it as retroactive, because it changes previous treaties and the previous status of nationals and their property.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course. What disposition should we make of this property? This is not a partisan question, although an effort has been made to criticize the former administration.

The question is, What in equity and in good conscience as a matter of practical statesmanship should we do with this German property? Why, I asked the gentleman in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], if he believed in confiscation, and he said, "no"; he repudiated the doctrine. I asked him if Germany did not settle those claims, how long were they to hold this property, fifty years, and he said probably so, if these claims were not settled. Gentlemen, does not that mean the practical confiscation of this property? If you deny the legal owners of this property the right of its possession and use for a long period of time—say, 25 or 50 years—is not that tantamount to its absolute confiscation, because the interest upon it, they being deprived of its possession for that period of time, would more than amount to the principal, and in the long run it would be confiscation. So that, gentlemen, the position I take is that as trustee of this property, the question as it now comes is, What disposition shall we make of it? The treaty of Berlin provides that it shall be held by the Government of the United States until the question of its disposition shall be determined by law, and assuredly the law referred to is such law as we shall enact at this time, now that we are undertaking to deal with the subject. Otherwise it will simply resolve itself into the question of shall we hold it, denying any claim of ultimate confiscation, or shall we return it to the owners and allow them to use it as they see fit as their own property. If it is correct in principle, as has been asserted here on this subject, to return a part of the property, why should it not be equally right to return the whole property at this time and settle this whole problem and get rid of the tremendous expense and annoyance of taking care of and conserving these various estates? Why hand out to these alien property owners a mere dime when we admit that we owe them a dollar and when we admit in the same breath that it is our purpose ultimately to return to them the whole dollar?

It is admitted even on the other side that we should not permanently retain the other 90 per cent of the dollar and attempt to sequestrate it and sell this property in order to collect these debts owed to our private citizens. That is the whole proposition, as I see it, involved in this controversy, and that is the reason why I think the amendment that has been suggested by the gentleman from Texas, when it comes up, should be adopted. What policy have you announced here, the responsible leaders of the majority in favor of this bill, as to what we are going to do with this other 90 per cent of the property? How long are you going to hold it; what terms are you going ultimately to make in reference to its disposition? You have not asserted any policy. You have given us no light on this subject as to what you ultimately propose to do with reference to its future disposition, but here and now we have an opportunity to settle this whole problem in one action and to settle it upon terms of good conscience, equity, and law. Some gentlemen have asserted here that there have been international precedents for this action as proposed by the majority, and my attention has been called to the fact that the settlement of the controversy with France, cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], was not at all the matter of taking property in rem, not actual tangible property which has been seized and was being held by the Government as trustee, but one relating to the settlement en bloc of mutual claims which had not been adjusted and did not involve the actual seizure of either personal or real property. There is written in the Constitution of the United States a provision, "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation to the owner." We are jealous of that right, of course, in reference to our own citizens, and, as has been suggested here, although I have absolutely no patience with the Prussian dynasty with which we combatted during the war, I might say incidentally I have no resident in my district who is a national of Germany who has one dollar's worth of property held by the Government as an alien, yet by the ordinary rules of procedure and hospitality and international policy it seems to me that if we are so zealous of the protection of the rights of our own citizens as to write it into our law that they shall not be deprived of property for public use without compensation, surely we are responsible to those visitors who have come into our midst and invested in property here, under the promise of our protection of their property, to the same character of protection that we give to our own citizens under the Constitution. As a matter of law, the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred protects alien property from seizure for public use as much as it protects that of our own citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believes it is right to return all the property. I introduced a bill into this House providing for the return of all this property 18 months ago. But if it was right to return all the property then, certainly it is right to return a part of the property now. [Applause.] I am for this bill because, in my judgment, it is the most feasible undertaking that is possible at this late day. From reliable information I am convinced that if we include all the property now, the bill will not pass the Senate. There are millions of people in Germany and Austria who are starving. If we pass this bill 30,000 trusts will be paid in full and $10,000 will be paid on each of the remaining claims; $45,000,000 will be released and that would give a world of relief over there. I called upon the Secretary of State a few days ago for information as to the real conditions in central Europe as reported to him by our diplomatic and consular representatives. The Secretary of State replied to me under date of January 5, 1923, in which he says in part:

> The following information and statistics have been submitted to the Department of State by official American representatives in Germany charged with the compilation of such material.

Mr. Hughes then proceeds to quote from a number of reports submitted by our consular representatives.

A report dated September 20, 1922, gives a quantitative estimate of grain crops in Germany as follows:

November, 1913: The crop for 1913 was 3,532,617 tons of winter wheat. In 1922 it had fallen to 1,637,157 tons.

In 1913 the summer-wheat yield was 510,467 tons. That fell down in 1922 to 268,566 tons. These reports are from our American consuls.

In 1913 winter spelt—that is a species of rye growing in southern Germany—yielded 437,787 tons, which fell in 1922 to 127,957 tons.

Rye, which is their staple for breadstuffs, had a yield in 1913 of 9,087,150 tons, which fell in 1922 to 5,285,231 tons.

The Secretary of State says that in a report from the consul dated November 23, 1922, the following statement is made:

> It is now thought that the grain supply on hand in Germany will last until February instead of January, 1923, as heretofore reported.

I had information to the effect that the Reparation Commission had stated that the grain supply would only last until January, and it would take 2,000,000 tons of grain to feed the people and keep them from starving during the winter. They had evidently made the same statement in a former report, but later information indicates that their bread supply will last until February.

This is due to the importation of large quantities of grain from abroad.

It is clear that the food supply of Germany for the current year is not more than one-half of what it was in 1913. Then one of our consuls reports to the State Department, November 23, as follows:

At present much distress prevails in Germany. The papers are full of appeals for aid to the poor and the people are urged to do everything possible to relieve the great suffering. The fuel situation remains unsatisfactory. Coal prices had to be increased, which is due in no small measure to the fact that a million tons of coal have had to be imported from England each month, the exact figure for October being 918,598 tons. Fortunately for the poorer classes, the winter so far has been quite mild, making the use of coal for heating purposes practically unnecessary. Should colder weather set in, however, the suffering of the poor and of the middle classes will probably be very great, since the price of coal is practically beyond their reach.

Mark you, that report was dated November 23 last. I am advised that cold weather since then has brought untold suffering.

Then I want to call your attention to a statement which the Secretary of State quotes from our ambassador in Berlin. Here is what he says under date of December 21 last:

The milk supply of Berlin is only one-half its former quantity. The bread consumption per capita is 104 units to-day as against 240 units in 1914. In many wards of the city more than one-half of the children are tubercular, and a considerable portion of the population there are wholly without fuel. The ambassador adds that he believes there will be great distress among the population before the middle of February when the food supply will run short and regards the possibilities as appalling.

Gentlemen, imagine, if you can, a situation in a great city like Berlin, with more than 50 per cent of the children in large areas of the city tubercular, without adequate milk; and then imagine the same children undernourished and sick and without fuel to produce heat to keep their bodies warm. If there ever was a time when we ought to act, it is now, and we yet are holding away from 30,000 of those starving, suffering people, to whom we pledged our friendship when the war began, the money that belongs to them.

Oh, you can talk about confiscation and about charging their claims against a bankrupt German Government if you will, but those people came to this country under a treaty agreement which guaranteed protection to their property.

It is interesting to study the provisions of Article XXIII of the treaty in force during the war between the United States and Germany. It reads as follows:

If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and, in general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments and shall not be molested in their persons nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

The office of the Alien Property Custodian was created within six months after the declaration of war, and I do not know of any German national who was ever permitted to carry off any of his effects which happened to be in this country when war was declared.

The only justification for the creation of the office of Alien Property Custodian was to prevent the nationals who were then our enemies from using their property in this country against us during the war. That was the reason which justified our action at that time, but that reason ceased to exist over four years ago, and still we are holding the property, in the face of our treaty obligations to the German national—a treaty obligation entered into in time of peace when the blood was cool—a treaty obligation which the nationals of Germany and Austria had the right to assume we would faithfully keep, an obligation which plainly provides that the merchant has nine months to carry off all his property, without molestation or hindrance; that all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed, inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, and places, and, in general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind should be allowed to continue their employments without molestation.

Could anything be clearer as to the obligation of this Government to protect the national who did not start the war, who could not control the war, who had no power to stop the war?

I have read the debate at the time the alien property bill was passed, and the statements of those who contended that war terminates all treaties. I have read article 23 of the treaty with Germany. In order to show how determined they were that war should not terminate the treaty, let us read article 24 of that document:

And it is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties nor any other whatever shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article, but on the contrary, the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature and nations.

Then, too, our President in his message delivered on the day preceding the declaration of war renewed our pledge of friendship to the people of Germany. Let us examine his words:

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that the Government acted in entering into this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when the people were nowhere consulted by their rulers.

That was our declaration, and through the President we declared further:

We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its people, the German people included.

We made a distinction always between the kaiser's government and the German people. We declared that with the people of Germany we had no quarrel over the war; that they did not start it; that they could not stop it; that they could only carry its burdens. Those people had nothing to do with the depredations committed by the kaiser's government, and yet it is those same people with whom we are dealing now.

The declarations of our President, which I have quoted, were scattered by the thousands of copies, printed in German, over the trenches occupied by the German soldiers. Those are the sentiments also that we fed into the German prisoners who were captured, and many of whom were permitted to escape to carry this propaganda back into the German trenches, and it broke the morale of the German Army.

This Congress is not in an enviable position to deny this relief. If there was one man of all the Germans more despicable than all the rest; if there was one German who brought down on his head the condemnation of all Americans, it was Count von Bernstorff, who violated every rule of hospitality, who took advantage of his presence here to violate our neutrality. And yet this Congress passed a law which turned back to his wife, an American heiress, who went to Germany to marry a German title, $1,000,000, while we withhold this money from these humble German girls who never had a chance to marry an American boy. We have paid hundreds of millions of dollars to these rich American women. I contend that that should have been the last to be paid. I hope this bill will be passed without material amendment, because unless it is passed in its present form, if the amount is substantially increased at this late day, it will not pass the Senate, and there will not be a chance on earth to give relief to these suffering people. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I correctly understood the closing remarks of my colleague from Missouri, who has just yielded the floor, he perhaps has inside information upon the subject under discussion which we do not have. I am not willing to sacrifice, for the sake of expediency, a national principle, and there is certainly a national principle involved in this legislation to which we must not close our eyes. To my mind, the question before us is one simple of solution. The proposition before us is plain and understandable, and why we should complicate it with lengthy discussions of treaties, diplomatic relations, and all that is beyond my understanding. As has been stated by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], we are not dealing with property of the German Government but considering the disposition of the private property of individuals.

This property was seized by our Government during the war. The law which authorized its seizure had only one purpose in view, and that one purpose was to prevent any chance of any portion of this property being used against our Government during the war. We all know that in many instances where property was so seized under the provisions of this law that there was not even the slightest of danger of the property or money being used by its owners against our Government, but, of course, the law authorized its seizure just the same. The sole cause upon which the law was bottomed has long ago ceased to exist. The war has closed for lo, these many years, and all thinking people are devoting their energies in an effort to bring back some semblance of order out of the disorder created by the war. The property seized belonged to thousands of individuals and in the aggregate amounts to multiplied millions of dollars in value. The property in the main is represented by investments small and large made long prior to our entry in the war and at a time when peace and cordial relations existed between our Government and Germany. These investments were made because our own people solicited them. They were made principally through relatives or friends in this country, ofttimes by children for their parents, brother for sister, and so on, and always in the best of faith and with no thought of their property ever being confiscated by our Government. No one contends for a single moment that the property of these private individuals, many of whom are residents of the United States, should be confiscated by our Government for any public debt that may be due from Germany. It is my judgment that the time is now here when all of this property and money should be returned by our Government to its rightful owners. [Applause.]

The only argument that has been advanced for longer withholding the property from its rightful owners is to the effect that it should be held as a guaranty or security for what the German Empire may owe to citizens of the United States. It is generally conceded by every Member who has spoken that we would violate a time-honored and ancient principle of our own Government if we confiscated private property for a public debt due to our citizens from another Government; that such an act upon our part would violate a principle that has run through our form of government since its very foundation. To do otherwise than to return this property would violate an established American doctrine which has been concurred in by our own Presidents from Washington down to Harding, approved by all international law and lawyers, and indorsed by our Secretaries of State from Jefferson to Knox. To continue to hold this private property, even under the pretense that we are holding it as security, is to that extent confiscating it; and any confiscation whatsoever is a clear violation of the ancient and time-honored policies of our Government to which I have referred. The contention that we should hold this property as security, when carried to its logical conclusion, means eventual confiscation of the property. In other words, if the debt was not paid we would expect to take the property—foreclose our security, as it were. I do not believe there is a Member here that has given any study to the subject who would be willing to do that, and in so doing trample down a principle of our own Government that is so old that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. However, to those who insist upon holding this property as a pledge or security, let me inquire: Why should we hold so large an amount?

The highest estimates that have ever been placed upon the amounts due to citizens of the United States from Germany, including the loss of life from the sinking of the Lusitania, is $174,000,000, the major portion of which claims—to be exact, 90 per cent—are based upon insurance claims. Everyone knows that the insurance companies were in the business for the money they could make out of it. Owing to the perils of war they charged and received a high rate of insurance. The premiums were paid—high premiums at that—the shipper delivered his cargo and collected for both his wares and the insurance premiums which he had paid out. If his cargo was lost, he collected his insurance. The premiums were paid. Who, oh who, is now to be paid on account of these insurance claims? And they constitute 90 per cent of the total amount of claims against Germany which have been so much discussed here this afternoon as valid claims. No court or jury on earth would make you or me pay a dollar's worth of claims that have already been paid. Now the actual indebtedness is on account of loss of life on the Lusitania and other similar claims, the total amount of which claims are less than $15,000,000; yet it is argued we should hold this entire amount of $350,000,000 worth of private properties as security for a total debt of only $15,000,000. This, too, in the face of the fact that our Government now holds approximately $300,000,000 worth of ships and other property belonging to Germany, which is independent of and has no connection with the $350,000,000 worth of private property which I now insist should be returned to its rightful owners.

The ships and other property of the German Government which we hold is more than ample security, if we must have security, for what the German Government owes to private individuals in this country. A fair deal and a square deal is not going to hurt anyone, and the fair and decent thing for Congress to do is to return this private property to its owners, many of whom are in shamefully destitute circumstances, faced with want and poverty, because of our failure to return their properties to them sooner. Our failure to return this property is fast becoming a national scandal. I wish I had the time to call to your attention in detail some of the instances of privation, want, and hardships to which these people are being subjected. Many Members of Congress have received the most heart-rending appeals upon this subject. Let me read from the testimony of the Alien Property Custodian himself, on page 12, Part I, of the hearings on this bill. Mr. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, in testifying before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, said:

> I do think that some legislation of this character should be passed by the present Congress in order to alleviate the hardships of thousands of people whose paltry property is being held by us, and which in the end will undoubtedly be returned to them, especially the small ones. I am not going to take the time of the committee to-day, unless they want to bring it out in questions, to describe to you the letters that we receive and the pathetic appeals that come to us. And if you saw some of the property we are holding belonging to these former enemy subjects you would wonder why the Government ever wanted to hold it a day longer and why we are put to the expense of administering it.

It is time that we performed the simple act of justice of returning this money and property to its rightful owners and to that extent relieve the distressed conditions to which the Alien Property Custodian has referred. Those who have given any thought or attention to the conditions now prevailing in Germany realize that the distress is much greater among their people than the public generally realize. I again quote, and this time from a letter from one of my own constituents:

> I have been a citizen of the United States since about 30 years, and I am proud of it, for I remember so many instances where our United States showed their magnanimity and compassion when, during catastrophes not only of ours but also of other nations, it extended its helping hand to the sufferers as the good Samaritan, not only by private but very often by Government aid. Should we not be loyal now to this old and good usage? What reasons would justify the closing of our hands in this present need, where thousands and millions of our brethren—most of them Christians like you and I, and just as innocent regarding the origin of the Great War—are in the greatest danger to perish, and when they cry to us for help? I give you a quotation of a letter received of recent date from one of my church members by a friend of his in Silesia, which will give you an idea in what mood they are out there at present and what conditions are dominant there, especially in cities. The party is writing (in translation) as follows:
> "DEAR FRIENDS: It looks pitiful here in Germany. We are standing at an abyss, and the French are determined to toss us down in order to destroy us forever. Dear friends, please intercede in favor of us with your fellow citizens! We always are reading in papers—America is going to help us. Oh, how we wish that it may come true! The misery is almost unbearable. People walking on the streets in Neustadt (Silesia) look like walking corpses. In cities it is not uncommon for poor people to use borrowed coffins. There is nothing but misery, lamentation, and distress. In many a family children as well as grown persons have no shirt, no clothing, no shoes, no stockings since a long time."

These quotations are typical of the conditions. The millions of money and property which we are now holding without rhyme or reason would greatly alleviate much of this poverty and distress. Private citizens of this country have gone down in their own pockets and advanced some of the claimants of this property temporary assistance in the belief that a just and honorable Government would soon return to them their own properties. We can not longer justify ourselves in withholding it. Why harp upon the subject of diplomatic relations or secret reasons as to why this property can not be returned. Not a single sound reason has been forthcoming from any source. Our Secretary of State was given every opportunity to present reasons before the committee. I am now ready to vote to return every dollars' worth of this property to its rightful owners. No one can successfully argue that such a thing will ultimately not be done. Why not do it now? Shall we be less punctual in the performance of a national duty than Germany? Germany has by legislation long ago returned every dollars' worth of property held by Germany belonging to citizens of the United States. Surely our own Government will no longer delay doing that which everyone concedes should eventually be done. Again let me quote from the testimony of the Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Miller, before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on page 17 of the hearings in which the following colloquy occurred between Mr. Miller and Mr. LEA of California, who is a member of the committee:

> Mr. LEA. Mr. Miller, suppose that Congress should now definitely determine that it will not take private property for the satisfaction of claims. Would you then know of any reason why Congress should any longer hold this property?
> Mr. MILLER. No; if that policy is arrived at there would not be any further reason why we should.

Then, further on in his testimony, as shown on page 19, this colloquy occurred between Mr. Miller and Representative HUDDLESTON, also a member of the committee:

> Mr. MILLER. * * * but I know it is not the desire nor the policy of this administration to resort to confiscation of this private property to pay American claims. It is merely held as a guaranty.
> Mr. HUDDLESTON. Well, what is a guaranty worth if you do not intend to enforce it? If the administration has decided definitely upon a policy of not applying in any event this property to the payment of claims, it has no effect as a guaranty and has no effect of any kind. Are you able to advise us that that is the policy of the administration?

Mr. MILLER. Not to resort to confiscation?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I am safe in making that statement here to-day.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then, if that is correct, there would seem to be no reason for not returning all the property?

Mr. MILLER. That is absolutely so.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have considered every scintilla of evidence taken at these hearings and my mind was never clearer upon a subject in my life. Fairness, honesty, upright and straightforward dealing, and every instinct of justice that I have prompt me to urge a return of this property and thereby keep faith with our forefathers in sustaining a principle of this Government that has been steadfastly adhered to by each and every one of our statesmen without regard to their political affiliations. President Wilson said that "we had no war with the German people." When he made that statement he was applauded by the Members of Congress. Let us remember that our part in the World War was said to be for the purpose of pushing back the hand of autocracy. Our first efforts were devoted to breaking down the military machine and destroying its morale. Our airplanes flew over the German lines and dropped tons of literature to do this—urging upon the German people that they would receive fair and decent treatment at the hands of the American Government

The war is now over. We should keep faith with our own pledges, and I for one feel it to be our conscientious duty to not only keep faith with our pledges but to keep faith with our conscience, the traditions of our Government, and sustain in all respects our national principles. We should not compromise upon this matter. A compromise in this case means the continuance of an expensive bureau of our Government that is costing the already overburdened taxpayers multiplied thousands of dollars to support. I would blush with shame to think that we continued to support an unnecessary agency of the Government at the expense of the taxpayers for the mere sake of providing some one with employment, while at the same time doing a gross injustice by withholding from a people the control of their own property, much of which is urgently needed at this time to relieve suffering, want, and distress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROACH. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Is it in order to extend the time, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WINSLOW. The next speaker on this side to whom I will yield time is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. As I understand it, we have 28 minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 28 minutes left.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 28 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate that it is getting late, and it may be rather hard to hold the attention of the members of the committee to what I want to say. I have some things that I hope may be of some interest.

The principal argument that is made against this bill is the argument that we are doing something immoral by passing it; that we ought to give all the property back; that in not doing so we are violating international law and doing a thing that is nationally immoral. I do not coincide with that theory. In order to get any sort of an idea of what rights a nation has in this matter it may be well for us briefly to go over this proposition from the beginning to see what the rights of this country are, what has been done, and what these acts amount to in a legal sense and in a moral way.

I do not intend to weary you with any long and verbose reading of law, but I want to call your attention to a sentence or two found in the authorities which the minority themselves cite as authorities for their position in this matter. In doing so I want to say to the members of the committee that, as I understand it, it has been the international law, well established and announced by our Supreme Court from the beginning of the history of our Government, that a nation does have the right to confiscate the property of nationals of other countries in times of war, whether they reside within or outside of its country. I read first a brief sentence or two from the case found in Third Dallas, 226 (Ware v. Hylton), an authority which is cited by these gentlemen in their minority views. Judge Chace says:

> It appears to me that every nation at war with another is justifiable, by the general and strict law of nations, to seize and confiscate all movable property of its enemy, of any kind and nature whatever, wherever found, whether within its territory or not.

Justice Iredell, in a separate opinion in the same case, stated this—I want to call your special attention to it:

> The right acquired by war—detached from customs, which I am not now considering, or any express stipulation, if there be such—depends on the power of seizing the enemy's effects. It is not grounded on any antecedent claim of property but, on the contrary, the property is admitted to be the enemy's, in the very act of seizing it. Its sole justification is that being forced into a state of hostility—

Notice this, gentlemen—

> by any injury for which no satisfaction could be obtained in a peaceable manner, reprisals may be made use of, as a means to compel justice to be done or to enable the injured party to obtain satisfaction for itself.

Which is just exactly the doctrine enunciated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

The case of Brown against United States, found in Eighth Cranch's Report, 109, is also cited by these gentlemen of the minority. In that case Chief Justice Marshall held, and it is undoubtedly the law, that the confiscation of enemy property as an act of reprisal in times of war is always justifiable and is sustained by the principles of international law. I quote his language:

> Respecting the power of government no doubt is entertained. That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found is conceded. The mitigations of this rigid rule, which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice, will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but can not impair the right itself. That remains undiminished, and when the sovereign authority shall choose to bring it into operation, the judicial department must give effect to its will. But until that will shall be expressed, no power of condemnation can exist in the court. * * * On a review of authorities, I am entirely satisfied that, by the rigor of the law of nations and of the common law, the sovereign of a nation may lawfully confiscate the debts of his enemy during war or by way of reprisal; and I will add, that I think this opinion fully confirmed by the judgment of the Supreme Court in Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall. 199), where the doctrine was explicitly asserted by some of the judges, reluctantly admitted by others, and denied by none.

Now, I am not asking for confiscation at all. It is not necessary to do so. That question does not arise in the consideration of this bill. It is not at all a matter for our consideration, but rather a matter of contract rights openly entered into between our Government and the Government of Germany to which I desire to call your attention. Before I go into the facts leading up to the Knox-Porter resolution I want to call your attention to the treaty of 1785 with Prussia. Section 23 of that treaty has been cited by the gentleman from Alabama, I believe, and others, in which section it is stated that merchants of the two contracting countries shall have the right to leave the other country with their goods and have nine months in which to do it. Did you know that also in this treaty is this language? And, gentlemen of the minority, I would like to have you give your careful attention to this:

> ART. 12. If one of the contracting parties should be engaged in war with any other power, the free intercourse and commerce of the subjects or citizens of the party remaining neuter with the belligerent powers shall not be interrupted. On the contrary, in that case, as in full peace, the vessels of the neutral party may navigate freely to and from the ports and on the coasts of the belligerent parties, free vessels making free goods, insomuch that all things shall be adjudged free which shall be on board any vessel belonging to the neutral party, although such things belong to an enemy of the other; and the same freedom shall be extended to persons who shall be on board a free vessel, although they should be enemies to the other party, unless they be soldiers in actual service of such enemy.

That was also a part of the treaty of 1785; and I put it to you now directly, Was not that violated by the German Government repeatedly before the war began, before we entered into it? "Free vessels make free goods." And yet they went upon the high seas and, in the case of the Lusitania, the Sussex, and the Essex, and many others, destroyed our vessels without warning and against our protest, and therefore voided every provision of the treaty of 1785 by their own deliberate act.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And these claims of American claimants, practically all of them, arise out of the violation of this treaty which the gentleman has cited.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. Now, let me tell you where these claims come from. Most of these claims arise from that violation of article 12 of the treaty of 1785 before we got into the war. What were they? Claims of the Lusitania sufferers amounting to $15,000,000; claims of those who were sunk on the Sussex and Essex, to the horror and almost to the stupefaction of our whole people. What else? When the war broke out there were in German banks over $40,000,000 of American deposits; and now, at this time, when it is said they have turned back all of our property, do you know that they are offering to pay that money, those deposits, in depreciated German marks? With marks at many thousands to the dollar, you will observe that these claims of American citizens are practically destroyed unless some aid comes from our Government.

The insurance claims also were claims contracted before we entered the war and on account of the German Empire violating the terms of the treaty I have mentioned.

Now, what right did we have to enter into the Knox-Porter resolution and what right did the German Government have to enter into such a negotiation? The treaty of Versailles is familiar to all of us, but perhaps not all of the provisions. But this is in the treaty of Versailles:

Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect to the sale or retention of their property rights or interests.

Germany undertakes to take care of the claims of her nationals, and so provided in the treaty of Versailles.

When the Senate refused to confirm and ratify the treaty of Versailles, desiring to end the technical state of war, the Congress passed the Knox-Porter resolution. I quote from its language:

All property of the Imperial German Government, or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees from any source or by any agency whatsoever, and all property of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its successor or successors, and of all Austro-Hungarian nationals which was on December 7, 1917, in or has since that date come into possession or under control of or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States of America, and no disposition thereof made except as shall have been heretofore or specifically hereafter shall be provided by law, until such time as the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or their successor or successors, shall have respectively made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims against said governments, respectively, of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America and who have suffered through the acts of the Imperial German Government, or its agents, or the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its agents, since July 31, 1914, loss, damages, or injury to their persons or property, etc.

The Knox-Porter resolution was approved by the President July 2, 1921. On August 25, 1921, the treaty of Berlin was signed, and afterwards ratified on November 11, 1921. This treaty, in part, recited the language of the Knox-Porter resolution, just quoted, and then the following language was used:

ARTICLE 1. Germany undertakes to accord to the United States, and the United States shall have and enjoy, all the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages specified in the aforesaid joint resolution of the Congress of the United States of July 2, 1921, including all the rights and advantages stipulated for the benefit of the United States in the treaty of Versailles which the United States shall fully enjoy, notwithstanding the fact that such treaty has not been ratified by the United States.

Now, that sort of a treaty having been entered into between the two nations, the question is whether the German Government had the right to make such a treaty, and if so, how far did it bind its nationals in so doing?

I want to call attention to the constitution of the new German Republic. How far, if you please, can any nation take the property of its citizens and apply the same in satisfaction of the claims of other nations? The law is plain and has been held in almost every civilized country in the world that a nation has such a right. Not only has it such a right in Germany but this right has been written expressly in the constitution of the new German Republic. Let me read the first section, 153, of the constitution of the German Republic, established August 11, 1919:

The constitution guarantees the right of private property. Its nature and limitations are defined by law. Expropriation—

That is what we are talking about—shall take place only for the common good and shall be subject to due process of law.

There shall be appropriate compensation, unless otherwise provided by Federal law. Property rights impose certain duties. The use of property shall serve for the common good.

Article 7 of the constitution says:

The Federal State has jurisdiction over: * * * matters concerning expropriation.

Therefore in the most explicit language the German people have written into their fundamental law the right of the German Republic to use their property and money in satisfaction of the claims of other nationals.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to ask whether the gentleman considers that the owners of this property now held by the Alien Property Custodian had their property taken by the German Government under due process of law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that he and I and the other Members of this Congress have the right to pass upon that question? We must assume that when the German Government has entered into a treaty which has been signed by properly designated agents that these agents have the proper authority. To do otherwise would be to possibly repudiate every treaty that we ever entered into.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Have they been compensated as required by that constitution?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know, but that question is a question to be settled between the German Republic and its citizens.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has argued that this property has been legally taken.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Legally, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In order to have been legally taken, there must have been a day in court, and due process of law, and compensation therefor. It is upon the gentleman to establish those things.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The Congress, when this treaty has been entered into by properly accredited representatives and has been ratified by the two nations, need not use its time in passing upon the question of whether some citizen in Germany has had his day in court. There is no day in court as between nations. Nations deal with each other in one of two ways, either by treaties or by wars. In this case they have made an agreement which is before us, and which is to us the law of the land.

I want to read now what the supreme court of Germany holds on this matter. On October 8, 1918—B. against Konkurs—in a case involving this same proposition, that court said:

Thus * * * the compensation in regard to all rights in property or in the use of the same shall take the place of the expropriated object. * * * By virtue of a Federal law, the owner is to be compensated for the thing expropriated on account of public interest.

Thus further announcing the policy which I have stated, which is developed more in Germany than in this country, because, so far as I know, our courts have not yet in this country passed on the right of a nation to take private property and devote it to a public use of this kind, but I have no doubt as to the right to do so. The citations of German law I have given are from a brief submitted to the committee by counsel for the Lusitania victims, Mr. George Whitefield Betts, jr., and his associate counsel.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think we all agree that the power exists, but has any nation in the world in the last hundred years exercised that power?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Oh, yes; we ourselves have.

Mr. RAYBURN. And has any international writer indorsed that doctrine?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If I have the time I shall show you that we have done it time and time again. Reading now from Butler's Treaty Making Power of the United States, which is one of the most modern works upon the subject, volume 2, page 283:

The third instance referred to is the right of eminent domain; the treaty-making power of the United States has frequently been exercised in the settlement of international disputes in such manner that claims of citizens of the United States against foreign governments have been wiped out and absolutely surrendered, so that they can never be asserted by the citizens either in the courts of this country or in the courts of the debtor government; and this without providing any remedy, or prospect of indemnity, except such as Congress may thereafter provide, at its own time and convenience.

In support of that proposition the author cites precedent after precedent, and let me call the attention of gentlemen to the following treaties which the United States has ratified in our time, or at least within recent times, in which American claims were wiped out and the Government of the United States agreed to stand good for them, just as Germany has agreed in this. During the last 20 years these treaties have been entered into:

Under the convention of 1880 with France, under the agreement of 1885 with Haiti, under the agreement of 1885 with Venezuela, under the protocol of 1891 between Great Britain, Portugal, and the United States, under the convention of 1892 with Chile, under the convention of 1892 with Venezuela, under the treaty of 1898 with Spain, and some other instances; but during the last 20 years there are eight or ten times when we did that thing; that is, destroyed the right of our citizens to collect their claims from other countries. Those claims have been pending in the Congress of the United States; perhaps many of them have been adjusted; but I judge from what I have heard here to-day that many of them are yet pending in which we are responsible to the citizens of the country for wrongs done and injuries committed by other nations. Germany has done that thing here, and Germany has the right to do it under the principles of law and under her constitution and decisions of her supreme court. We have come here to-day asking simply to carry out the contract which Germany made.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the German Republic has assumed responsibility for these claims, does the gentleman not think that this bill goes too far in even paying the claims to the extent of $10,000?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I do not think so.

Mr. GRIFFIN. How does the gentleman justify that?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not attempt to justify the $10,000 any more than I would justify $11,000 or $9,000. Ten thousand dollars was taken as an arbitrary figure, which was thought to include most of them, and would give back to these people enough to tide them over this time of temporary need and would not impair at all this pledged property which is now in our hands.

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is only an indulgence?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is simply to help them out. That is the size of it. To be frank about it, let me say this: If you do not pass this bill, we are not apt to get anything, because gentlemen will understand that there is a spirited opposition to even this small amount of indulgence which the bill will meet elsewhere, and it is better to give these people all we can and at the same time retain the pledge, so that our American citizens will be protected, than it is to do nothing. Therefore, I say, as a practical matter the thing to do is to pass this bill, and even if you put on such an amendment as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has suggested and declare that ultimately it will all be returned, it will mean defeat of the legislation entirely. I can not make up my mind that I can say that all of this property ought to go back to the citizens of Germany, in view of what has occurred, in view of the pledges and promises and treaties that have been made. I can not forget the screams and wails of the victims of the Lusitania when she plunged into the Atlantic on that sad day in our history. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to adopt any scuttling policy when it comes to protecting the rights of Americans in matters of this kind.

Mr. RAYBURN. If there were no other way of collecting those claims, the gentleman would confiscate this property?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would look after American citizens first. During the last two years in this country there has been a policy promoted—some of it fathered by the administration that preceded this—by which claims of American citizens in foreign countries have been somewhat lightly regarded. This vacillating and weak policy has been the source of a great deal of international trouble. I would wipe out that policy and do what I could to look after Americans first.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman says, then, his answer is that he would confiscate this property?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I said nothing of the kind. It is not necessary for me to cross that river until I get to it. I am talking about the situation as it exists. I am talking about a contract which Germany and the United States have entered into and which we are simply trying to put into practical operation by this legislation. It seems to me a question of a charitable act to people in other countries who now need succor and assistance.

Mr. TILSON. Can the gentleman tell us about the per cent in number of these claims that this will take care of?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Ninety per cent.

Mr. TILSON. So there will be only 10 per cent——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Ninety-three per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. All right; 93 per cent. It will do this further thing. Gentlemen have lost sight of one provision of this bill. This bill not only gives back the $10,000 but gives all persons whose property was seized the net income of all their property. I believe the German who had his property seized and which is now in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian is better off than if he had had the property himself.

Mr. SABATH. How about the resident alien; would he be better off?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The same law applies to him.

Mr. SABATH. Well, Germany could not seize the property?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why, the right of the German Government extends to any German any place, anywhere, just as our right extends to our citizens any place in the world. This includes the right of taxation, the right of levying any sort of a tax that they can collect from the property of their own nationals.

Mr. SABATH. Is the gentleman contending that the German Government could take the property of a German resident in the United States?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. A German citizen?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If they can get hold of the property, they can.

Mr. SABATH. Ah, getting hold of it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The right exists. It is only a matter of getting jurisdiction over the property.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As a matter of fact, under the alien property law we never seized any property except aliens who were living in Germany and other countries. We did not seize the property of aliens living in this country.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Except those who were interned.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The situation, as I understand it, is that we seized the property of those whom we thought to be dangerous.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Those who were interned.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Where we thought they were dangerous aliens, whether resident or not; but there are a good many aliens in this country whose property we did not take at all, and much of the alien property has never been under control of the Alien Property Custodian. Now, this is a measure of relief that ought to be given. It will help a lot. Forty-five million dollars in Germany will do these people a lot of good. Now I want to say something in reference to Austria-Hungary. Some gentlemen have a wrong impression about it. It is a sad condition, as Mr. HAWES has demonstrated to you, but there are claims pending before the Mixed Claims Commission of approximately $15,000,000 against Austria-Hungary and there are only assets of about nine or ten millions seized from nationals of that country. It is claimed by the Secretary of State in a letter which is in the record that most of these claims are those that originated from submarines that occurred in the Mediterranean Sea.

A part of the letter of the Secretary of State about these Austro-Hungarian trusts is as follows:

> In so far as shown by the records of the department, 61 claims have been filed by American citizens against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government for compensation for losses resulting from the torpedoing of vessels by submarines of that Government, for military requisitions made by that Government, and for damage or injury to persons and property. The total amount of these claims is approximately $13,043,913.
>
> In addition to the foregoing claims filed with the department against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, it is not unlikely that many of the claims of American citizens filed with the department against the Government of Germany may, upon investigation, be found to be claims for losses for which the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government should be responsible. This possibility arises from the fact that claims for losses resulting from submarine warfare have been filed against Germany in cases where the government responsible for the act has not been determined.
> The treaties concluded with Austria and Hungary to reestablish friendly relations with those nations contain provisions securing to the United States all the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, and advantages specified in the joint resolution of Congress of July 2, 1921, declaring the state of war terminated, including all rights and advantages stipulated for the benefit of the United States in the treaties of Versailles, St. German en Laye, and Trianon. The resolution of July 2, 1921, provided, among other things, that sequestrated property should be retained by the United States until such time as the enemy governments made suitable provision for the settlement of claims growing out of the war.
> It appears that the proposed bill is based upon the assumption that the claims of American citizens against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government for losses suffered by reason of the acts of that Government or its agents have been suitably settled, or that no such claims ever existed. As seen from the foregoing, this assumption is incorrect.
>
> I am, my dear Mr. WINSLOW, very sincerely yours,
> CHARLES E. HUGHES.

So it will be seen that if you turn this property back you may deprive a great many American citizens, who otherwise might have some hope of getting their just claims paid, of that right.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman think it would help the program on the other side if we simply amend the bill so as to return Bergdoll his money?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We have got a provision in the bill which I think will stop Grover Cleveland.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if these claims which he mentions in reference to Austria-Hungary were by insurance companies?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; they are claims for loss of life and loss of property.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. By insurance companies?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I think not.

Mr. HAWES. The gentleman will remember I asked the Alien Property Custodian the character of these claims, and he said to the best of his knowledge they were insurance claims from Austria-Hungary.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I did not so understand it.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is what he said, but the other man said something else.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Whatever may have been his statement, the Secretary of State has given us a very definite idea of their nature in his letter I have just quoted. I trust the bill will pass in its present form.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. HAWES. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] the Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the "trading with the enemy act," as amended, is amended to read as follows:

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not finished reading the section. The bill is being read by sections.

Mr. TILSON. That section extends to page 13, line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LONDON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued to read, as follows:

"SEC. 9. (a) That any person not an enemy or ally of enemy claiming any interest, right, or title in any money or other property which may have been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him hereunder and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, or to whom any debt may be owing from an enemy or ally of enemy whose property or any part thereof shall have been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him hereunder and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, may file with the said custodian a notice of his claim under oath and in such form and containing such particulars as the said custodian shall require; and the President, if application is made therefor by the claimant, may order the payment, conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery to said claimant of the money or other property so held by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States, or of the interest therein to which the President shall determine said claimant is entitled: Provided, That no such order by the President shall bar any person from the prosecution of any suit at law or in equity against the claimant to establish any right, title, or interest which he may have in such money or other property. If the President shall not so order within 60 days after the filing of such application, or if the claimant shall have filed the notice as above required and shall have made no application to the President, said claimant may institute a suit in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or in the district court of the United States for the district in which such claimant resides, or, if a corporation, where it has its principal place of business (to which suit the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, shall be made a party defendant), to establish the interest, right, title, or debt so claimed, and if so established the court shall order the payment, conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery to said claimant of the money or other property so held by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States or the interest therein to which the court shall determine said claimant is entitled. If suit shall be so instituted, then such money or property shall be retained in the custody of the Alien Property Custodian, or in the Treasury of the United States, as provided in this act, and until any final judgment or decree which shall be entered in favor of the claimant shall be fully satisfied by payment or conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery by the defendant, or by the Alien Property Custodian, or Treasurer of the United States on order of the court, or until final judgment or decree shall be entered against the claimant or suit otherwise terminated.

"(b) In respect of all money or other property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him hereunder and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, if the President shall determine that the owner thereof at the time such money or other property was required to be so conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, or at the time when it was voluntarily delivered to him or was seized by him, was—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make the point of order that we are proceeding in violation of the order of the House in that by unanimous consent it was ordered that at any time after 5 o'clock it would be in order to move to recess until 8 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that it is after 5 o'clock and before 8 o'clock, so that there is no violation of the order.

Mr. BLANTON. In conformity with that order, so that the House may recess in time to meet at 8 o'clock, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman can not interrupt the reading.

Mr. BLANTON. I can interrupt the reading at any time.

Mr. MONDELL. The Clerk is reading the first section of the bill. As soon as he has concluded that we shall move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Texas is in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided, and the affirmative vote was taken—ayes 5.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw that motion.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the motion is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the motion can not be withdrawn at this stage.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum. I presume I can do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will get his opportunity.

The negative vote was taken—noes 65.

The CHAIRMAN. On this motion the ayes are 5 and the noes are 65.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas insist on his point of order that there is no quorum present?

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that the committee is not going to sit after the reading of this section is completed. I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued to read, as follows:

(1) A citizen or subject of any nation or State or free city other than Germany or Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary and is at the time of the return of such money or other property hereunder a citizen or subject of any such nation or State or free city; or

(2) A woman who, at the time of her marriage, was a subject or citizen of a nation which has remained neutral in the war, or of a nation which was associated with the United States in the prosecution of said war, and who, prior to April 6, 1917, intermarried with a subject or citizen of Germany or Austria-Hungary and that the money or other property concerned was not acquired by such woman, either directly or indirectly, from any subject or citizen of Germany or Austria-Hungary subsequent to January 1, 1917; or

(3) A woman who at the time of her marriage was a citizen of the United States, and who prior to April 6, 1917, intermarried with a subject or citizen of Germany or Austria-Hungary, and that the money or other property concerned was not acquired by such woman, either directly or indirectly, from any subject or citizen of Germany or Austria-Hungary subsequent to January 1, 1917; or

(4) A citizen or subject of Germany or Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary and was at the time of the severance of diplomatic relations between the United States and such nations, respectively, accredited to the United States as a diplomatic or consular officer of any such nation, or the wife or minor child of such officer, and that the money or other property concerned was within the territory of the United States by reason of the service of such officer in such capacity; or

(5) A citizen or subject of Germany or Austria-Hungary, who, by virtue of the provisions of sections 4067, 4068, 4069, and 4070 of the Revised Statutes and of the proclamations and regulations thereunder, was transferred, after arrest, into the custody of the War Department of the United States for detention during the war and is at the time of the return of his money or other property hereunder living within the United States; or

(6) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals outside the United States, or a corporation incorporated within any country other than the United States, and was entirely owned at such time by subjects or citizens of nations, States, or free cities other than Germany or Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary and is so owned at the time of the return of its money or other property hereunder; or

(7) The Government of Bulgaria or Turkey, or any political or municipal subdivision thereof; or

(8) The Government of Germany or Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary, and that the money or other property concerned was the diplomatic or consular property of such Government; or

(9) An individual who was at such time a citizen or subject of Germany, Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, or who is not a citizen or subject of any nation, State, or free city, and that such money or other property, or the proceeds thereof, if the same has been converted, does not exceed in value the sum of $10,000, or although exceeding in value the sum of $10,000 is nevertheless suceptible of division, and the part thereof to be returned hereunder does not exceed in value the sum of $10,000: Provided, That an individual shall not be entitled, under this paragraph, to the return of any money or other property owned by a partnership, association, unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation at the time it was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him hereunder; or

(10) A partnership, association, other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, and that it is not otherwise entitled to the return of its money or other property, or any part thereof, under this section, and that such money or other property, or the proceeds thereof, if the same has been converted, does not exceed in value the sum of $10,000, or although exceeding in value the sum of $10,000, is nevertheless susceptible of division, and the part thereof to be returned hereunder does not exceed in value the sum of $10,000; or

(11) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, having its principal place of business within any country other than Germany, Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, or a corporation, organized or incorporated within any country other than Germany, Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, and that the control of, or more than 50 per cent of the interests or voting power in, any such partnership, association, other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, was at such time, and is at the time of the return of any money or other property, vested in citizens or subjects of nations, States, or free cities other than Germany, Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary.

Then the President, without any application being made therefor, may order the payment, conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery of such money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States, or of the interest therein to which the President shall determine such person entitled, either to the said owner or to the person by whom said property was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid over to the Alien Property Custodian: Provided, That no person shall be deemed or held to be a citizen or subject of Germany or Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary for the purposes of this section, even though he was such citizen or subject at the time first specified in this subsection, if he has become or shall become, ipso facto or through exercise of option, a citizen or subject of any nation or State or free city other than Germany, Austria, or Hungary, (first) under the terms of such treaties of peace as have been or may be concluded subsequent to November 11, 1918, between Germany or Austria or Hungary (of the one part) and the United States and/or three or more of the following-named powers: The British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan (of the other part), or (second) under the terms of such treaties as have been or may be concluded in pursuance of the treaties of peace aforesaid between any nation, State, or free city (of the one part) whose territories, in whole or in part, on August 4, 1914, formed a portion of the territory of Germany or Austria-Hungary and the United States and/or three or more of the following-named powers: The British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan (of the other part). For the purposes of this section any citizen or subject of a State or free city which at the time of the proposed return of money or other property of such citizen or subject hereunder forms a part of the territory of any one of the following nations: Germany, Austria, or Hungary, shall be deemed to be a citizen or subject of such nation. And the receipt of the said owner or of the person by whom said money or other property was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid over to the Alien Property Custodian shall be a full acquittance and discharge of the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, and of the United States in respect to all claims of all persons heretofore or hereafter claiming any right, title, or interest in said money or other property, or compensation or damages arising from the capture of such money or other property by the President or the Alien Property Custodian: Provided further, however, That except as herein provided no such action by the President shall bar any person from the prosecution of any suit at law or in equity to establish any right, title, or interest which he may have therein.

(c) Any person whose money or other property the President is authorized to return under the provisions of subsection (b) hereof may file notice of claim for the return of such money or other property, as provided in subsection (a) hereof, and thereafter may make application to the President for allowance of such claim and/or may institute suit in equity to recover such money or other property, as provided in said subsection, and with like effect. The President or the court, as the case may be, may make the same determinations with respect to citizenship and other relevant facts that the President is authorized to make under the provisions of subsection (b) hereof.

(d) Whenever a person, deceased, would have been entitled, if living, to the return of his money or other property hereunder, then his legal representative may proceed for the return of such money or other property as provided in subsection (a) hereof: Provided, however, That the President or the court, as the case may be, before granting such relief shall impose such conditions by way of security or otherwise as the President or the court, respectively, shall deem sufficient to insure that such legal representative will redeliver to the Alien Property Custodian such portion of the money or other property so received by him as shall be distributable to any person not eligible as a claimant under subsections (a) or (c) hereof.

(e) No money or other property shall be returned nor any debt allowed under this section to any person who is a citizen or subject of any nation which was associated with the United States in the prosecution of the war, unless such nation in like case extends reciprocal rights to citizens of the United States; nor in any event shall a debt be allowed under this section unless it was owing to and owned by the claimant prior to October 6, 1917, and as to claimants other than citizens of the United States unless it arose with reference to the money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian or Treasurer of the United States hereunder.

(f) Except as herein provided, the money or other property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian shall not be liable to lien, attachment, garnishment, trustee process, or execution, or subject to any order or decree of any court.

(g) The legal representative (duly appointed by a court in the United States) of a person, deceased, whose money or other property has been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him hereunder and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, may (if not entitled to proceed under subsection (d) of this section) proceed under subsection (a) for the recovery of any interest, right, or title in any such money or other property which has, by reason of the death of such person, become the interest, right, or title of a citizen of the United States, unless such citizenship was acquired through naturalization proceedings in which the declaration of intention was filed after November 11, 1918. Such legal representative shall give a bond, in a penal sum and with sureties satisfactory to the President or the court, as the case may be, conditioned that he will redeliver to the Alien Property Custodian all such money or other property not distributed to such citizen, or, if deceased, to his heirs or legal representatives.

(h) The aggregate value of the money or other property returned under paragraphs (9) and (10) of subsection (b) to any one person, irrespective of the number of trusts involved, shall in no case exceed $10,000.

(i) For the purposes of paragraphs (9) and (10) of subsection (b) of this section accumulated net income, dividends, interest, annuities, and other earnings, shall be considered as part of the principal.

(j) Subsection (g) and paragraphs (9) and (10) of subsection (b) of this section shall not apply to any patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto, conveyed, transferred, assigned, or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, or to the proceeds received from the sale, license, or other disposition of any such patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto; but the Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to return to the person entitled thereto, whether or not an enemy or ally of enemy and regardless of the value, any patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto, which has been conveyed, transferred, assigned, or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, and which (1) has not been sold, licensed, or otherwise disposed of under the provisions of this act, and (2) is not involved (at the time this subsection takes effect) in litigation in which the United States, or any agency thereof, is a party.

(k) This section shall not apply, however, to money paid to the Alien Property Custodian under section 10 hereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that this section, if the committee now rises, is subject to amendment?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The section will be pending when the bill is again taken up. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14222) to amend the trading with the enemy act, had come to no resolution thereon.

REFERENCE OF THE BILL S. 3968—OIL POLLUTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill S. 3968, No. 284 on the House Calendar, be rereferred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the bill S. 3968 be rereferred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3968) to improve the navigability of the waters of the United States by preventing oil pollution thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, is this by the request of the committee?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand this bill has been reported from the committee and is now on the calendar.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the purpose of it is this: This bill deals with all the navigable waters of the United States, and the committee has decided to recall this bill and deal only with salt water at the seashore.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not the intention of the committee to load it down with numerous amendments, as was done by the Naval Committee on a bill relating to one subject, so as to make it a vehicle of omnibus legislation?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. It will be rereferred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] may extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 11903.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the members of the House Committee on Military Affairs began their studies of the Muscle Shoals problem early in February of last year. The Secretary of War's report transmitting the offer of Henry Ford was the first document received. This was dated February 1, 1922, and on February 8 the committee had its first meeting. In all there were five proposals before the committee. Four of these received detailed consideration.

PURPOSES OF CONGRESS IN BUILDING NITRATE PLANTS.

The purposes of Congress in providing for the construction of nitrate plants was clearly expressed in section 124 of the national defense act in these words:

The President of the United States is * * * further authorized to construct, maintain, and operate, at or on any site or sites so designated, dams, locks, improvements to navigation, power houses, and other plants and equipment or other means than water power as in his judgment is the best and cheapest, necessary, or convenient for the generation of electrical or other power, and for the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products. (Public, No. 85, 64th Cong.)

There were, therefore, two principal reasons for the establishment of the nitrate plants.

First. The need for an adequate supply of nitrates for explosives for the national defense.

Second. A sufficient supply of nitrogen for use in fertilizers for the benefit of American agriculture.

Senator NORRIS well expressed these purposes of Congress when he said:

We have just two objects in view. One is to get cheap fertilizers and the other is to be prepared to make explosives in time of war. (B. p. 278.)

Replying to Senator NORRIS, Mr. W. B. Mayo, chief engineer for Mr. Ford, said:

Yes, sir. That plan is what he (Mr. Ford) has tried to carry out in this offer. (B. p. 278.)

As a committee we agreed with Senator NORRIS that these were the reasons why these plants should be built, and we agreed with him that these plants should be operated. We merely disagreed as to how this should be done.

THE MILITARY VALUE OF THE NITRATE PLANT.

Mr. Speaker, our committee was unanimous in the opinion that it is no less important to-day than it was in 1916, when the national defense act was passed, that this country should keep up with world progress in the art of securing nitrogen for explosives from the atmosphere. During the war the United States was the one great Nation which depended wholly upon Chile for its nitrates. What was the result? At a time when the need for ships was vital we used German vessels and took over Dutch steamers, and by means of these and chartered Scandinavian and Japanese tonnage we built up a transport fleet which, on November 1, 1918, totaled 327 ships, comprising some 3,400,000 tons.

As a result of our policy of depending upon Chile for nitrates, however, we found it necessary to divert 128 of these vessels, aggregating 700,000 tons, or nearly 20 per cent of our fleet, for the sole purpose of bringing this one material, nitrate of soda, from Chile.

Testifying before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Maj. J. H. Burns, the former chief of the Nitrate Division, stated:

As an indication of the importance of this plant (nitrate plant No. 2) from a military standpoint, it will fix enough nitrogen to supply constantly some 12 divisions fighting in accordance with the organization in existence at the time of the armistice. When our Army was engaged in the Meuse-Argonne offensive the maximum number of divisions available in the American Army was 30. So No. 2 plant would have been capable of fixing over one-third of the nitrogen required by a force equal to the maximum military effort that America was able to put forth in the World War. (B. p. 60.)

The value of such a plant to this Nation in time of war was well described by Senator NORRIS in the following language:

It would have been a wonderful thing. It is almost impossible to estimate, without drawing on the imagination, just what that would have meant in this war, because I understand the Allies were right to the verge on munitions. They didn't have a 30 days' supply, and 30 days' continuous war would have taken everything they had and left them without ammunition. It was really that desperate condition that induced the Government to go into this. I am told, too, that one of the reasons the expenses are so great is that they worked 24 hours a day at times, three shifts, in order to hurry it and get it ready. (B. p. 304.)

THE AGRICULTURAL NEED FOR THE NITRATE PLANT.

As to the need for fertilizers it is a well-known fact that statistics show that in our agricultural yields per acre the United States of America, far from being a leader among the nations, is trailing along with such backward countries as Austria and European Russia. Yet this production, small as it is, is being maintained by taking from American soil millions upon millions of tons of those three plant foods of which our supply is most limited—nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and potash. It is this mining of the soil, so destructive to American agriculture, that has brought about a decrease averaging 30 per cent in the acreage of farm lands under cultivation in the New England States during the past 40 years. This process of shipping away the fertility of the soil, which has resulted in the abandoning of 70 per cent of the farm lands in such a thrifty State as New Hampshire, is now going on in the Middle West. The question of a sufficient supply of fertilizer at low cost is no longer a question only for the East and South, but is a matter of national concern.

There is a third and also a fourth benefit of great importance which follow directly from this enterprise.

THE VALUE OF THE POWER DEVELOPMENT.

While the testimony shows that Mr. Ford expects to use the Muscle Shoals power for fertilizer production and for manufacturing purposes, in the evident belief that this power can be made of greater general service by distributing it in the form of cheapened fertilizer and other products at reduced cost, in accordance with his well-known policies, rather than by distributing it on a copper wire, there is, however, a public-utility advantage in the Ford offer.

This third benefit is the Ford amortization plan which ultimately eliminates 80 per cent of the cost of hydroelectric power by setting up a sinking fund which refunds the original investment and thereby eliminates the interest which constitutes this 80 per cent of the cost of the power.

When it is remembered that it has been estimated by the United States Geological Survey that more than 200,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric equipment can be profitably installed in the United States it is evident that a policy under which this vast undeveloped water power can be made as cheap in the United States as it is in such favored countries as Norway and Canada is a great step forward in hydroelectric-power economics. This principle when applied generally to the development of hydroelectric power in the United States ultimately means cheap power to reduce the labor of the farmer and of the farmer's wife; it means cheap power for manufacturers and for the economical production of a long list of electrochemical and electrometallurgical products which are absolute necessities in time of war and are the basis of our industrial leadership among the nations in time of peace.

THE VALUE TO NAVIGATION.

The fourth benefit is the improvement of the navigation on the Tennessee River, which with modern steel barges and towboats and with the modern terminal and transfer equipment that is being installed on our inland streams will undoubtedly result in a large water-borne traffic.

Millions of tons of coal lie adjacent to the Tennessee River and its tributaries above Muscle Shoals. Millions of tons of phosphate rock are within reach of certain of these tributaries. Raw materials for scores of industrial processes lie dormant in the upper valley awaiting only the cheap transportation of the Tennessee River to make them available to the great markets of the Mississippi Valley.

This result, however much to be desired, can not come about until there is a permanent 6-foot channel between the upper Tennessee River Valley and the Ohio River. Such a channel has never been practicable because of its enormous cost at Muscle Shoals, where both Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3 are necessary for an adequate improvement. With the acceptance of the Ford offer this heretofore insurmountable obstacle is wiped out, and the revival of modern inland waterway transportation will be afforded an opportunity to extend its benefits 400 miles up the Tennessee River into this comparatively undeveloped region.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF THE SUCCESSFUL BID.

With these questions in mind, the committee felt that there were certain requirements which should be met by the successful bidder.

First, the nitrate plant must be maintained ready for immediate use in time of war. No offer which failed to do that could reasonably be approved by the committee. The committee also felt that it would be an immense advantage if some provision should be made whereby the country would be assured that this great nitrate plant would not only be maintained but would be remodeled from time to time and kept in modernized, up-to-date condition, for it requires no great study of history to appreciate the fact that victorious armies in modern warfare are not the armies which employ obsolete guns or obsolete plants to make their munitions.

Since it is undoubtedly true that the controlling reason for the location of the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals was an economic one and had to do with the cost of production, it was evident that one of the ruling considerations was the great possibility of fertilizer manufacture at this plant in time of peace, in accordance with the expression of Congress which I have quoted.

The committee felt, therefore, that any offer was fatally defective which did not provide a sound, businesslike guaranty that these possibilities would be worked out—not at the expense of the United States Government on a cost-plus basis but at the expense of the bidder.

In the matter of the water-power lease the committee did not feel that the United States Government should undertake to make money out of this power project at the expense of the consumer, but that this power should be developed as cheaply as possible and its benefits made available to the largest possible number of people.

All of us realized that any arbitrary charges which would become a part of the cost of the power production would merely be passed on to the consumer, no matter whether the power was used for fertilizer manufacture or distributed by a public utility or used in any form of manufacture. Such arbitrary charges are merely a form of taxation. We did not seek to tax the people of Alabama and Tennessee, but merely to obtain a fair return on the investment and at the same time passing on the benefits of this cheap power over the greatest possible area. We did not feel that this was necessarily accomplished by transmitting this power over a wire. On the contrary, it was generally appreciated that if this cheap power could be utilized for a large-scale production of cheap fertilizers in concentrated form that would stand a long haul by water or rail this was the way to make these benefits available to the greatest number of people.

NO PROSPECT OF FERTILIZER IN PARSONS'S PROPOSAL.

The offer of Charles L. Parsons was a proposal to purchase nitrate plant No. 1 for $600,000 and lease the carbide and liquid air portions of nitrate plant No. 2 for $50,000 per annum and to purchase the Waco quarry complete for $200,000 or lease the same for $20,000 per annum. Mr. Parsons made no promise that he would produce any fertilizer. Furthermore, he offered no definite financial responsibility, while the testimony is that nitrate plant No. 1 was not a success (Maj. J. H. Burns, Chief of the Nitrate Division, Ordnance Office, War Department, before House Committee on Military Affairs February 13, 1922, p. 208), and it had been estimated that an investment of some $4,000,000 would be required to remodel the plant in order to make its operation possible (Major Burns before Senate Committee on Agriculture, April 12, 1922, hearings, p. 59). There was not even a statement in his offer that commercial fertilizers would be produced by Mr. Parsons or his company at all, Mr. Speaker, and the conviction was general in the committee that a mere offer to operate nitrate plant No. 1 as an air nitrogen fixation plant did not constitute a solution of the Muscle Shoals problem, for fixed nitrogen has many industrial uses wholly apart from its use in fertilizers. Since, at most, nitrate plant No. 1 was merely an experimental plant, with a capacity of only 9,000 tons of fixed nitrogen annually, the committee felt, Mr. Speaker, that the prospects for securing any reasonable fertilizer tonnage under the Parsons offer were very remote.

ENGSTRUM OFFER A COST-PLUS PROPOSAL.

We had an offer from Frederick E. Engstrum to construct the dams and to rebuild the nitrate plants on a cost-plus basis. He also agreed to operate nitrate plants "to the extent permitted by the proceeds of the sale of fertilizers."

The ones who made that offer did not intend to put in one dollar of their own money. They wanted to go into a partnership with us. They were willing to sell the electric power for us and to take their share of the profits. They were willing to manufacture fertilizer—at the expense of Uncle Sam! If any money was made, they took their share of the proceeds; if any loss resulted, they shared none of the losses. Uncle Sam shouldered it all. It was a case of "Heads I win, tails you lose."

These gentlemen were not even willing to add the proceeds from the sale of electrical power to the proceeds from the sale of fertilizer and then deduct the combined cost of producing power and fertilizer. They were very sure that there would be a profit made on the sale of power and a loss on the sale of fertilizer, and being very cautious gentlemen they were taking no chances.

Of course, the committee could not take such a proposal seriously. To read some of the newspaper accounts, however, one would imagine that this was an offer that meant the investment of real money for the operation of the nitrate plants by private capital; so it was; but it was Government money.

They did not guarantee to manufacture a single pound of fertilizer, nor did they guarantee to keep the nitrate plant No. 2 in a going condition for any length of time, to say nothing of 100 years.

Under this proposal, not only was there no guaranty of fertilizer production, but there was not even a good business prospect that any considerable amount of fertilizer would be produced. The committee felt that the Government had had ample experience with this class of contracts during the war and quickly consigned it to the wastebasket.

ALABAMA POWER CO. SOUGHT TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF GOVERNMENT.

Our experience with the Alabama Power Co. in connection with the Warrior steam plant shows that we would be wise in having no further business dealings with them.

In brief, they had a cost-plus contract with the United States. They had not one dollar invested. The United States—I came near saying their own country; I had forgotten their foreign stockholders—made an investment of $4,979,782.33 on their property. They acted as agents for their own country—I mean the United States. Their representatives inveigled or outmaneuvered, or something else, the ones who were supposed to be looking after our interests and got them into a contract by which we could sell to no one but them. On their part, however, they did not have to buy at our price but could ask for arbitration, they to select one man, we to select one, and the third to be selected by these two.

If two of the arbitrators were to agree on a fair price, their decision was not binding on the Alabama Power Co.; and in case they did not accept the decision of the arbitrators—and I want you to pay special attention to this—if they did not agree to accept the arbitration figures we would have six months in which to dismantle and remove our property from their land—property in which we had invested nearly $5,000,000.

THE OPINION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The committee found that the Alabama Power Co.'s methods had been well described by the Attorney General when he reported that—

> No one can carefully analyze the long and rather complex contract made with this company without being impressed with the harsh and even drastic provisions which it imposes on the Government. When its intricate provisions are closely scrutinized and their full significance realized it becomes at once apparent that the company lost no opportunity of turning to its own advantage every possible change of circumstances.

This policy appears to have been adopted by the Alabama Power Co. throughout the whole course of its negotiations with the Government, Mr. Speaker. When called upon by General Beach to submit an offer for the Muscle Shoals project the company evaded a definite reply by saying that they were "about to construct an important additional hydroelectric development on the Coosa River"; and that "while it is true that the power thus secured will be completely absorbed and new sources required by the time the Muscle Shoals Dam could be completed," nevertheless "this company would scarcely be justified in depending upon Muscle Shoals to take care of even more remote demands." (Hearings before House Committee on Military Affairs, pp, 791, 792.)

POWER COMPANY DECLINED TO COMMIT THEMSELVES.

General Beach again brought the matter to their attention June 18, 1921, in a letter asking—

> What power the Alabama Power Co. would desire or be willing to take from Muscle Shoals two years from this date, and also three years from this date, if one year's advance notice of actual date at which power could be delivered could be given and a satisfactory price is guaranteed.

The company merely referred to their former letter, explaining that they were about to develop 120,000 horsepower on the Coosa River "because it did not seem at all possible that the Muscle Shoals hydro development could produce any power during 1923 or 1924," and the company stated:

> We must make our plans for several years in advance of actual power needs, and longer notice than one year in advance of actual date at which the Muscle Shoals power could be delivered would be necessary for this company to commit itself for the taking of definite amounts of power.

So, Mr. Speaker, this company was entirely willing for the United States Government to go ahead and construct the great power dam in their distributing territory because they well knew that there was no prospect of a market for any such amount of power, and they did not propose to relieve the predicament of the Government in any degree by committing themselves to purchase any portion of the power which the Government would find on its hands when the dam was completed.

POWER COMPANY MAKES OFFER TWO WEEKS AFTER FORD'S OFFER GOES TO CONGRESS.

When Mr. Ford made his offer for the Muscle Shoals project it was to the Alabama Power Co. like a bolt from the blue.

They instantly recognized that here was prospective real competition—competition which might result disastrously to their virtually complete monopoly of electrical-power business in the State of Alabama.

It seemed evident that an effective way to checkmate Mr. Ford at Muscle Shoals was simply to put in a competitive offer and secure its acceptance, and so on February 15, 1922, just two weeks after the Ford offer had been transmitted to Congress, the Alabama Power Co. made their proposal to the Secretary of War.

THE ALABAMA POWER CO. OFFER RECEIVED UNDER FAVORABLE CIRCUMSTANCES.

The offer of the Alabama Power Co., coming as it did to our committee with its alleged advantages, pointed out in detail by the Secretary of War and heralded by a controlled portion of the technical press of the country as an offer far superior to that of Henry Ford, why did it not receive more favorable attention at the hands of the committee?

It is true that they offered to complete Dam No. 2 and to install in the power house about one-quarter of the full equipment at their own expense, but they offered to do this under the terms of the Federal power act, which meant that we were donating to them the $17,000,000 which we have spent on our dam, and at the end of 50 years we would find that if we wanted to get our dam back from the Alabama Power Co. we would have to pay for it out of the Federal Treasury, and no provision for an amortization fund was made by the Alabama Power Co. to provide us with means for buying back this property. Their offer meant, so far as the dam was concerned, that we solved the power problem at Muscle Shoals by giving our dam away. And as for their offer to purchase the steam power plant at Muscle Shoals, it was pointed out (House hearings, p. 632) that their apparent offer of $5,000,000 had a "joker" attached which reduced the real amount offered to one-tenth of that amount, or $500,000.

FERTILIZER PROVISIONS OF POWER COMPANY OFFER WERE CHEAP SKULLDUGGERY.

As for the operation of the nitrate plant for the production of fertilizer, the Alabama Power Co., with their characteristic legal shrewdness, carefully kept clear from this obligation. Did they propose to undertake the risk and expense that must be undertaken if the farmers are to be provided with cheaper fertilizer from the Muscle Shoals plant? You may depend upon it, Mr. Speaker, they did not. On the contrary they proposed no arrangement or plan for operating the nitrate plant, and their president who appeared before our committee flatly declined to get under this burden. (House hearings, p. 813.)

It is true that they proposed to donate 100,000 secondary horsepower to the Government to be used for the operation of nitrate plant No. 2 if the Government could find anyone who would undertake to use it for that purpose. But, Mr. Speaker, I have been in Congress for eight years; I have seen some pretty cheap skullduggery at times, but never in my experience have I seen a cheaper or more disgusting attempt to fool the public, and particularly the farmers, than this brazen provision in the offer of the Alabama Power Co.

What is secondary power? Why, Mr. Speaker, it is simply that part of the power that is furnished by the occasional high-water periods scattered through the year. It is power that is irregular and so unreliable that even when it is available for a total of as much as 10 months out of the year it has little or no commercial value, according to the joint statement of the four great southeastern power companies in their letter to the Chief of Engineers. (House hearings, p. 118.)

DONATION OF POWER A MERE GESTURE.

Even if the great plant could be run on such an irregular power supply, the donation of this power is a mere gesture on the part of the Alabama Power Co., Mr. Speaker. This power comes from the same power house, manned by the same force, that would operate the plant for the Alabama Power Co.'s own purpose. What would be the result? Why, Mr. Speaker, the cost of this power is merely an indistinguishable part of the power company's annual operating cost. The cost of this power is completely submerged in the cost of other power produced by this company, and whatever its cost may be that cost is borne not by the Alabama Power Co. but by their customers, for it is merely a part of the general operating expenses of the company which are passed along to the consumer.

DID THE ALABAMA POWER CO. EXPECT THE NITRATE PLANT TO BE OPERATED UNDER THEIR OFFER?

Did the Alabama Power Co., or did the special interests allied with them in their fight on the Ford offer—the fertilizer combination, the packers, and the by-product coke-oven interests—did these allied schemers expect to see some one come forward with a proposal to operate this great nitrate plant on secondary power, even when they later offered to supplement it with 10 per cent of primary or continuous power? Of course, they did not, Mr. Speaker. They had no such idea, and they had no fears of the competition that might result from any such attempted operation.

But, Mr. Speaker, they knew that no offer which ignored the fertilizer possibilities at Muscle Shoals would be considered by the committee as an adequate solution of the Muscle Shoals problem, so they resorted to this cheap trick, hoping that because committees of Congress are not technical experts they, therefore, might put one over on us.

COMMITTEE NOT FOOLED.

But, Mr. Speaker, they did not fool the members of our committee. Every important provision was soon measured at its true value, and when the majority of the committee realized the responsibility that Mr. Ford squarely shouldered and which the Alabama Power Co. evaded in this plausible way, the committee set this company down as a lot of cheap tricksters, Mr. Speaker, and consigned their unworthy offer to the waste-basket along with the others.

FORD OFFER MET EVERY REQUIREMENT.

The Ford offer met all the requirements in every particular—not only met them but exceeded them. Mr. Ford agreed to maintain the nitrate plant No. 2, or its equivalent, ready for immediate use for the Government for the production of explosives for 100 years. How much would that cost? Nobody knows. Mr. Ford agreed to keep this nitrate plant up to date, for he agreed to research the most improved methods and to adopt these processes. How much would that cost? How often must nitrate plant No. 2 be rebuilt under such a guaranty? Nobody knows. Compared with such valuable obligations on the part of such a responsible party, the $5,000,000 cash payment which Mr. Ford offered became an insignificant part of the consideration.

FORD AGREED TO OPERATE PLANT TO MAKE FERTILIZERS.

The outstanding feature, however, which recommended the Ford offer was his definite obligation to operate nitrate plant No. 2, or its equivalent, as a fertilizer plant to its full capacity. What did that mean? It meant, Mr. Speaker, that he would have to produce as much nitrates at Muscle Shoals as all American farmers together had been importing from Chile in normal years before or after the Great War. It meant nitrates enough to furnish nitrogen for 2,000,000 tons of 2-8-2 commercial fertilizer, and Mr. Ford agreed to make this fertilizer in mixed or unmixed form to meet the market demand.

VOLUNTARY LIMITATION ON PROFITS.

As is well known, Mr. Ford agreed to limit his profit on fertilizer production to a maximum of 8 per cent on the "fair actual annual cost of production," and provided a board of farmers to determine what was meant by the word "fair," and to examine his books and see what this cost of production has been. No pretense of matching this feature of the offer has ever been made by any member of the opposition. The fertilizer industry does not open its books to its customers, nor does it limit its profits to 8 per cent, and no amount of abusing of the Ford offer will blind our eyes to this fact.

CYANAMID PROCESS OBSOLETE.

When it is remembered that the cyanamid process is obsolete and that this great plant must be rebuilt before it can be successfully used commercially, and when it is also remembered that the small experimental plant was a failure, there is little wonder, Mr. Speaker, that bidders for this project were few and that none of them have agreed to the terms of the Ford offer. All they can do is to stay in their glass houses and throw stones.

NO EFFECT ON FEDERAL WATER POWER ACT.

An important part of this proposal to purchase, operate, and maintain the nitrate plant is the lease of the water power. The first objection about the water-power lease that has been raised by the opposition is the length of it, but, Mr. Speaker, if it is a good thing to use this power to reduce the cost of fertilizers to the farmers of the United States for a period of 50 years, I contend it is a good thing to use it for this purpose for 100 years, and as for the calamity to the Federal water power act, which has been freely predicted if the Ford offer is accepted, I want to say that I see no connection between the two. The Federal water power act has to do with strictly power propositions, and the operation of two hydroelectric plants under the Ford offer is accompanied by such heavy obligations that this project is in a class by itself.

FORD MORE SEVERELY REGULATED THAN ANY LICENSEE.

Does the Federal water power act require licensees to manufacture 250,000 tons of nitrate of soda annually? Does it require them to maintain the greatest nitrate plant in the world in an up-to-date condition, ready for immediate use of the Government in time of war? Does it require them to limit their profit on their principal product to 8 per cent on the fair actual annual cost of production? Of course not. The Federal power act is confined to strictly water-power developments, and the acceptance of the Ford offer does not constitute a precedent which can be applied to any other water-power development, large or small, in the United States. If any other licensee is willing to undertake at his power site obligations that would be comparable with the obligations of Henry Ford at Muscle Shoals, then I want to say, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to give that licensee his license for 100 years also.

THE FINANCIAL RETURN FOR THE POWER.

Mr. Ford offers 4 per cent interest on whatever amount the Government has expended, since his offer was made, in the completion of the hydroelectric project, and provides annuities which applied to a sinking fund, as any other sinking fund is administered, according to the testimony of the Secretary of War (Hearings, p. 7) would return to the Government more than $70,000,000 if invested at only 4½ per cent, and such a fund could be administered by the Federal Reserve Board at practically no additional cost to the Government whatever. As to those who say that Mr. Ford does not pay enough because he does not begin his interest payments in full as soon as the work of construction begins, I reply, who is paying the United States interest on its construction investment now? Who will pay the United States 4 per cent interest on this water power as soon as the dams are completed?

NO BETTER OFFER WAS MADE BY ANYONE.

Mr. Speaker, this is not time for theorizing. The dam is being built and no one has offered better terms than those of the Ford proposal. If it was so wonderfully profitable a proposition, if there were the millions and billions to be made out of it which the opposition has represented could be made, then why have the American captains of industry held back? Has American enterprise become indifferent to such a marvelous opportunity? Mr. Speaker, the question carries its own answer. It is not that the American capitalists are less enterprising than they ever were, but the marvelous opportunity for piling up these millions and billions of profit from the Muscle Shoals project is simply not there.

MUSCLE SHOALS AN OPPORTUNITY TO SPEND MONEY.

Mr. Ford does not need to go to Muscle Shoals to make money. He has several excellent plants for that purpose in Detroit and vicinity. Mr. Ford knows that if he goes to Muscle Shoals he must spend money and take large risks in the hope of accomplishing a great good to agriculture, and so he reasonably has withheld any promise to return 4 per cent interest to the Government until he has had a reasonable opportunity to rebuild the nitrate plants and to provide an outlet for the power which is being developed. He offers a fair return, but he surrounds his offer with those conditions which are necessary if the project is to have a reasonable expectation of financial success, and if it is financially unsuccessful then neither Mr. Ford nor the farmers nor the Government will secure the great benefits which we all expect.

NO POWER BONANZA FOR FORD AT SHOALS.

It was shown beyond question before the committees of Congress that more than 200,000 continuous horsepower, the bulk of the useful power at Muscle Shoals, will be required in the manufacture of fertilizer. (Maj. J. H. Burns in Senate hearings, p. 929.) If Mr. Ford builds storage dams and stabilizes the irregular flow of the river so that an additional amount of power is made useful, he must do this at his own expense, and what he does with such additional power concerns him alone, and I for one have no desire to dictate. But this Congress should understand, as our committee well understood, that because 850,000 horsepower of generating equipment are installed at Muscle Shoals it does not follow that 850,000 horsepower of electrical energy will become available for Mr. Ford or anyone else. No matter how much generating machinery is installed the power developed is limited by the flow of the river, and until the flow of the Tennessee River is equalized by great storage reservoirs it will require nearly all of the useful hydroelectric power at both dams, supplemented as required by the steam power, merely to carry out the fertilizer obligations of the Ford offer. The record on this point is clear for anyone to see who will examine it for himself, and the Ford offer is not a hard bargain driven by a sharp trade as the opposition has maintained, but it is an offer to take an abandoned, unsuccessful, and obsolete property and to utilize in its operation the flow of a stream which is one of the most irregular in the United States.

FORD'S OFFER THE ONLY ONE WHICH PROVIDED FOR THE PURPOSES OF CONGRESS IN BUILDING THE NITRATE PLANTS.

Summing up, then, there was only one offer before our committee which met the military purposes of the nitrate plant and at the same time made provisions for its greatest possible use to agriculture. From any angle the Ford offer is not only a favorable offer for the United States but it offers far more than this Government had any reason to expect, and if we will consult our own interests at Muscle Shoals we will accept Henry Ford's proposal without further delay.

S. 4280—RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may have leave until midnight to file their report on the bill (S. 4280) relating to rural credits.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am not advised; does the gentleman know whether there are any minority views?

Mr. MONDELL. I understand not, but the ranking minority member suggested that I submit this request.

Mr. WINSLOW. I should like to ask what is the subject matter of that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Rural credits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHINESE EASTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article on the history and present condition of the Chinese Eastern Railway by Carl J. Mayer, our trade commissioner over there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

[Special Report No. 36.]

HARBIN, MANCHURIA, December 3, 1922.

THE CHINESE EASTERN RAILWAY.

(Trade Commissioner C. J. Mayer.)

A favorable condition is observable in the maintenance, operation, and finances of the Chinese Eastern Railway for the period beginning early in 1921 up to the present time, as compared with 1914. The road is still in process of struggle against the dire effects of the Great War and the Russian revolution, but it must be recognized that it is finally commencing to disentangle itself from its position of severe and prolonged paroxysm.

Owing to the Great War and the revolution in Russia the Chinese Eastern Railway, which up to that time served as an artery connecting Russia with the Pacific Ocean, particularly from the military viewpoint, lost all Russian transit freight. In order to subsist it was forced to rely almost entirely on the transport of Manchurian grain. The railway before the Russian revolution was under State jurisdiction, State subsidy, and served State ends. After the revolution it was confronted with the necessity of solving the problems of management in accordance with new economic and social conditions.

The general economic policy of the Chinese Eastern Railway since 1921 has undergone radical change. It is the purpose of this report to present this policy as clearly as possible, the apparent reasons for its being, and its probable trend as it may affect future economic development in eastern Siberia.

THE RAILWAY BEFORE THE WAR.

The underlying motive for the building of the Chinese Eastern Railway was to tie the Ussuri Railway with the Trans-Siberian Railway and its Trans-Baikal branch for strategic purposes. Commercially it was designed to be common carrier of transit freight and of exports of Russian manufactures and raw materials to Manchuria and other countries. Transportation for products of Russian origin was made cheap on the railway, so that they could compete in the Manchurian market, while tariff barriers were erected for competing foreign commodities.

It was considered by the Czar régime that the Chinese Eastern Railway should, in the first instance, serve the general political and economic aim of the Russian Empire and that all other considerations should be made subservient to this end. There were introduced as a consequence special reduced rates on the railway giving preference to Russian commodities. These rates brought losses to the railway, and in itself it never balanced income with expenditure. Under the old Russian Government the railroad depended on subsidy, and from the commercial standpoint was not a paying proposition.

The traffic of the road practically from its beginning took the form of export as the most important factor, increasing from 1906 to 1913 by 11 times. In 1906 the export traffic of the railway was 12.8 per cent of the total traffic, and in 1913, 47.6 per cent. The principal route of this traffic was via the Ussuri Railway to Vladivostok, while the export via the South Manchuria Railway to Dairen had not yet become an important factor in the operations of the road.

Maintenance of way, rolling stock, and all accouterments of the road were before the war kept up in good fashion, though at expenditure out of proportion to revenue, for the reasons above outlined.

DURING THE CRISIS.

When the anti-Bolshevist forces were warring in Siberia, in 1919–20, against the Bolshevists, a great burden fell upon the Chinese Eastern Railway. It was expected that by the utilization of the road anti-Bolshevist success in Siberia would result, and there was built in the railway zone a Russian State in which military staffs and troops were prepared to fight the anti-Bolshevist cause. The then railway administration inaugurated at Harbin several State institutions of military and civil character and included some of them into the management scheme of the railway.

When the hopes of the anti-Bolshevists were blasted with the fall of Omsk, when the Russian ruble fell so disastrously in 1920, and the world witnessed a general economic depression, a period of disorganization, disuse, and neglect set in for the Chinese Eastern Railway. Freight traffic almost completely collapsed. Communication with the Japanese and Chinese railways had been discontinued, and communication westward from Manchuli ceased entirely, the then administration believing also that resumption of this traffic from Manchuli would be politically dangerous. Freight traffic to Vladivostok declined heavily. In the meantime the Chinese cart traffic along the railway increased by leaps and bounds, so much so that in 1920 it reached the startling figure of 62,000,000 poods, more than 50 per cent of the total grain export of the territory.

The coffers of the railway were empty. Although high freight rates were in force, no profits were derived, because collections could be made only in depreciated paper currency, and traffic was at a very low ebb. Prices for fuel rose to such outrageous figures as 60 gold rubles for 1 square sajen of firewood and 24 gold kopecks per pood for coal. The indebtedness of the road to fuel contractors reached 20,000,000 gold rubles. Exchange operations on rates of paper money caused speculation by commission agents of the railway, to its great detriment. Corruptive practices by officials of the railway were common. The indebtedness of the road to the interallied technical board and purchasing committee reached several million dollars. Indebtedness to employees became a chronic disease. An enormous staff of employees and workmen, causing terrific overhead, was on the pay roll of the road. This personnel, too, apparently became demoralized and lost its balance as to its duties and responsibilities. The railway was lacking a controlling hand and every department attempted to regulate its affairs, without any basic plan or estimate, as it deemed best.

Technical decay also set in. The conditions of track, rolling stock, and general operation became deplorable. Material management of the track was subject to many abuses, owing to lack of supervision. Hauling of trains was subject to irregular distribution of locomotives, which caused waste of power, and to technical defects in rolling stock owing to neglect. The destruction of the property of the railroad amounted to many thousands of dollars.

THE NEW MANAGEMENT.

After the overturn in Russia China was desirous of fortifying her rights to the Chinese Eastern Railway. The Russo-Asiatic Bank, because of its formal rights to the railroad, raised a protesting voice, which resulted in the signing of an agreement between representatives of the bank and the Chinese Government on October 2, 1920, whereby the legal authority over the railway was acknowledged to belong to a board of directors consisting of equal representation by Chinese and Russian members. It was decided that the railway immediately needed a strong controlling force to pull it out of its plight. This decision resulted in the assumption in February, 1921, of the general managership of the road by B. V. Ostroumoff, an energetic and prominent Russian railroad engineer.

As the Great War served to connect north Manchuria with the world market when prices on this market fell at the end of 1920 the effect was acutely felt by the country, especially since it had lost virtually all connection with Russia's markets. Trade and industry came to a standstill. Prices on commodities for export in Manchuria fell to such a degree that the Chinese Eastern Railway was a heavy loser. The rates charged for the transportation of this export lost all proportion to the prices prevailing on foreign markets. In the meantime the railroad was also confronted with the task of combating Chinese cart traffic, which had suddenly sprung up to pretentious proportions. The cart system was handling both export and import.

In 1913, 15,000,000 poods of export grain were handled by this traffic via Chang-Chung. In 1917 it increased to 25,000,000 poods and in 1919 to 50,000,000 poods. When the figure reached 62,000,000 poods in 1920, it was considered by the management of the railway that unless steps were taken to combat the situation the railway would be doomed to serve merely as an auxiliary to the cartage system, and a revision of tariffs was considered the paramount problem.

The tariffs of the railway up to this time were based mainly on those established in 1908, which were doubled in 1920, owing to increased cost of operation. Up to December of that year Russian paper rubles were accepted in payment of freights, and the increase in tariffs met with little objection until the acceptance of these paper rubles was discontinued after December 4, 1920. The traffic of the railway then experienced its slump. This was during the season when shipments invariably are the heaviest of the year. The transportation of grain on the railway almost ceased, while transportation by carts increased to the high figure above mentioned.

The first revision of tariffs on the railway went into effect in March, 1921, under the new management, with a view to attracting traffic. This move resulted in a remarkable increase in traffic. In February, 1921, the traffic was 5,000,000 poods; in March, 11,200,000 poods; in June, 15,900,000 poods; and in December, in the height of the grain-shipping season, 17,500,000 poods, a figure greatly in excess of any previous monthly traffic record in the history of the railroad. The competing cart traffic was enormously lowered.

With the gradual revision of the rates on all principal classes of commodities the railway took a new lease on life. It transported in 1921, 126,149,527 poods of freight. This figure, in view of the fact, also, that the Russian market was cut off, breaks all previous records on the railroad. The income of the road amounted to 39,785,677 gold rubles in 1921, as compared with 33,302,494 gold rubles estimated revenue for the year. In the meantime the cart system handled about 5,000,000 poods of cereals, as against 30,000,000 for the corresponding period of the year previous. Exports increased by 49½ per cent and imports by 29 per cent over the preceding year, while for certain classes of commodities, such as beans, the increase in comparison to the previous year ran as high as 145 per cent. Exports to Vladivostok were 3,175,460 poods in 1920, and increased to 23,403,418 poods in 1921, while in the next half year of 1922 the figure had already reached 20,000,000 poods.

At the same time the policy of reducing the tariffs was inaugurated a program of economic reconstruction of the railway was put into force. The main features of this program included reducing expenditure by the gradual discharge of superfluous employees and the instilling of esprit de corps into the employees remaining. The deteriorated condition of the railway made it imperative to make certain capital expenditures in improvement of rolling stock and way in order to properly handle the increase of traffic. Such improvements were calculated to permanently enhance the valuation of the property.

Comparison of 1921 figures as to the financial condition of the road should be with 1914, the nearest normal pre-war year. At that time the railway had no burden of military and political events. Comparison with 1920 is also not feasible in order to obtain a correct idea of the financial condition of the road at the end of 1921, for the reason that it was operative in 1920 under paper currency and since 1921 under gold currency.

In comparison to 1914 the gross income of the railway is officially given out as increased by 76 per cent and the expenditures as increased by 120 per cent. This great discrepancy between increased revenue and expenditure is due to the enormous undertakings incident to the reconstruction of the road. The cost of fuel, one of the big items of expense in the maintenance of the road, for instance, while having been greatly reduced from the figures of 1920, in 1921 was 29.44 gold rubles per 1 cubic sajen, as compared with 13 to 14 gold rubles in 1914, and from 10 to 17 kopecks for one pood of coal, as compared with 3½ kopecks in 1914. High wages incommensurate with the productiveness of labor were also a burden on the finances of the road in 1921 as compared with 1914. It was not until 1922 that the new management succeeded in scaling wages in accordance with production.

While showing a deficit, the analysis also shows that the reforms instituted on the Chinese Eastern Railway were calculated to demonstrate and vindicate themselves not immediately, but after an extended period of time. All indications point to such vindication within a comparatively short period from the present. The analysis shows as well that notwithstanding enormous handicap the new management succeeded in increasing the net income of the railway to the level of pre-war time. It placed the traffic operation of the road, which is the backbone of the railroad business, not only in an immeasurably improved condition, but also on a good foundation for the future.

THE PRESENT ECONOMIC POLICY.

The tariff measures taken by the administration of the Chinese Eastern Railway in the beginning of 1921 were calculated to cope with an immediate problem, but these measures were, of course, subject to change, in accordance with a general basic tariff policy to be worked out later.

The first step of the railway management toward the creation of such a general tariff policy was to organize the economic bureau. The essential task of this bureau was to study economic conditions and to make available facts and figures regarding this condition. The economic bureau reported the fundamental fact that North Manchuria produces annually 660,000,000 poods of raw materials, 220,000,000 poods of which constitutes a surplus. It was, therefore, deemed that the tariff policy of the road should be based around the idea that the railway should attract all the surplus production of North Manchuria. Summed up, the following general policy was evolved, which, as will be explained later on in this report, has been subject to serious change, owing to political developments in the maritime Province of Siberia near the close of 1922: (a) To combat the competition of cart transportation; (b) to support and foster local industries; (c) to construct grain elevators; (d) to organize facilities for the pooling of grain, beans, and bean oil; (e) to foster imports through Vladivostok by means of liberal rates on imports; (f) to increase exports via Vladivostok.

The railway by virtue of an agreement entered into with the South Manchuria Railway regarding freight rates began to find itself in a peculiarly unfavorable position. At the 1921 conference between representatives of the South Manchuria Railway and the Chinese Eastern Railway the latter road obtained such beneficial terms that the former intended to cancel the agreement before its expiration. Owing to this agreement the South Manchuria Railway was obliged to make a reduction for the period November 1, 1921, to May, 1922, of 34 per cent on the usual rates for grain coming from stations of the Chinese Eastern Railway to Yaomin. While there was, therefore, a reduction of rates in the through traffic, the rates on the local traffic of the South Manchuria Railway remained unchanged. This caused the transportation of grain by carts to Chang-Chung and other neighboring stations of the South Manchuria Railway to be fruitless. The agreement on account of its apparent one-sidedness was canceled upon its expiration.

The representatives of the South Manchuria Railway declared at the conference held in Chang-Chung in June, 1922, with representatives of the Chinese Eastern Railway that all special reduced rates on through traffic of the Chinese Eastern Railway could no longer be granted, and terms were agreed upon by which it was calculated rates would be equalized on the Chinese Eastern Railway in both directions of the line, namely, to Dairen in the southern and to Vladivostok in the eastern.

In a report dated September 4, 1922, to the board of directors of the Chinese Eastern Railway, B. V. Ostroumoff, the general manager, confidentially stated as follows regarding the new agreement concluded with the South Manchuria Railway in June, 1922:

"In the years 1918–1920, a period of downfall, when the railway was unable to transport the total amount of freight and congestion of traffic was a frequent occurrence, the transport of freight by carts was carried on in the shortest directions up to the point from whence further transport was easy for purposes of export, namely, to Chang-Chung.

"The traffic by cartage withdrew from the railway more than half its grain freight, this amount during the season of 1920 being 62,000,000 poods.

"The railway itself in transporting as well as it could manage the remaining 44 per cent of the grain freights likewise directed the freights along the southern line as the shortest and most available one in point of service.

"The railway did not start immediate transport of freights and, disregarding the terms of the season for transportation, continued the same work during the years 1920 and 1921.

"Owing to the inadequacy of the facilities of the railway, to the lack of shipping facilities, transport in the direction of Vladivostok, notwithstanding the favorable correlation of the tariff rates, which during all these years of the downfall of the activity of the railway, including the year 1920, was two and one-half times cheaper by pood-verst in the Vladivostok direction than in the southern direction, fell to the amount of 3,000,000 poods.

"Thus, the transport service of the western line, up to the time of my taking up the management of the railway, was as regards passenger and freight traffic less than 10 cars per day. During the whole month of December, 1920, there were transported in the Vladivostok direction 30 cars, and during the month of January, 1921, 19 cars.

"Two problems lay before me from a commercial point of view, as well as from consideration of the technical and economic aspect. These were: (1) To regain to the railway the maximum of freight traffic; (2) to reestablish activity on all the branch lines of the railway, both on the eastern and southern lines, and lastly on the western line.

"These problems were, and always are, uppermost in my general plan of all measures to be taken for the betterment of the railway, and I submit them among other questions to the enlightened attention and for the decision of the board of directors.

"Further development of these problems would be: Contending against transportation by carts; reestablishing railway traffic to Vladivostok; developing communication with the West and undertaking all measures for the establishment of transport facilities to the profit of trade and industry.

"So as to facilitate the work of the railway all appertaining lines should develop transportation activity to the highest point, and in accordance with their possibilities take up the freights of the Chinese Eastern Railway.

"When, during last year, it was found that, thanks to those tariff rates which were then established and to different technical and economic measures undertaken by the railway, freights were again regained to the line in all directions, I took care that all the lines should be prepared for the needs of transportation service during the winter season of 1921–22, so that freights could be accepted from shippers without delay.

"It was formerly supposed that during the first year it would be possible to transport to Vladivostok 12,000,000 poods. But, as a matter of fact, the reinforced activity of the railway in the Vladivostok direction, the perfected conditions at Egersheld, the cheaper tariff for reshipment at that port, the advertising of all advantages of the railway resulted in that about 25,000,000 poods were transported to Vladivostok. Also, there was introduced a new way of transporting bean oil by the use of tanks.

"Along with this, the administration took care to reestablish the crossing stations which had been destroyed on the southern line owing to the Japanese war, to lay out a whole series of new railway lines at the stations of the southern line, to demand of the South Manchuria Railway that it should take over up to 700 cars of freight daily against the former amount of 100 to 170 cars. These developments made it urgent to reconstruct both the stations of Chang-Chung and Kouanchendze.

"These measures, as proved by the following transportation season, were absolutely requisite. On some days the export service demanded up to 900 cars, of which number 250 cars were directed eastward and 650 cars southward.

"The increase of freights via Vladivostok was regarded with apprehension by the neighboring railway, and all measures were taken so as to impede export via Vladivostok. In spite of this the administration of the railway contended with all the difficulties lying in its way to the purpose of achieving further development of the Vladivostok traffic.

"As matters stand at the present time, even with that additional work which has been carried out during the summer season and which is now nearing its end, the carrying capacity of the eastern section of the line is 360 to 320 cars and of the southern line 700 cars daily. Thus, the maximum carrying capacity of the railway per day is on an average 1,000 cars.

"The transport service of last year has proved the excessive tension of the work, even at the time when figures were slightly on the decrease, namely, 250 cars in the eastern direction and 650 cars southward.

"I firmly hope that the results obtained during the previous year and the additional preparation undertaken in the current year will allow us to accomplish unbroken export traffic during the winter season to the extent of 1,000 cars per day.

"If it happens that it should be necessary to transport 700 cars to Vladivostok daily and 300 cars to the south, the results would be that on the eastern line there would be a congestion of traffic amounting to 400 cars daily, while the same number of cars would remain unbenefited by the southern line. Besides this, the returns of the railway would show figures lower than those of the estimates, these being figured out quite correctly in accordance with the maximum carrying capacity of the different parts of the line.

"In order to give possibility to the eastern section of the railway to carry on work under the existing unfavorable conditions politically in Vladivostok, the Chinese Eastern Railway was forced to agree to leaving a less profitable rate for the eastern direction, which is one thirty-fifth kopeck per pood-verst against one-fifteenth kopeck on the southern line for the transportation of beans.

"In the whole range of the activity of the railway it is not only possible but it is necessary to be reconciled to the fact that the sending of each pood of freight in the eastern direction gives a net profit of 5 kopecks less as against the sendings in the southward direction.

"It is necessary to uphold the traffic to Vladivostok not only on the ground of the above-mentioned consideration and for the regularity of the service on the whole length of the line but likewise so as not to be left—with the single exit in the southern direction, via Dairen—in a state of dependence regarding the South Manchuria Railway. But to consider that the eastern direction is more important and more desirable for traffic than the southern direction would be erroneous, not only because of what has been hereinabove stated as to the through carrying capacity of the railway but also because of economic returns. Thus, when during the previous year at the sixth conference we had to stand up in defense of reestablishing traffic service in the direction of Vladivostok we were opposed to an increase of tariff rates to Vladivostok.

"But as a result of measures undertaken by us and owing to menaces on the part of the Japanese to increase, beginning from the month of April, the favorable anticart tariff of the through traffic of the Chinese Eastern-South Manchuria Railways it was found that exporters decidedly turned all shipments toward Vladivostok. At the time of the seventh Chang-Chung conference matters stood in such a state that 53 per cent of the whole amount of the export was directed to Vladivostok and only 47 per cent south.

"These facts, resulting in excessive increase of export to Vladivostok, were most disadvantageous to the railway, and the loss to the railway already amounts to about 3,000,000 rubles, with an average decrease of returns per pood-verst of from one-seventh to one twenty-first.

"For the future, if such influx of freight traffic in the Vladivostok direction continues, it is likely that we shall have a considerable deficit of returns against the total amount of earnings as per estimate and also that we shall find ourselves under the embarrassment of not being able to fulfill all export requirements, which will result in congestion of traffic and of great loss to shippers, who would in that case all make their claims.

"All this was clearly foreseen by me before the seventh Chang-Chung conference, and as I reported to the board of directors just before my departure it was absolutely necessary to put a stop to the extreme increase of the influx of freight transportation in the Vladivostok direction and also to establish normal conditions of traffic to the south. We ought really to have done this without any conference at all, so as not to diminish the returns of our budget. But the moment of the opening of the conference proved favorable to us, inasmuch as we succeeded in putting to profit this increase of tariff rates to Vladivostok by giving it out as a grant to the South Manchuria Railway at the same time conserving in force the anticart tariff No. 31, and even getting it under our own control, by which the South Manchuria Railway has paid us the cost of her participation in this arrangement.

"As the attempts to obtain decrease of influx of transportation of freights to Vladivostok had to be dealt with cautiously so as not to be in error on the reverse and to avoid weakening Vladivostok activities, it was suggested at the conference that tariff rates should be increased first from Harbin only, leaving aside the arrangements of the western line.

"When the representatives of the South Manchuria Railway insisted that this increase should also include in the arrangement the station of Anda, we refused this point, leaving ourselves free to act as would be best concerning this station.

"The two months following the close of the conference have proved that the increase of the tariff rate from Harbin is a measure still insufficient to regulate as desired the transportation traffic in all directions and that it is necessary to establish the same increase of tariff rates for the stations of the western line. The result of this measure would be that the deficit of returns of the railway in the eastern direction would be lessened and that normal percentage of exploitation in the southern direction would be reestablished.

"I consider that the necessity, the advantageousness, and the correctness of all these measures settled at the Chang-Chung conference are not to be doubted. We merely availed ourselves of an opportune moment for deciding on these arrangements which were absolutely necessary and unavoidable to introduce even without the help of the Chang-Chung conference.

"Returning to the question of the projected raising of the tariff rates in the Vladivostok direction, I must point out that the measures which are necessary to be established coincide with the insistence of the Chinese merchants of Harbin and of Fudziadzian, and that the Chinese authorities consider that these insistent requests should outweigh the remonstrances advanced by the merchants of Anda.

"I am of the opinion, therefore, that we can effect this increase by presenting it under the form of our yielding in the question in favor of the interests of such an important trading center as Harbin.

"As this arrangement coincides with the desire of the South Manchuria Railway, it would, perhaps, be better to exact a certain compensation from the South Manchuria Railway for the introduction of this measure, which compensation could be exacted on the lines of localizing transportation by carts and of contending against the turning away of the freight along the main line of the railway in favor of cartage transportation."

At the time of the seventh Chang-Chung conference close much criticism was expressed regarding the policy of the Chinese Eastern Railway toward the South Manchuria Railway. The fear was expressed that the Chinese Eastern Railway had virtually sold its birthright to Japan, and that it was the aim of Japan to gradually absorb the whole of north Manchuria by getting control of the Chinese Eastern Railway and replacing the track by its own narrow gauge. However, this criticism has since been dispelled, and it seems that the merits of the Chang-Chung agreement are being recognized. Japan evacuated her troops, and in the meantime a new element entered into the general situation when the Russian Soviet Government took over the maritime province of Siberia, which would indicate that any fears regarding Japanese aggression in north Manchuria at this time are groundless.

After the Chang-Chung conference the percentage of hauls in the eastern direction continued quite normally until September, 1922, and the succeeding months. However, it is claimed by the management of the railway that in practice the Chang-Chung agreement would have benefited Vladivostok in accordance with the plan that it assume its proportion of freight traffic in accordance with its maximum carrying capacity, had not the new political condition in Vladivostok intervened.

In order to increase freight traffic on the western line, negotiations were entered into by representatives of the Chinese Eastern Railway with those of the Chita Railway concerning through passenger and freight traffic. A number of meetings were held by the representatives of both railways, in the course of which a member of the interallied technical board played a prominent part. It was decided that the Chita Railway should send to the Chinese Eastern Railway a certain stock of freight cars, and that communication be established. The Chinese Eastern Railway would not undertake responsibility as to further passage of freight beyond the Chinese Eastern Railway zone, but proposed that the Chita Railway deposit a certain sum in metal currency in one of the foreign banks in Harbin, upon whose warrant the shipper might be able to feel assured as to the security of shipment. The agreement was closed but not ratified on the part of the Chita Railway.

After the Russian Soviet Government came into power, at the close of 1922, in the maritime province, which up to that time had been ruled by a "white" government, another serious change to hamper the economic policy of the Chinese Eastern Railway took place, the eventual outcome of which is problematical.

The Russian Soviet Government in December commandeered Egersheld, Vladivostok, which by an old imperial order was given over for the use of the Chinese Eastern Railway and used by the latter ever since. Egersheld consists of 42 warehouses and 5 piers. The capacity of the warehouses is approximately 5,500,000 poods of freight. The seizure meant that the Chinese Eastern Railway was not considered by the Soviet Government as having further authority or ownership over this section of the port of Vladivostok and that the railway would lose its revenues from that source.

Within a week from the seizure export via Vladivostok greatly fell off, Harbin exporters expressing great alarm over the new situation, and all parties interested being quite at sea as to how to cope with this seeming overt act. Although calm though would indicate that some amicable arrangement might be reached whereby the Chinese Eastern Railway and the Soviet Government could agree on continuation of through traffic, another element arises which gives doubt to such a possibility on the part of the Chinese Eastern Railway interests. This element consists in the fact that the Soviet Government of late demanded that the Chinese authorities turn over the railway to the Russian Government and made loud protestations against the present management. This was considered for the most part as a bluff until the seizure of Egersheld took place, but has assumed a more serious aspect since. It is believed certain that if the Russian Soviet Government were reasonably assured of the success of the plan, it would seize the Chinese Eastern Railway.

Thus, again, in the height of the grain-shipping season of north Manchuria, export via Vladivostok has been seriously curtailed and a new problem has confronted the railway management. The comparative progress of the Chinese Eastern Railway since 1921 is bound to suffer a serious setback unless proper measures are found to adjust the situation.

TECHNICAL CONDITION OF THE RAILWAY.

In studying the expenditure estimates and the work of the Chinese Eastern Railway in 1921, a series of productive technical improvements is noticeable, as well as a systematic reduction of expense, due to the cooperation of the inter-allied technical board and the management. Official figures show a reduction of expenses for 1921 as against 1920 by about $7,000,000, with a simultaneous increase in the operation of the road from 77,955,571 of pood-versts in 1920 to 85,244,247 of pood-versts in 1921. The staff of the railway was considerably cut down. In 1920 11,340 persons were employed by the road and in 1921 this figure was reduced by 10.78 per cent. Since 1922 the management has introduced measures to further adjust the number of employees of the road to the minimum required for its proper conduct. A close touch has been kept by the general manager of the road with its rank and file, his practice being to frequently make personal trips of inspection. Repairs of track, buildings, rolling stock, workshops, and buildings were effected to such a degree as to leave little doubt that the technical condition of the railway has been immeasurably improved.

THE TRACK.

The condition of the track and other equipment of the Chinese Eastern Railway and the shortage of funds at the disposal of the management in 1921 made it a very difficult task to properly improve the matter. It was decided that the plan for improvement of the situation should systematically cover a period of years.

In 1921, 84.29 versts of track were replaced by new rails and about 9,000 cubic feet of ballast removed. The southern line over a stretch of 110 versts was ballasted with crushed rock. Sidings were built at the Harbin terminals, wooden bridges replaced by stone, the Sungari River banks reinforced, lots raised, etc. The improvements effected on the track in 1921 permitted an increase of speed of trains, the average now being for mail and passenger trains from 65 to 70 versts per hour. In 1922 further improvements on the track made a decided change. Drainage was laid underneath all junctions, the ballasting with crushed rock of the southern line, and the ballasting of a great portion of the main line having also been completed.

BUILDINGS.

A similar program for the improvement of the buildings of the railway was put in force in 1921. It was deemed that to begin with preference should be given to repair of buildings having service importance and destined for public use. Passenger waiting rooms, premises for officials on duty, schools, clubs, roundhouses, as well as dwellings of employees were repaired. The management also revised the dwelling-allotment system so that the number of homeless employees of the road was decreased by almost 50 per cent and the evils of favoritism eliminated. This work was further extended in 1922.

FREIGHT AND PASSENGER SERVICE.

With regard to passenger service, the improvements effected since 1921 are beyond all comparison with 1920. Mail trains were provided with electric lighting, dining cars, and sleeping cars. A train de luxe was also put into operation.

The schedules of movement of passenger and mail trains were radically changed. The stopping time at stations was reduced and the interstation speed brought up to 65 versts per hour on the main line and 70 versts on the southern line. Traveling time for mail trains from Manchuli to Pogranichnaya was reduced by 7 hours and 55 minutes, and from Harbin to Chang-Chung by 1 hour and 45 minutes. The practice of dispatching trains on time became strict law.

The improvement of the freight service of the railway is well proved by the fact that it handled with success the tremendous requirements of the exporting season of 1921. In December, 1921, the monthly figures of freight operation broke all records with a daily average of 1,029 cars. This operation was made possible by speeding up repair of cars. In October, 1921, the percentage of cars needing repair was only 15 per cent. The loading capacity per axle rose from 372.37 in 1920 to 417.94 in 1921. The average daily haul of a working car increased from 34.38 in 1920 to 39 in 1921. The turnover of a working car declined in 1921 by 0.1 for 24 hours as against 1920. In connection with the freight service a redistribution of locomotives took place in order to respond most efficiently to the current of traffic. This resulted in an increase of the composition and net weight of freight trains. In 1920 the composition of freight trains averaged 28.54 cars, the net weight of the trains being 16,729 poods, but in 1921 the average composition of freight trains increased to 34.47 cars, the net weight being 19,992 poods. This average increased in 1922. The amount of freight carried increased by 26 per cent as against estimates. Freight trains became subject to the same strict surveillance as to schedules as the passenger and mail trains, so that the commercial speed was raised from 12.78 versts per hour in 1920 to 13.90 in 1921. The personnel of the traffic department was reduced in accordance with demand. In 1920, 3,368 persons were employed, but only 2,609 were maintained in this department in 1921. In July, 1922, this number was reduced to 2,215.

The following table of official fignres gives a comparative idea of the work of the freight service of the railway in 1920, 1921, and the first six months of 1922:

Year and month.	Speed.	Turnover of a working car.	Net weight of a freight train, poods.	Loading per axle.		Per centage of haul of empties to total hauling.	Composition of freight train by axles.	Haul of working car.
				Loaded car.	Loaded cars and empties.
1920	12.78	10.8	16,729	372.87	250.85	37.5	67.56	34.38

1922.

ROLLING STOCK AND FUEL.

In 1921 capital repairs were effected on 79 locomotives instead of 65 as provided by the estimates for the year, the average number of locomotives turned out per month being 4 to 9 as against 1 to 5 in 1920.

The expenditure for fuel for locomotives, according to official figures, declined in 1921 as compared with the previous year, as follows:

Firewood, cub, sajen:
1920	51,305
1921	46,851
Coal, poods:
1920	18,601,075
1921	13,597,262

Thus the consumption of firewood declined by 6.7 per cent and that of coal by 26.9 per cent. On the basis that the consumption of coal converted into the equivalent of firewood exceeds the latter by more than one and one-half times the general percentage of the reduction of fuel consumption by locomotives is figured at 18 per cent. The operation of the railway expressed in millions of gross pood-versts increased, according to the official figures, by 13.7 per cent in 1921, as compared with the previous year, yet a reduction of the haul of locomotives was effected amounting to 9.15 per cent in 1921 as compared with the previous year. The consumption of lubricating oils was also considerably reduced by an enforced control and the introduction of a bonus system. The following table shows the consumption of lubricants in pounds for 1920 and 1921:

For 1,000 versts haul:
1920	13.56– 18.24
1921	9.68– 14.86
For 1,000,000 pood-versts:
1920	233.8 –311.1
1921	204.8 –270.0

Repairs of cars, according to the new system inaugurated in 1921, meet the same requirements which existed in pre-war times. The productiveness of the chief workshops rose from 1,426 cars in 1920 to 2,624 cars in 1921. In the shops superintendents were required to check exactly and in time the cost of a unit and to economize all expenses.

However, the greatest items of economy in expense were obtained by a reduction of the cost of supplies and by their more careful consumption. Fuel prices had reached an abnormal height, and its supply was monopolized by certain interests fighting the railway. Expenses for fuel in 1920 reached the exorbitant figure of 38.3 per cent of the whole expenditure of the railway budget. Through rigorous measures the management succeeded in remedying this situation, according to the following official figures:

	Quantity firewood for locomotives (cubic sagene).	For other.	Quantity coal for locomotives (poods).	For other.	Total cost in rubles.	Percentage to total expenditure under estimates.
1920	51,306.70	115,159.50	18,601,075	7,137,688	18,035,961	38.3
1921	46,851.78	70,497.81	13,597,262	6,411,107	8,740,695	26.9

REVALUATION.

The railway management in 1921 readjusted the prices of its stocks which had previously been marked down by varying abnormal high prices of preceding years. The process of the general decline of prices, which for several classes of materials even meant a return to pre-war figures, led to a divergence between market prices and prices of materials stored by the railway which was so marked that an invoicing based on previous prices, according to the management, would have meant a fictitious increase of revenue which would have prevented a regular completion of the provisions of the estimates and a regulation of expenses. The management thus considered it correct to reconsider the value of all stocks of materials according to actual ruling prices and to calculate the difference arising from such reduction of the working capital. It was considered that this loss item was fictitious and merely registers the previous actual losses sustained by the road when it paid abnormal prices for materials in former years, which no doubt, in a large measure, is true.

The result of the reconsidered valuation of stocks of the road is shown by the following official figures:

	Profit.	Loss.
	Rubles.	Rubles.
From readjustment of prices	51,958.14	2,758,927.04
From adjustment of nomenclatures and prices under estimates	159,343.67	160,491.07
Total	211,301.81	2,919,418.11
Balance		2,708,116.30

In so far as the railway had used in 1921 materials with readjusted prices, it is considered to be relieved of a fictitious exaggeration of expense.

CONCLUSION.

In any forecast of the probable rôle of the Chinese Eastern Railway in the future of Siberia it must be borne in mind that the present policy of the Russian Soviet Government is to secure control of the railway. The Chinese Government is and has been controlling the road since 1920, and the contention of the Chinese Government is that it should be returned to none but a recognized Russian Government. The exact future status of the road, therefore, is difficult to determine.

If the Soviet Government succeeds in its aim to control the railway and adopts the high-handed procedure of red tape and vacillation which characterizes its present economic measures, undoubtedly the road will for a time at least fall into its old deplorable state and economic benefit to Manchuria and Siberia be impaired.

It is interesting to note the outstanding fact that since the present management assumed control the life of the railway has been dependent solely upon Manchuria. The normal function of the road includes Siberia, and under improved and intelligent management this function admits of enormous economic development. The present management, in view of the recent political change in East Siberia, has been quick to see the probable results of this change as it might affect the railway, and negotiations are now being conducted with soviet authorities as to the possibilities of cooperation in operation of the line. It has even been suggested by the management that the Soviet Government have representatives on the board of directors of the railway. Provided, of course, that the Soviet Government took a conciliatory attitude and placed faith in a scheme of cooperation, the results of any such arrangement would be probably very beneficial. At the present time the result of these negotiations is an unknown quantity. On the surface, little faith can be placed in any conciliatory attitude which might be assumed by the Soviet Government, in view of its recent action concerning Egersheld (see special report No. 37) and its pronouncements at Peking, yet the Chinese Eastern Railway hopes that the action will be rescinded and the way paved for better relations, and it is working hard to accomplish this end.

Aside from the complications arising from the recent political change in East Siberia, notwithstanding the indebtedness of the road to foreign powers, if the present management were to have the good fortune to continue for another period of two years, there can be little doubt but that the measures it has adopted to improve the road would be amply justified. It is recognized that the general manager of the railway has been readjusting its affairs and redeeming part of its debts. This has been carried on under stress. The road went into a period of convalescence, however, and in order to become normal needs time.

Having been personally over the Chinese Eastern Railway from the station Pogranichnaya to the station Manchuli, having personally visited all of the railroad shops at Harbin, the headquarters of the line, I can personally testify to the excellent condition of the entire road, taking into consideration the extraordinary difficult times through which the country is passing. I can also testify to the efficient work being done in all of the shops, putting the old rolling stock and engines in perfect condition again, all to be credited to the efficient and conscientious work carried out under the personal direction of the road's present manager. Although this gentleman is being fought and besmeared by his political enemies and a bunch of jealous grafters, he has brought the road under all these difficulties into excellent condition, as can be seen by a careful study of this report and the accompanying diagrams.

The many improvements made in the city of Harbin for the benefit of the railroad's employees, the improvements made all along the road for the same purpose and for the comfort of the traveling public, after everything had been practically ruined by the armies of occupation, the retreating armies of Kolchak, etc., can not but astonish one. These enormous improvements were made in a short time under the present general manager, for all of which he receives no credit from the discharged surplus employees and grafters who can no longer steal the road blind. He is being accused by these people of having squandered the road's money. This accusation is absolutely unjustified. All the money spent has been spent for the benefit of the road.

The present general manager has not only not used any of the road's funds for his own use but has spent large sums of money of his own for the benefit of the employees of the road and their families, and he himself is, comparatively speaking, a poor man to-day. He no doubt, made some mistakes, most of which can be summarized by saying that he has been too lenient with many of his jealous adversaries and too good hearted toward a lot of shiftless employees.

DEATH OF MRS. JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this morning at 4 o'clock there passed away in this city one of the Nation's great characters, Mrs. Gen. John A. Logan. Eighty-five years ago next August Mrs. Logan was born in the little town in southern Illinois which happens to be my home. Early in her life she was united in marriage with General Logan, then a rising young lawyer, and from that time until the death of the general their lives were so closely and so beautifully intertwined that the public services and the name and the fame of the one can not be separated from those of the other.

General Logan was one of the world's greatest volunteer soldiers, one of this Nation's greatest generals, and one of our most illustrious statesmen; and through all the troubled and critical years of the Civil War, as well as the turbulent and critical years of reconstruction following the war, Mrs. Logan was his constant companion, his helpmate, and his inspiration.

Mrs. Logan first came to Washington, I believe, in 1858, when General Logan was elected to Congress from the district I now have the honor to represent; and during most of the years since then she has been a resident of this city. Her home here has ever been a shrine for those who from experience recalled the eventful days when our Republic trembled, as well as for many thousand others to whom the services and the sacrifices of the heroic men and women of those days have been an inspiration. By her splendid character, her devotion to the highest ideals, and her patriotic endeavors Mrs. Logan has contributed much good to the city and to the Nation.

I am informed that on next Saturday afternoon funeral services will be held, and her remains will be laid to rest beside those of General Logan at the Soldiers' Home here in Washington. I am sure many of the Members of the House will take advantage of the privilege to attend. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that by the death of Mrs. Logan our country has lost one of its greatest and most honored characters.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, probably the fact that he was a great man was because he had so great a consort.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) resumed its session, with the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MICHIGAN BOULEVARD BUILDING CO.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 5918) for the relief of the Michigan Boulevard Building Co., for printing under the rules.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, has there been any extraneous matter placed upon it by the Senate?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; the bill is agreed to as it passed the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Nothing placed on it as a rider?

Mr. EDMONDS. No.

The report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5918) for the relief of the Michigan Boulevard Building Co., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments.

G. W. EDMONDS,
JAMES P. GLYNN,
H. B. STEAGALL,
Managers on the part of the House.

ARTHUR CAPPER,
F. R. GOODING,
PARK TRAMMELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5918) for the relief of the Michigan Boulevard Building Co. submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

The amount is reduced from $31,931.69 to $18,931.69.

G. W. EDMONDS,
JAMES P. GLYNN,
H. B. STEAGALL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill in order on the calendar.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8051) for the relief of the Commonwealth & Dominion Line (Ltd.), owner of the British steamship Port Phillip.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice until the author of the bill can be present.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The calendar which I have shows a star where we left off the other night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there was a special order for taking up this bill first.

Mr. EDMONDS. We agreed at the meeting the other night that this should be taken up first.

Mr. REED of New York. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] was suddenly called out of town. He is anxious that the bill should pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill does not follow the established form adopted by the Committee on Claims for referring claims of this character to the United States District Court sitting as a court of admiralty. It further provides in section 2, which is very exceptional, an appropriation. Besides that I do not think any of these bills should be referred to the admiralty court with claims for demurrage for the delay in the use of the vessel. The other night I objected to one bill because the limitation was not incorporated. There is a bill on the calendar, No. 457, which contains the form of bill which the Committee on Claims has been reporting in these cases. I ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. REED of New York. If the gentleman objects, of course there is nothing else to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not object, but I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

COMPAGNIE FRANCAISE DES CABLES TELEGRAPHIQUES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14091) for the relief of the Compagnie Francaise des Cables Telegraphiques.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee why the committee did not follow the recommendation of the Acting Secretary of Commerce and submit this bill to the United States District Court for determination of damages and not to the court sitting as a court of admiralty?

Mr. EDMONDS. I call attention to the fact that the department sent us the bill to be entered in this way. I do not know why, but I think because there was some controversy as to the amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take issue with the gentleman. On page 2 of the report is the draft of the bill and it is not the bill reported by the committee. It is a bill substantially in the form the committee has been following this session in reference to bills referring to the district court sitting as a court of admiralty. I direct the gentleman's attention to the difference between the recommended bill and this bill which is reported. The bill from the Acting Secretary of Commerce says that it "be referred to the district court of the United States in the district of Massachusetts with jurisdiction and authority to determine the liability of the United States therefor."

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman wishes to have judgment given against the United States. We changed it because it is not the practice in the House to have judgment rendered. There is no demurrage. It is damage to a cable. If the gentleman wishes to have judgment against the United States I want to say that that is against the practice of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says there is no demurrage charge that can arise?

Mr. EDMONDS. I understand not; it is damage to cables.

Mr. STAFFORD. Could there not arise in that connection damage by reason of business that has been interfered with by reason of the breaking of the cable? The cable company makes a claim against the Government of $11,000. That the Department of Commerce disputes.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object, and it will save time if I object now.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2294) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to ascertain the cost to the Alaska Commercial Co., a corporation, and the amount expended by it from November 5, 1920, to April 18, 1921, in repairing and rebuilding the wharf belonging to said company at Dutch Harbor, Alaska, which wharf was damaged and partially destroyed on or about November 5, 1920, through collision therewith of the United States steamship Saturn, United States Navy, and to render judgment therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why can not the Navy Department pay the damages under the blanket authority which we recently vested in them in such cases as this?

Mr. EVANS. Because the sum is too large.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any claim for demurrage arising in this case?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not believe so.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall, there was a dispute as to the amount of damages.

Mr. EDMONDS. They made a claim of $13,000, and in the opinion of the department the bill was excessive. I doubt if any claim for demurrage could arise on this claim. We drew the bill up in the ordinary form.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall this case, it was a poorly constructed wharf, the piles being in the water only 3 or 4 feet. A storm came up and the wharf collapsed. Why should we be responsible for damages to a wharf if the vessel was properly there, when a storm arose which is an act of God?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not believe the gentleman's statement is quite accurate. The wharf was probably useful to these people, and in an endeavor to get out of bad weather this Government boat tied up at the wharf and broke it down.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the Government boat was moored to the wharf a squall came up, and in confirmation of my position that the wharf was in poor condition, I note that the Acting Secretary of the Navy, Theodore Roosevelt, states that in his opinion the wharf was not properly built; that the piles were in the water only 3 feet. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill.

BUFFKIN & GIRVIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1670) for the relief of Buffkin & Girvin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Buffkin & Girvin, of Jacksonville, Fla., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,114, in settlement of their claim for funds paid by them to the Government under protest, for manure, which was never delivered by the Government under certain contracts the said firm had with the Government for the purchase of manure at certain Army camps during the recent war.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

F. J. BELCHER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3609) for the relief of F. J. Belcher, jr., trustee for Ed Fletcher.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to F. J. Belcher, jr., trustee for the benefit of Ed Fletcher, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $21,838, in full payment for damage to lands owned by said Ed Fletcher inflicted thereon by the Government while occupying said lands as an Army training camp.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SWING. I sincerely hope that the gentleman will not object to this bill. From my own investigation into the case and from my personal knowledge, because I have been over the ground and was there before the Army camp was located at that point, and also since, I regard this as an exceedingly meritorious claim. I introduced a companion bill which went to the Committee on Claims and to the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] was the chairman. That subcommittee has also reported favorably.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill embraces $21,000?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know anything about the bill which we just passed without objection?

Mr. SWING. No.

Mr. BLANTON. The preceding bill, instead of calling for $21,000 called for $2,100. It passed without objection or debate. It involves a claim for a lot of manure which the parties claim they were entitled to, but a part of which was distributed by soldiers and sold to somebody else instead of being delivered to them. One report shows that there was only $361 due upon it. I doubt whether the Government owed more than $361. I let the bill pass to save time. I thought perhaps we could save more by saving time and then killing some of these big bills than in wasting time on $2,100 bills.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. I just want to say as a member of that Committee on Claims that I feel sure if the gentleman from Texas could have examined the evidence thoroughly he would not object to this bill. I was on the subcommittee that considered it, and on the main committee.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman considered a lot of ex parte statements and affidavits.

Mr. LOWREY. I did it with what integrity I had, as a member of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman never saw the witnesses and was not able to judge whether their testimony was correct or not. I have seen ex parte statements and affidavits come in bundles where the evidence of one present witness would refute the whole bundle.

Mr. LOWREY. I just offer my statement for what it is worth.

Mr. SWING. It is a large claim, but that is not the controlling question. The controlling question is how much damage was done.

Mr. BLANTON. My idea is just this: This is a night when bills are considered that are unobjected to, bills that are supposed to be small bills or bills where there could be no objection at all. Some of the new Members do not understand why one man should stop a bill to-night. There are days of each session for the consideration of the Private Calendar when one man can not stop a bill. It is only on such nights as this in the closing hours of Congress that that can be done, and a $21,000 claim against this Government ought to have more than five minutes' consideration of this House at all times.

Mr. SWING. Let me just state the case on the United States Government's own investigation, not on ex parte statement. This man, out of his sense of patriotism, at the Government's request, turned over to the Government 3,000 acres of land for use for five years by the United States Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and the land is still there. It never has moved.

Mr. SWING. The Government moved 6 miles of it. It dug trenches over 6 feet deep extending over 6 miles in length. It put concrete emplacements at one end of it and a whole battery of cannon there and practiced artillery firing from one end to the other.

Mr. BLANTON. Did they not have the right to do it under the lease?

Mr. SWING. Certainly; the lease was free, $1 for five years or 20 cents a year, and he is paying out over $1,000 a year taxes.

Mr. BLANTON. He merely entered into a bad contract.

Mr. SWING. It is not a contract. He was in New York and they wired him that the Government wanted it and he wired back that the Government could have anything he had, and being patriotic——

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, he commercialized his patriotism.

Mr. SWING. No; but he ought not to be punished because of it. Should a man's patriotism be used to inflict punishment on him? If you borrowed a man's bicycle, would you return it to him with a wheel broken? The Government had it. They dug 6 miles of trenches; they shot it full of big pits—the dugs are there—they left them and left the trenches as they were. They said they are willing to pay, and then they went to work and found out by actual test what it would cost to fill them up, and they estimated that it would actually cost more to fill the trenches than is included in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? This patriotic citizen was in New York, and the Government represented that it wanted some of his land—about 3,000 acres—and he proceeded to let it to them for five years under certain stipulations.

Mr. SWING. They wired him with reference to the land, and he wired to them that "they can have anything I have got."

Mr. BLANTON. Without any strings; and the Government used it, and after the Government used it——

Mr. SWING. They abused it.

Mr. FIELDS. Do I understand the amount carried in this bill was what the War Department estimated it would cost to fill the trenches and put them back in condition?

Mr. SWING. Absolutely.

Mr. FIELDS. Such as when they received it from him?

Mr. SWING. Let me read you what the judge advocate says:

When the property was abandoned, excavations to the extent of 17,480 cubic yards, consisting of trenches, dugouts, gun pits, etc., were left thereon. That the Government had a valid right to make these excavations is indisputable, but that right does not carry with it the right to leave them upon relinquishing possession of the land in a condition which not only makes the land unsafe but constitutes a permanent damage thereto so long as they are left undestroyed. This claim has been investigated by a local board and the cost of refilling these trenches, etc., was found to be slightly more than $1.25 per cubic yard. This cost was determined by the filling of some 1,500 yards of trenches, etc., by the Government, and is also the lowest figure procurable from commercial contractors. To refill these holes will require by actual measurements the removing of 17,480 cubic yards of earth. At $1.25 per cubic yard, this would cost $21,850. The claimant, however, has agreed to accept the sum of $21,838, and the local board recommends the payment of this sum. This recommendation is concurred in.

Mr. FIELDS. He asks for no rental on the land, but asks that the Government put it back in the condition in which they found it.

Mr. SWING. He asks them no rental money, but he said that if they would fill the trenches and put it in the same condition that it was before they took it he would be satisfied. They said they would rather make a cash settlement.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me give my view. If this bill was for the Government to place the land back in the shape in which it found it I would not object for one minute, but it is a bill to pay a man $21,000 in cash. Now, the land for the purpose for which it is suitable or desired may not be damaged at all by having these trenches and holes in it. Suppose a man in New York wants to make a golf course of it. Would he not want some holes and mounds on it, if he wanted to use it for a golf course? That is one of the main purposes for which most men in New York want some land.

Mr. SWING. He was only in New York temporarily.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

HUGH MARSHALL MONTGOMERY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13724) for the relief of Hugh Marshall Montgomery.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. May we have it reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent for lot 4, containing 54 acres, of section 3, in township 17 north, and range 5 west, Choctaw meridian, in the State of Mississippi, to Hugh Marshall Montgomery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

GREAT LAKES ENGINEERING WORKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6601) for the relief of the Great Lakes Engineering Works.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is entirely satisfactory so far if it does not require the United States District Court to sit as a court of admiralty if there be a limitation inserted excepting claims for demurrage.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will offer such an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that understanding I will be glad to withdraw the reservation of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Great Lakes Engineering Works, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, with its principal place of business in the city of Detroit, in said State, owner of the steamship Frank H. Goodyear, and certain docks on the Detroit River, at Ecorse, Mich., against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the United States steamship Isla de Luzon and said steamship Frank H. Goodyear on May 24, 1917, in the Detroit River at Ecorse, Mich., may be sued for by the Great Lakes Engineering Works in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the Great Lakes Engineering Works, or against the Great Lakes Engineering Works in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by the order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FIELDS. May we have the resolution reported, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be read instead of the preamble, which is striken out, and the original matter contained in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution without the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to revoke the certificate of discharge from the military service given, on December 23, 1920, at Governors Island, New York, to the said Ramon B. Harrison, then holding the rank of captain, Infantry, United States Army, under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and issue in lieu thereof and as of date of January 21, 1921, date of his acquittal and release from military custody, an honorable discharge: Provided, That upon his being granted an honorable discharge from the military service as provided for herein, the said Ramon B. Harrison shall be entitled to the payment of $60, as provided in section 1406 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919, and also to the payment of full pay and allowances to which his rank of captain, Infantry, United States Army, entitled him at Governors Island, N. Y., up to and including January 21, 1921, not otherwise paid to him.

With a committee amendment, as follows: Strike out all from line 3, page 1, to line 2, page 3, and after line 2, page 3, insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged officers, Ramon B. Harrison, who was a captain of Infantry, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States on the 23d day of December, 1921.

Mr. FIELDS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution explained?

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported out of the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. HILL, who is not present to-night, but I know something of the facts of the case. This officer was discharged without honor while he was awaiting trial by court-martial. Under the law of 1920 emergency officers were required to be discharged on or before December 31, 1920, and this man was, in accordance with that law, discharged without honor on, I think, December 23. Thereafter, in January, he was tried and acquitted.

Mr. FIELDS. I remember the case now. It was a very meritorious case.

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes; it was a meritorious case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Is that the only explanation the gentleman could give about the merits of the bill? There have been men charged with offenses, I submit to my colleague; for instance, a well-known case that has been before the Congress, that of the officers connected with the escape of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll. They were tried by court-martial and honorably acquitted. Yet they let a deserter escape purposely, designedly.

Mr. WURZBACH. I will say in reply to the gentleman that I think we have got to assume that in the case of judgments in courts-martial, the same as with judgments in courts of law, they ought to carry with them some validity.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to quit chousing Grover, then, if we are going to pursue that policy. We have choused him in another bill, on a bill that applies to everybody in the United States except Bergdoll. I agree with the bill. I do not think we ought to give him any quarter whatever. But if we are to carry out that policy, we would assume that every court-martial acquittal means innocence, but in fact it sometimes means guilt.

Mr. WURZBACH. If this trial had taken place before December 31, 1920, and he had been acquitted——

Mr. FIELDS. If he had been acquitted 10 days earlier he would have had an honorable discharge.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; he would have had an honorable discharge.

Mr. BLANTON. I have investigated some of the bills coming out of the Committee on Naval Affairs and out of other committees when court-martial proceedings were pending, and the man was discharged before the court-martial proceeding was had.

Mr. TILSON. He was forced out by the law.

Mr. FIELDS. He was forced out.

Mr. TILSON. The law compelled him to be discharged at that time, and therefore he had to be.

Mr. BLANTON. Have either of the gentlemen investigated this case personally?

Mr. FIELDS. I have.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think it is meritorious?

Mr. FIELDS. I think it is very meritorious.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the reservation. My colleague has investigated the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent the title of the bill was amended to conform to the text.

COMMONWEALTH & DOMINION LINE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 415, the first bill considered this evening, and passed over temporarily, to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 415. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 8051) for the relief of the Commonwealth & Dominion Line (Ltd.), owner of the British steamship Port Phillip.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under reservation of objection I ask unanimous consent that the substitute to be offerd by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] may be read in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the substitute to be offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] be read in lieu of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Commonwealth & Dominion Line (Ltd.), owner of the British steamer Port Phillip, against the United States for damages and loss alleged to have been caused by the collision of said vessel with the U. S. collier Proteus, in New York Harbor, on October 16, 1918, may be sued for by the said owner of the British steamer Port Phillip in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit to the extent only of such damages suffered, other than claims for demurrage to said vessel, and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the British steamer Port Phillip or against said owners in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ANNA M. TOBIN.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to calendar No. 203 (S. 2323).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to calendar No. 203. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Anna M. Tobin, independent executrix of the estate of Frank R. Tobin, deceased, the sum of $1,000, in full settlement for damages to said estate by soldiers of the United States Army in 1916 and 1917 near El Paso, Tex.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

CHARLES SWANSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10682) authorizing issuance of patent to Charles Swanson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This bill proposes to grant a patent to an individual for part of an abandoned military reservation. Is the gentleman in charge of the bill present? There being no one present in charge of the bill, I will object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ANTON ROSPOTNIK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3594) for the relief of Anton Rospotnik and the exchange of certain lands owned by the Northern Pacific Railway Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will any Member have any objection to an amendment providing that the exchanged lands shall be of approximately the same value? We have had some abuses in the exchange of lieu lands out in the Northwestern States, where they took land of the same area but of much greater value. I do not think there will be any objection to the amendment, and I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman withdraws the reservation of objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Northern Pacific Railway Co., upon its filing with the Secretary of the Interior a proper relinquishment disclaiming in favor of the United States all title and interest in or to the north half northwest quarter, section 15, township 8 south, range 20 east, in the Bozeman (Mont.) land district, under its mineral indemnity selection, list No. 146, embracing said tract, shall be entitled to select and receive a patent for other vacant unreserved nonmineral public lands of an equal area in that State; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to permit, after the filing of such relinquishment by said railway company, the homestead entry of Anton Rospotnik, to be reinstated as though said entry had been properly allowed, the same to remain subject to compliance with the laws governing entries of like character.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 12, after the word "State," insert "and of approximately the same value."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF THOMAS JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10825) for the relief of the heirs, assigns, and legal representatives of Thomas Johnson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the location numbered 20, township 6 north, range 9 west, second principal meridian, Indiana, which has been surveyed in the name of Thomas Johnson, as appears from the field notes of survey on file in the General Land Office, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the said Thomas Johnson, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue his certificate as register ex officio and cause a patent to be issued for said claim to Thomas Johnson, his heirs, assigns, and legal representatives: Provided, That this act and the patent which may be granted in pursuance of the same shall only operate as a relinquishment on the part of the United States and shall in no way prejudice any valid adverse right, if such exist, to the said land; the intent being that title shall inure to the true owners of the land under the laws of Indiana, including laws of limitation and prescription, as though patent had issued during the lifetime of said Thomas Johnson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

PENSIONS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14200) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been passed upon, has it not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice until the end of the calendar is reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over until the end of the calendar is reached. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, this committee has a special status where it can bring up a bill at any time?

Mr. FULLER. That is not correct. There are two Fridays of the month as days on which private pension bills may be considered.

Mr. BLANTON. And to-morrow is one of them.

Mr. FULLER. To-morrow would be the day, but our experience is that it is a day when private pension bills can not always be considered, because something else is in the way.

Mr. BLANTON. If you can get the recognition of the Speaker, you can consider it.

Mr. FULLER. Yes; but it will take less time now than it will then.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Invalid pension bills are privileged, but bills from the Pension Committee are not privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROBSION. I trust that the gentleman will not press his objection.

Mr. FULLER. It will take less time now than it will to-morrow to consider it.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the only day that these private bills can be considered. Let us proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

NEW YORK STATE FAIR COMMISSION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13903) for the relief of the New York State Fair Commission.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. MAGEE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve it.

Mr. MAGEE. There is no question about this amount found by a board of auditors of the War Department. There were two claims filed by the commission, one for 1918 and one for 1917. The claim for 1918 was taken up first, because the officers who knew about the claims for 1917 were in France. The award fixed something like $8,000 for the claim of 1918, which was paid. When the officers who knew about the 1917 claim returned from France the claim for that year was heard, and this award was made. The claim of the commission was for $28,517.86, and the amount of the award was $12,098.25. Now, I had charge of this claim under the former administration in New York when we had a Republican administration. The administration has now changed, and I want to show the same diligence in behalf of Democratic administration that I showed for the former administration. [Laughter.] Nobody raises any question as to the merits of the claim.

Mr. BLANTON. The "gentleman from Texas" would try to stop a Democratic bill just as quick as he would a Republican claim. They all look alike when they take money out of the Treasury. I make no distinction at all.

Mr. MAGEE. There is no question about the claim.

Mr. BLANTON. The claim amounts to $12,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the payment of the seven thousand and some odd dollars for?

Mr. MAGEE. That was for damages during 1918. It was during the mobilization of the United States soldiers that damaged the fairgrounds in Syracuse.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the payment of $12,000 for?

Mr. MAGEE. For the damages of 1917.

Mr. EDMONDS. The department said if they had not run short of money it would have been paid.

Mr. BLANTON. If it was not for the fact that I am afraid we are going to run short of money, I would not object. The fairground was used by the Government in mobilizing troops. I imagine that it benefited New York more than any other part of the United States, because if the troops had not been mobilized, instead of a commercial submarine rising up out of the water in the New York Harbor some morning, as it did during the war, there would have been a war submarine rise up and the fairgrounds would have been about the first place that the kaiser would take for mobilizing his troops.

Mr. EDMONDS. The only navy that can go to Syracuse would be the Swiss navy. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGEE. I will say that the State offered the fairgrounds to the Federal Government.

This is not money to be paid for the use of the fairgrounds. During the mobilization the soldiers appropriated and destroyed property of the State Fair Commission, and the claim is for damages to property.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], who is on the committee, advises me that he investigated the matter and knows that it is all right. I take his judgment for it.

Mr. MAGEE. I would not tell the gentleman that the claim was all right unless I believed it to be so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,098.25 to the New York State Fair Commission for damages to property and buildings on the State fairgrounds, Syracuse, N. Y., by United States troops during the mobilization in 1917, being the amount heretofore duly ascertained and awarded by the War Department.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 6, after the word "commission," insert the words "in full settlement against the Government."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM COLLIE NABORS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1405) for the relief of William Collie Nabors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that there will be an amendment offered reducing the amount to $3,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. The amendment is already printed in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And the committee is going to insist upon the amendment?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William Collie Nabors the sum of $5,000 for damages suffered by reason of his being struck and seriously injured by a Government motor cycle which was ridden or driven by a regularly enlisted soldier of the United States Army.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000, in full settlement against the Government."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN N. HALLADAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4028) for the relief of John N. Halladay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am frank to say to gentlemen interested in this bill that I have had some difficulty in bringing myself to the conclusion that the bank did not have notice of the wrongdoing of this wholesale crook, who married the acting postmistress, in the issuing of these postal money orders, 74 of which were for $100 each and 4 for $50 each, all cashed by one bank. I never knew of a case where the facts reeked with such open violation of the postal regulations. The acting postmistress was the daughter of the postmaster at Oak, Ala.

Mr. EDMONDS. The daughter was the guilty party.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. She was the acting postmistress. Her father was invalided. She would go around with the regular blanks, postal money orders, and buy automobiles, and have the orders circulated and then cashed. Only six months was the punishment for openly defrauding the Government.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But that is only in one case. The other case is yet to be tried.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, we are not concerned with the question of punishment at this time. All I am concerned with is whether the bank was put on notice by reason of the frequency with which these money orders were presented.

Mr. SMITHWICK. It ran over a period of nearly a year, from October, 1920, to June, 1921. The money orders were always paid. There was no evidence that the bank had notice at all. The orders were always paid and, of course, there was no reason why they should go around and inquire whether they were good.

Mr. STAFFORD. They were all issued by the acting postmistress, the wife of the crook Mendel, who was going around in joy parties all over the South, buying automobiles and hootch, and issuing money orders for them.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I agree with the gentleman that she was a crook and that the husband was a crook, but I do not agree with the gentleman that we ought to make the postmaster and the bank suffer for the reason that these others were crooks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; but the only question is whether the bank should have had notice that these were being issued fraudulently.

Mr. SMITHWICK. They were always paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Issued always for $100 by the same person.

Mr. SMITHWICK. I understand; but it was a large bank with a great many clerks handling these orders. How could they know? They would go to the local post office and get the money on them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall give the benefit of the doubt to the bank, and I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of John N. Halladay, former postmaster at Oak, Ala., with $8,012.13, and to certify said credit to the General Accounting Office, said sum being a balance due the United States which is chargeable to the embezzlement of funds and theft of money-order forms which were printed for and stolen from the post office at Oak, Ala., and unlawfully uttered in Pensacola, Fla., and Mobile, Ala., by Mr. and Mrs. Leon W. Mendel.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. If this money, or any part of it, went to this postmaster or his assistant, I should have objected to the bill. Here is the case: The postmaster permitted his married daughter to issue postal money orders. She had a crook for a husband, and under his domination and influence she issued postal money orders promiscuously to this crook and sent them to him in two States. He cashed them and spent the money. The postmaster ought to have been held responsible, and was held so far as his bond would go, but his bond did not go far enough. It lacked $8,000 of paying the Government back the money that it lost when it had to pay the money orders. If the matter concerned only the postmaster, his daughter, and a crook husband, I would see to it that they never got a cent, but all of this money goes to the Post Office Department in settlement of amounts it has had to pay for the Government. The only reason I take any time at all is to bring this to your attention. We ought to take some steps to stop this sort of stealing. Embezzlement is going on in various post offices scattered all over the United States, and the bonds are not sufficient to protect the Government.

Just such cases as this come up not merely from Alabama, but they come up in Texas, they come up in New York State, they come up in California and Oregon, they come up everywhere, and how long are we going to let it go helter-skelter, public money being paid out to pay defalcations? We must see that the Post Office Department takes steps to see that the Government's rights are protected and proper bonds are taken in amounts and terms sufficient to cover defalcation by crooks, many of whom are still in the Post Office Service, and I say we ought to take steps, especially the Post Office Committee, in conjunction with the Post Office Department and the Department of Justice, to see if Congress can not stop the loss of the people's money.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEW CARLISLE, IND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4667) for the relief of the First National Bank of New Carlisle, Ind.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object; there is an adverse report on this bill.

SHERMAN MILES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10177) for the relief of Sherman Miles.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Maj. Sherman Miles, United States Army, the sum of $380.55, in reimbursement of the said amount paid by him for the storage from January 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918, of household effects and professional books used by him when first lieutenant, Field Artillery, United States Army, military attaché at Sofia, Bulgaria.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "the sum" and insert "so much of the amount."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 1, line 7, after the figures insert the words "as has been refunded by him."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT E. WYCHE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13751) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent certain lands to Robert E. Wyche, a resident of Caddo Parish, La.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the payment of $1.25 per acre the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to sell and patent to Robert E. Wyche, a resident of Caddo Parish, La., the southwest quarter of northeast quarter and southeast quarter of northwest quarter of section 15, township 20 north, range 11 west, Louisiana meridian, containing 80 acres, more or less, land which he and his grantors have occupied under claim and color of title, and of which they have had actual possession, beneficial use, and enjoyment, believing themselves to be owners in good faith, for more than 30 years: Provided, That application for the purchase of the described tract of land be filed at the United States land office at Baton Rouge, La., within 90 days after the passage and approval of this act, and that no adverse claim thereto be officially of record as pending when the application is allowed and the sale consummated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

D. C. DARROCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2946) for the relief of D. C. Darroch.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say there were seven to six and I filed a minority report, and I am ready to argue and to fight the bill right here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances, I object.

JESSE C. DENNIS AND WILLIAM RHETT ELEAZER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2168) for the relief of Jesse C. Dennis and William Rhett Eleazer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FULMER. I would like to inform the House that I propose to amend this bill, and I think the House should be informed before we pass the objection stage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Which one is that?

Mr. FULMER. Calendar No. 446.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, in what particular does the gentleman intend to amend it?

Mr. FULMER. By striking out the figures in line 7 of "$2,500" and increasing the amount——

Mr. BLANTON. That being the case, I object.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve it.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, this claim was made by two men in the city of Columbia who entered into a competitive bid for a mail route in South Carolina. The contract was awarded to these men—Dennis and Eleazer—for carrying the mail during peace time in 1916. They continued to carry that mail for about a year or a little over, and then about the middle of 1917 the Government established Camp Jackson at that place.

Not known to them at the time they accepted this contract, and, of course, the Government at that time did not know that they proposed to establish a camp there; but they continued for about seven and a half months after the camp had been established at a considerable loss until they had exhausted all of their means and had to give up the route in March, 1918.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman explain to the House by what error the amount called for in the bill was reduced so that it is found necessary to amend it? I think that is important for the House to understand.

Mr. FULMER. I want to lead up to that, and I was going to explain that. So they continued about seven and a half months at a tremendous loss, and finally, after they had exhausted their means, they gave up the contract March 7, 1918, forfeited their bonds, and the bonding company turned over to the Government the amount of the bond for the balance of the time, something like two years, $3,420.

These people put in their claim, and the Senate passed the bill on the strength of a letter from Mr. Barrett, and when the bill came over to the Committee on Claims they did not have anything to show that these people had really paid this $3,420 to the bonding company, and they reported only $2,500. In the meantime they agreed with me that if I could get the proper papers to show that these people had paid the $3,420 an amendment would be put on from the floor. Mr. Barrett said, however, that he had no way of telling how much had been paid, but he said that the seven and a half or eight months would amount to $2,500. That is the only information he gave to the committee, and that is the amount the committee reported.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the fixing of this amount was through a mistake in the committee, and I think the only equitable way to pay this man would be to pay him $4,285.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the gentlemen's attention to one or two matters. On July 1, 1916, which was the end of certain carriers' contracts for carrying the mail all over the United States, the Post Office Department advertised for new bids, and they let new four-year contracts. The contractors in almost every State in the Union entered into new four-year contracts. The war then came on in the next year. Gasoline went up, Ford automobiles went up, Ford tires went up, Ford inner tubes went up, lubricating oil went up, the parts to the cars went up, everything went up. It cost them all more money. They all lost money.

Now, if the gentleman's bill were a bill to relieve all of these contractors I would support it. But here is a little isolated case where the gentleman imagines that his particular constituents are the only ones that lost. I know two of the best men in the United States who had exactly the same kind of a contract.

They were under bond to carry the mail. They carried it up to the time that it broke them, and then they went to the Post Office Department and said, "Here, we want to give it up. We have got two more years to carry the mail. We will pay the bond. We will borrow the money and pay the bond if you will relieve us." The Postmaster General said, "No; we can not relieve you. You are under contract. If you do not carry that mail, we are going to hire somebody to do it, and you will have to pay it." The department hired somebody else to do it and paid them $6.50 a day each more than the contractors ever received, and it broke them both.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman recall that some time in 1918, in the midst of the war, there were so many of these cases of hardship that we authorized the Postmaster General by law to adjust these cases, and he did adjust a number of them?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but there was a limitation to that law, and there were many of them that did not come within the terms of it. I can cite case after case from numerous States that we have had under investigation which did not come under that law at all, and the Postmaster General did not give any relief.

Mr. TILSON. This was a case in bankruptcy.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a case down in Tennessee where they put a post, where the men claim that they lost $23,000 on the contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I must demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. I feel I must object. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

AMBROSE I. MORIARTY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2750) to provide for the advancement on the retired list of the Regular Army of Second Lieut. Ambrose I. Moriarity.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most pathetic cases I have ever heard of. Lieutenant Moriarity was graduated at West Point in the class of 1887. He was a classmate of General Hersey, of the United States Army, and General Russell, and his class was one of the most famous classes that ever was graduated at the Military Academy.

The man has lain for 21 years in a hospital unable to move a joint of his body. Every joint in the man's body has grown solid. His teeth were removed so that they could feed him with a tube. He is suffering from that dreaded disease called arthritis deformans. He is unable to dress himself. He is unable to grasp his pen in his hand. There is not a joint in the man's body that is not absolutely and solidly grown, so that the entire flexibility is gone.

He was retired from the Army as second lieutenant, drawing the pay of $138.12 per month. There is no Army hospital that will receive him, because Army hospitals are not made for the care of incurables.

He has gone about from one hospital to another with his attendant. The amount of money that he receives is not sufficient to pay the care of this attendant and the board of himself. He inherited a few thousand dollars from his father's estate, which he spent completely in undertaking to cure himself of this dread disease. He contracted the disease in the service of the United States Government. In the winter of 1887 he and his company were encamped on the cold shores of Lake Michigan, sent there by the United States Government to be in readiness to protect the city and citizens of Chicago at the time of the execution of the Haymarket rioters or anarchists. Afterwards he resigned from the Army and entered Yale University. A brilliant student, he graduated in the law class and entered upon the practice of the law with probably as bright a future as any young man who ever came from that famous university. Thus he was a graduate not only of West Point but of Yale. His old love for the Army returned and he went back into the Army as a second lieutenant in the Ninth Infantry, and was stationed in Arizona, amid the awful extremes of heat and cold, as he was sent about in the Indian campaigns in that country.

The exposure to extremes of weather there resulted in this disease, and he was retired from the Army as a second lieutenant on the pay that I have stated. He has no means of his own, and his pay is insufficient for an attendant to feed him and take care of him. The Senate has passed this bill increasing his retired rank to that of a captain. It was hoped that it would pass him with the retired rank of a major, because that would keep him comfortably, but the Senate reduced it and retired him with the rank of a captain, which will give him approximately $230 a month, a meager livelihood for a man so helpless and dependent as he is.

I tell you, my friends of the House, any man whose service for his country has resulted in such a physical condition as that of this man deserves to have this measure of relief afforded him, and I hope the House will join with the Senate in retiring him at this grade.

Mr. FIELDS. I understand he can not even help himself to a drink of water.

Mr. MILLER. He can not reach out his hand to get a drink of water; can not move a joint of his body. I am hopeful that the gentleman from Wisconsin will let this bill go through.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of objection, I am aware of the distressing circumstances that the gentleman has stated, because I have very carefully read the report. But we must have some harmony in the award of gratuities to persons afflicted like this unfortunate Army officer. In the early part of this Congress a case was presented where a man in civilian life, employed in the Post Office Department as a postal clerk, was struck and injured, and the result of the injury was the same as in the case of this unfortunate officer. That man is not able to move a joint of his body. He has to be fed, and all we voted for him was a pension of $60 a month. This man is receiving $128.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. It is possible that the man of whom you speak has some friends or relatives. This man has not a relative in the world, no one to give him a friendly hand or a drink of water.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no certainty that this trouble grew out of the man's Army service. There is a presumption to that effect. One hundred and twenty-eight dollars a month is a pretty liberal pension, and I feel constrained to object.

Mr. MILLER. I am very sorry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN A. DOUGLAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1252) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John A. Douglas.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. MILLER. I suppose there is no use in my making a statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve the objection. A few moments ago the gentleman from New Jersey called attention to one of these desertion cases where the vote in the committee was 7 to 6. I am quite well acquainted with the facts in this case. Perhaps the gentleman is better acquainted with them. Here was a boy taken ill in the Army, who went home to be cared for, and was prevailed upon by his mother not to return to the Army but to go to Canada to avoid service in the Army. Now he wishes to have an honorable discharge. Is that a correct statement of the facts?

Mr. MILLER. Not all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I mean in short, is it?

Mr. MILLER. This boy was 17 years of age. He enlisted in the Army against the wishes of his parents. He went to the front. It seems that his Army life was overshadowed with distressing sickness. He was furloughed and sent home. While he was home his regiment and company were mustered out of the service, and the muster roll bears the indorsement "Absent on sick leave at Davisville, Mich.," which was the boy's home.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will my friend kindly point out in the report where that statement is made? I have read the report twice quite thoroughly, although not every line of it.

Mr. MILLER. There is quite a long report from the Adjutant General on this case. It says here—

On February 28, 1865, and April 30, 1865, he was reported absent on sick furlough, and on the muster-out roll of the company, dated June 26, 1865, he was reported a deserter with remark: "Went on sick furlough at Davisville, Mich., February 18, 1865."

That is at the top of page 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does it state about the company's record?

Mr. MILLER. I can simply read to the gentleman from Wisconsin the report of The Adjutant General of the War Department:

The records show that John Douglas was enrolled February 26, 1864, at Pontiac, Mich., and was mustered into service February 29, 1864, as a private in Company G, Twenty-second Michigan Volunteer Infantry, to serve three years. On February 28, 1865, and April 30, 1865, he was reported absent on sick furlough, and on the muster-out roll of the company, dated June 26, 1865, he was reported a deserter, with remark: "Went on sick furlough at Davisville, Mich., February 18, 1865."

Applying to this department for removal of the charge of desertion and for an honorable discharge, John Douglas under date of January 14, 1890, testified as follows:

"That he served faithfully until on or about the 17th day of January, 1865, when, without any intention of deserting, he left the regiment under the following circumstances: That for about two months previous to January 17, 1865, at Chattanooga, he was sick, and on or about said January 17, 1865, or a few days previously, Doctor McConnell, regimental surgeon there, examined him and ordered him sent home, and on or about said day he was given a furlough by said doctor on account of sickness and disability, and came home. That after coming home he was examined by one Doctor Anderson, a Government physician then at Lexington aforesaid, and when his furlough run out it was extended in time by said Doctor Anderson. That he continued sick and unable to do any work and entirely unfit for service in the Army or labor of any kind until along in the early part of the summer of 1865. That he was not able to do soldier duty until long after the Army was disbanded. That he was young and inexperienced and was unadvised as to the proper course to pursue in the premises and did not know the necessity of a discharge and never asked for one. That he never deserted the Army or intended to desert it, but simply came home on the order of the regimental physician, Doctor McConnell, as aforesaid."

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me read what I based my statement on:

He was taken ill at Atlanta, remained with the regiment until it went into winter quarters at Chattanooga, Tenn., was sent home on a furlough for 30 days; the time of furlough was extended for 20 days, but his mother insisted that he go to Canada with an uncle who was then visiting at his home. He remained there until the close of the war.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; it seemed that an uncle or some relation came from Canada and asked permission of the mother to take the boy home to see if he could not be cured and restored to health. There is nothing in the record, I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin, showing that this man was a deserter, but, on the contrary, that he was one of these unfortunate men whose Army career seemed to be full of sickness. I think the man is entitled to the relief which the committee recommends.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. The 30 days' furlough carried it beyond the date of the armistice, and so presumably the soldier thought there was nothing more to do.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; like many others.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing on the records of the War Department against John A. Douglas, late of Company G, Twenty-second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date of February 18, 1865.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John A. Douglas, who was a member of Company G, Twenty-second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 18th day of February, 1865."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, at the end of line 6, add the following: "Provided, That no pension pay, bounty, or other allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

JESSE C. DENNIS AND WILLIAM RHETT ELEAZER.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that not more than the amount stated in the original bill will be allowed, I withdraw objection to Calendar No. 446.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we return to Calendar No. 441.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2168. An act for the relief of Jesse C. Dennis and William Rhett Eleazer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2168) for the relief of Jesse C. Dennis and William Rhett Eleazer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jesse C. Dennis and William Rhett Eleazer, of the county of Richland and State of South Carolina, in the sum of $4,590 in full compensation for loss and damage suffered by the said Jesse C. Dennis and William Rhett Eleazer under their contract for transporting United States mail at Columbia, S. C., said loss having been brought about by the establishment of Camp Jackson in the vicinity of Columbia subsequent to the execution of said contract.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 7, strike out the figures "$4,950" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has the bill in charge and members of the committee stated that the committee amendment ought to be voted down and the amount $4,590 left in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, after a bill has come up by unanimous consent and there is a demand for the original sum—if that is going to be the practice I do not think we will get much further along with the Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. That was understood.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman gave notice that he would ask for the original sum in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not hear it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the position taken was that the gentleman was going to withdraw the objection by reason of the gentleman from South Carolina agreeing to take the amount of $2,500.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from South Carolina was going to offer an amendment to increase it to over $5,000, and I told him I would object if he did it. He agreed to limit the amount to $4,590, the amount stated in the bill, and I withdrew the objection. By voting down the committee amendment it will leave the amount $4,590. I gave notice, and I thought everybody understood it.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand it. This is a very doubtful claim at any rate. I should have objected in the first instance if I had known there was going to be any increase in the amount.

Mr. EDMONDS. As a matter of fact, this loss was occasioned by the fact that there was a camp established there.

Mr. BLANTON. And the chairman of the committee was one of those who convinced me that this is a just claim in $4,590.

Mr. EDMONDS. We have passed claims of this character before, and this amount will be the correct amount, I think. These men were carrying the mail ordinarily. A camp was established in the neighborhood, and the extra cost of carrying the mail is what has caused their loss. If we vote down the committee amendment, it will leave what I think is the correct amount.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MARTIN CLETNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2632) to correct the military record of Martin Cletner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I reserve the objection.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that I think ought to be approved by the unanimous consent of the House. A couple of days ago we adopted an amendment to the Army appropriation bill prohibiting the enlistment of persons under 21 years of age. Of course, I did not believe in that amendment, but, nevertheless, it was adopted. During the Civil War, both North and South, the boys were fired with patriotism and enlisted on both sides. In Pennsylvania a young man a little over 16 years of age wished to enlist in the Army.

Mr. MILLER. Nineteen years of age.

Mr. CURRY. He was 19 years old when he was discharged. His father objected, and he ran away from home, and under an assumed name he enlisted. He served faithfully, and while with his company and regiment on the Potomac River near Harpers Ferry, not having much to do at the time, he went fishing on the river. He got a little way away from the camp and was captured by Mosby's men. He was such a child that after they had him for two or three days they took the uniform off him and put on a Confederate uniform and told him to go home.

He tried to find his company, but could not do it. He went home at last, and his father told him that he had secured his release from the Army. He stayed home about a year. He found that what his father told him was not true. He ran away from home again and enlisted under his right name and served to the end of the war, and had an honorable discharge. During his second enlistment he was in several engagements and was captured for nine months. He was a prisoner of war in Andersonville prison. I know this old man very well.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The report shows that he first enlisted in July, 1862.

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. He served for four months and deserted, and he was a deserter from November, 1862, until January, 1864?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When he reenlisted under an assumed name.

Mr. CURRY. No; under his own name. He enlisted originally under an assumed name.

Mr. BLANTON. He stayed in the service from January until May, 1864?

Mr. CURRY. Until the end of the war.

Mr. BLANTON. No; the report shows that on May 27, 1864, he was again missing in the line of march.

Mr. CURRY. He was again missing in the line of march, and he was captured and was in Andersonville Prison. After he got out of prison he reported to his regiment and received an honorable discharge. He did not desert the first time. It is simply a technical desertion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman is right in his position, but I want him to explain a statement in the report. After he enlisted in July, 1862, and deserted four months afterwards, the report shows that Martin Cletner was enrolled January 5, 1864, was mustered into the service January 22, 1864, and that on the roll of his company dated June 30, 1864, he was reported as missing on the march from Wright Tavern, May 27, 1864, and on the roll dated October 31, 1864, as having deserted on the above-mentioned march on May 27, 1864.

Mr. CURRY. Let the gentleman read the rest of it.

Mr. TILSON. He was in Andersonville prison about that time.

Mr. BLANTON. The record shows that he was captured June 3, 1864.

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. He was missing May 27, and he was captured June 3.

Mr. CURRY. There was no desertion at all in the second enlistment.

Mr. BLANTON. There were several days from his desertion until his capture.

Mr. CURRY. There was no desertion at all in his second enlistment and he received an honorable discharge.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Martin Cletner, late of the First Independent Company, Pennsylvania Volunteer Engineers, and of Company C, Third Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Cavalry, and grant him an honorable discharge.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Martin Cletner, who served under the name of Martin Cubbler as a member of Captain Wrigley's independent company, Pennsylvania Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on or about the 24th day of November, 1862."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: At the end of the committee amendment insert: "Provided, That no pay, pension, bounty, or other allowance shall accure prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "An act for the relief of Martin Cletner."

HARRIET B. CASTLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14089) granting six months' pay to Harriet B. Castle.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid, from the appropriation for beneficiaries of officers who die while on the active list of the Navy, to Harriet B. Castle, widow of Guy W. S. Castle, late lieutenant commander, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate the said Guy W. S. Castle was receiving at the date of his death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JOHN D. HALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3412) for the relief of Mrs. John D. Hall.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman reserve that?

Mr. STAFFORD. For one minute.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that every other officer who had property damaged was paid the damages except Colonel Hall, who happened to be traveling throughout the country and could not get his claim in time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the facts are these: The property of this Army officer was in storage over a year in San Francisco. He was retired one month before the earthquake. He left there and was traveling over the country. Why should he not have insured the property rather than have the Government pay for it. I object.

CHARLES B. STRECKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6108) to permit the correction of the general account of Charles B. Strecker, former Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TRYGVE KRISTIAN LODE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8291) for the relief of Trygve Kristian Lode.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a bill that seems to have been hurried through by the energetic action of the very active and distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON]. I find on reading the report the committee acted upon the statement of the gentleman rather than the report of the department that this Jens Lode was not receiving the credit for the money that had been paid at the time of the entry by the original Lode.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. That question was not put up to the department by the correspondence that had preceded. The matter was presented to me through Mr. Honeycutt by mail and the committee was having a meeting very shortly following and that question came up, and I said I did not know anything but what was in the letter that came to me but that I would call up the Public Land Office and get the facts.

I called them up, and they looked into the matter and called my office and advised me that the Government had $224 that the man had paid in and that there was no assignment or anything of that kind, so the Government had every dollar that was paid in and in addition got the money coming from the man who had succeeded to the interest of the soldier, who went in the Army shortly after he filed on the claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. This successor in title, so to speak, Jens, paid the entrance fee and all the other fees?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount paid as fees, commissions, and purchase money by Trygve Kristian Lode in connection with homestead entry at the United States land office, Glasgow, Mont., as follows: Serial No. 048301, made May 8, 1917, for the southeast quarter of section 28, township 30 north, range 52 east.

SEC. 2. That upon receipt of the certificate from the Secretary of the Interior, as provided in section 1 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make payment of the amounts so certified out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated and issue his warrant in settlement thereof.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS, ETC.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14288) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill take its place at the foot of the calendar and be considered after these bills have been considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEASE OF CERTAIN LAND, MILITARY RESERVATION, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13004) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease to the Kansas Electric Power Co., its successors and assigns, a certain tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to lease to the Kansas Electric Power Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, for a consideration and under terms and conditions to be determined by said Secretary of War, the following-described tract of real estate in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas:

Beginning at a point which is located as follows: Starting from the northeast corner of the east coping of concrete bridge on Grant Avenue over the Leavenworth, Kansas & Western Railroad; thence north 71° 6' east, a distance of 1,073.8 feet, to the northwest corner of the United States Government motor transport building; thence north 72° east along the line parallel to the north side of said United States Government motor transport building, a distance of 1,026.3 feet to the aforesaid point of beginning; thence south 18° east, a distance of 847 feet; thence north 72° east, a distance of 433 feet, more or less, to a point located on the west right-of-way line of the said Leavenworth, Kansas & Western Railroad. Returning to the original point of beginning; thence north 18° west, a distance of 850 feet, to a point; thence north 72° east, a distance of 543 feet, more or less, to a point located on the west right-of-way line of the Missouri Pacific Railroad; thence in a southerly direction along the west boundary of the Missouri Pacific Railroad right of way to said point above mentioned on the west right-of-way line of the said Leavenworth, Kansas & Western Railroad; exclusive of the rights of way granted to said Leavenworth, Kansas & Western Railroad and said Missouri Pacific Railroad, and containing, exclusive of said railroad rights of way, 15.5 acres, more or less; reserving, however, to the United States, or its assigns, the coal, or royalty for the coal, underlying said lands; for the purpose of constructing and maintaining thereon an electric power plant and such other works as may be necessary or proper to enable said corporation, its successors or assigns, to furnish Fort Leavenworth, the disciplinary barracks, the Federal prison, the soldiers' home, and the motor transport shops, together with the city of Leavenworth and such other communities and patrons as may be served by said plant, with an adequate supply of electrical energy.

SEC. 2. That said corporation, the Kansas Electric Power Co., its successors and assigns, shall have the continuous and uninterrupted use of said real estate for the uses and purposes herein above set out, under the direction and control of the Secretary of War and subject to the terms and conditions of the lease to be executed by said Secretary of War as herein provided, so long as said tract shall be used for the purposes herein specified: Provided, however, That if said corporation, its successors or assigns, shall cease to use and occupy said premises for such purposes, then and in that event said lease shall become null and void.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are several points of proper objection to this bill I will state to my friend from Kansas, and I would like for him to explain. The way the bill is written you can see it is contemplated that the continuous use of this property—15½ acres—for all time and eternity is to be granted to this corporation. We do not know what we are going to get for it. There is no stipulation as to the time. It is not for a term of years. It is just left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary. You see what I contend for. The coal royalty is reserved to the Government. Why should it not be that oil and other minerals royalty be reserved to the Government? Usually where you find coal you find oil and valuable gas and other valuable minerals.

Mr. ANTHONY. Coal is the only mineral known to exist in that part of the country.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I would like to know why there should not be a general mineral reservation in there, applying to all minerals. I think that is a very proper reservation.

Mr. BLANTON. And there ought to be a fixed term of years here, and there ought to be something else besides furnishing power at a stipulated price. It is something to have power.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Unless the gentleman will assure us that there will be an amendment in there for a general mineral reservation I shall have to object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say that I intend to offer an amendment following the suggestion of the Secretary of War, that it shall be for a term of 50 years with the privilege in the discretion of the Secretary of renewal for a like term.

Mr. BLANTON. What does the Secretary of War say?

Mr. STAFFORD. Secretary Weeks goes into it and says this will be an advantage to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Except furnishing power at the same price that they charge everybody else. I am glad to see that the new majority whip is onto his business and is going to see to it that these limitations are placed on these bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are two aspirants for that post tonight.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is an authorization of a lease. It places in the hands of the Secretary of War the full power for properly protecting the Government and prescribing the terms of the lease. The fact is this company wants 15 acres of ground on the reservation, which is low and swampy, of no governmental use. It has been investigated by the commanding officer at Leavenworth, and by a Quartermaster officer sent out by the Secretary of War, and it is fully approved by him, and his approval is fully set forth in the report.

Mr. BLANTON. If it were any other Member than our colleague here from Kansas, I should not be so disposed to object. [Laughter.] Because of all the Members of the House he least of all needs to carry home any bacon. [Laughter.] It looks to me like 15½ acres of Government land bacon.

Mr. ANTHONY. You will notice that the Secretary of War proposes to exact a rental return equivalent to the estimated value of the 15 acres of land, and he says the corporation has agreed to make a material reduction in the present rates charged for electricity, so that he says the lease will be of material advantage to the Government at this time. My own estimate is that there will be reductions in the electrical rates for the four governmental institutions mentioned in the bill. If they take electricity from this new plant, that will amount to not less than a $10,000 saving. The Government is now paying about $60,000 a year for electricity.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will not object to placing in here a limitation in addition, to the effect that the Secretary of War will not make the term longer than 25 years at a time?

Mr. ANTHONY. In my opinion 50 years will be short enough, because undoubtedly the company intends to bond itself for the erection of a plant.

Mr. BLANTON. We should treat them as we do foreigners, and make it 62 years. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment on page 1, line 4.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 4, after the word "lease," insert "for a term of 50 years, with the privilege, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, of renewal for a like term."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there is another amendment that the gentleman from Kansas is going to offer. If he does not offer it, I will offer it. On page 3, line 3, after the word "coal," insert "and other minerals," and after "royalty" strike out the words "for the coal" and insert "on same."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Are oil and gas regarded as minerals?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That is so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 3, line 3, after the word "coal," insert the words "and other minerals"; and after the word "royalty," strike out the words "for the coal" and insert "on the same."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the Clerk please report the latter part of the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 3, line 3, after the word "coal," insert the words "and other minerals," and after the word "royalty," in the same line, strike out the words "for the coal" and insert "on the same."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to so modify it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FORE RIVER SHIPBUILDING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1298) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the seventy-odd proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, we are told that there are now pending over 70 different propositions to amend the Constitution of the United States. As I am not the author nor am I especially interested in any such proposals, I feel that I can discuss the general demand for such amendments without any personal bias or concern. I feel that I am in a position to consider the matter from a nation-wide aspect, having in view at one glance the entire past history of our country and looking forward with faith and confidence to a still greater future for the American people. We must remember that formal and written constitutions are relatively a very modern invention. We must also remember that constitutions are but statutes speaking the sovereign will of all the people in a solemn manner for the purpose of organizing the government itself. Therefore constitutions are the law fixed by the people to govern the government and to prescribe its relations to the people collectively and individually.

NEARLY EVERYBODY WANTS SOME CHANGE.

The amendments now pending may be grouped into two general classes: First. Those that seem to indicate some sort of dissatisfaction with the Federal organic law as it now exists. These wish a change to meet what they consider to be changed conditions. Second. The second group of proposed amendments represents the attitude of those who do not wish any change and, therefore, seek to make any future changes more difficult. Paradoxical as it seems, the second group who seek changes are most earnestly opposed to any change except the changes proposed by themselves. This group proposes to change the article of the Constitution with reference to amendments to the Federal Constitution by providing that any State may require that any amendment to the Federal Constitution in future shall be submitted to a popular vote in order to constitute ratification by such State.

AS PEOPLE CHANGE, SO MAY CONSTITUTIONS.

It seems to be assumed by some that it was a mistake on the part of the makers of the Constitution to provide for any change whatever in the future except by well-nigh unanimous consent. The argument assumes that if the Constitution had not contained a clause prescribing the manner in which the same might be amended that therefore it could never have been amended. Such an assumption is unfounded. The very power of the people that created the Constitution, acting through the several States, could change it just as they created it. It is beyond the power of one generation to bind the hands of future generations by any constitution or law. Just as it is beyond the power of one Congress to pass any law which can not be repealed or amended by a future Congress, so the people acting in a sovereign capacity at one time can not bind the same people acting in the same way for all future time.

Mr. Speaker, some superficial text-writers in discussing our constitutional system have left the impression that the Federal Constitution was and is the foundation of all government in America, and they have stated positively and clearly that the several State governments and constitutions are modeled and framed after the fashion of the Federal Constitution. Many historians, being caught by the laudatory phrases of Gladstone with reference to our Federal Constitution being the "most wonderful work ever struck off by the brain and purpose of man at a given time," have left the impression that the Federal Constitution was something entirely and completely new at the time it was set up. This false assumption has led to the impression by many unthinking and impressionable people that the men who sat in the convention at Philadelphia from May until September, 1787, and framed the draft of the Federal Constitution to propose to the States were so wise and so learned and so patriotic as to be practically inspired by divine wisdom and power.

I yield to no man, Mr. Speaker, in my respect for the heroic men of that period. But it is not necessary to show one's admiration and prove one's patriotism by obscuring the actual historical facts. The facts are that the men in that convention were hard-headed, practical men of affairs. That Constitution represents many compromises and is the result of many conflicts. That Constitution was the most matter-of-fact, nonsentimental, utilitarian instrument that the men of that period could execute. In fact, about 50 years after the Constitution became operative there developed a cult so profoundly moved by a conviction of duty to abolish chattel slavery in negroes that when they saw provisions in the Federal Constitution recognizing the existence of slavery and pledging the Federal Government to exercise its power in some respects to protect the slave owner in his property, they declared that Constitution of the fathers to be "A league with death and a covenant with hell." William Lloyd Garrison, the author of this denunciation, is honored in many parts of our country, not only in the textbooks but his form and features perpetuated in bronze and marble in the most public places.

This remark quoted above of the great Gladstone was a part of a bright epigram in order to contrast the difference between the British constitution as a "growing organism" as against the American Constitution as a "fixed organism." In the same breath he described the British constitution as "the most subtle organism which has proceeded from progressive history." But rhetorical expressions employed for the purpose of emphasis must not be relied upon as historical facts. In truth both the American Constitution and the British Constitution are the products of progressive history. They are both living organisms and are both constantly changing in two ways: First, by practice and interpretation, and next by conscious amendment or addition.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, there is very little room for originality in matter relating to governments. Most of us are apt to believe that the Declaration of Independence was an original composition inspired by the heart and brain and formulated by the pen of Thomas Jefferson alone. As a matter of fact, a little digging into the prior history shows that the stately phrases and lordly sentences of that immortal document are largely accumulated from a variety of sources extending over many years. Many of the thoughts and some of the words are to be found in the famous charge to the grand jury by Judge Drayton at Cheraw, S. C., in 1765. The sturdy frontiersmen of western North Carolina had met at Charlotte, N. C., on May 20, 1775, and promulgated the "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence." The stalwart lovers of liberty in Virginia in May and June, 1776, led by George Mason, formulated the first Bill of Rights to find place in any American Constitution. The most casual reading of that epoch-making Virginia document will show that Thomas Jefferson was debtor to George Mason. James Otis in Boston was thundering forth the same immortal sentiments. Scores of newspapers and magazines and pamphlets were scattering the principles of free government amongst the Colonists for at least five years before they were all concentrated and boiled down into one single eloquent utterance on July 4, 1776.

HISTORIC ROOT OF DEMOCRACY.

But back of all this feeling and thought and discussion was a universal evolution of ideals respecting the fundamental principles of government. John Milton had gathered but a mustard seed of truth from Plato and Thomas More and Oliver Cromwell and from hundreds of other sources and had produced a living, vigorous plant of literature upon the subject. John Locke had discussed the subject with philosophic abstraction and with a decorous deference to existing institutions so as not to render insecure his own place and fortune, but those who read between the lines and those who made logical application of his propositions could but see that they inevitably led to the conclusion that government rests upon the consent of the governed; that the majority of the governed have the right to alter their government at will; and that there rests upon the majority the obligation so as to administer to the government as to secure the life, the liberty, and the opportunity to pursue happiness to all the people.

THE PEOPLE, NOT PAPERS, PRESERVE LIBERTY.

Mr. Speaker, I notice recently a cult that ascribes something like inspired significance to the abstractions contained in the preamble to the Federal Constitution. One writer says "the preamble contains the key to the Constitution, it utters its spirit, and unfolds its deep philosophy." Mr. Speaker, such superficial sentimentality is more apt to be hurtful than helpful. Sensible people do not have to set up idols in order to worship. Reasonable people know that God Almighty did not hand down the Constitution of the United States along with the Ten Commandments from the glorious heights of Sinai. People with common sense know that the matter-of-fact framers of the Federal Constitution were human and with limited human vision, and that the permanence and stability of their work is not due to any peculiar and God-given power, nor to any sudden stroke of superior genius, but is due to the traditions of liberty and order that rest in the people themselves of these States, and is further due to the enlightenment and to the devotion to the ideals of civilization that the succeeding generations have entertained. From early times men have argued that because the preamble contained these words, "to promote the general welfare," then the Federal Government can and should enact any legislation and enter into any activity that may conceivably promote the general welfare. Of course, a sober second thought will reveal to such hasty thinkers that the purpose of the people in establishing the Federal Constitution was to promote the general welfare in so far as such promotion was possible by the exercise by the Federal Government of those powers expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution.

I wonder what these rhapsodists would say about the expression "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity"? How would they define liberty? Where is that liberty defined in the Constitution? I well imagine that nearly every person has a different conception of liberty. The bootlegger has one conception and the consistent prohibitionist another conception. As a matter of fact, the terms "liberty" and "freedom" and "justice" can not be completely defined by anyone and the mind can only partially conceive of their meaning by a comprehensive study, not only of existing law and of existing institutions but of the evolutionary processes by which Anglo-Saxon institutions have developed.

THE TRIPARTITE DIVISION OF POWERS.

It is falsely assumed that the framers of the Federal Constitution were the first to divide the powers of government into three equal and coordinate divisions, known, respectively, as the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. As a matter of fact, 11 of the 13 original States had very shortly after independence was declared in 1776, and at least one and maybe others before the Declaration of Independence, had proceeded to frame State constitutions in which the tripartite division of powers was clearly outlined. The constitution of Massachusetts, framed in 1780, is an orderly and systematic distribution of these three chief governmental powers. The men of that period who read at all were usually very familiar with the writings of Montesquieu on the "Spirit of Laws," published about 1758, and he clearly outlines the division of the powers of government into legislative, executive, and judicial.

It is also stated upon apparently good authority that Montesquieu obtained his ideas from reading the works of John Locke, which were published about the year 1691. However, a consideration of Locke's "Treatise on Government" discloses the fact that Locke seems to have ignored the judicial department of government. He divides the powers of government into legislative and executive and then he subdivides the executive powers into domestic and federative. By domestic he means the enforcement of laws among the people at home, and by federative he means handling the diplomatic affairs of the government in its relation with all foreign governments. I assume that in the classification of Locke the judicial powers would be included within the classification of "domestic executive powers." In other words, he would consider the courts as but agencies by which the government executes the laws enacted by the legislative branch. As a matter of fact, there is a very close and intimate contact between the executive and judicial departments. In the first place, so far as criminal laws are concerned, the executive department of the government must first institute criminal proceedings and then prosecute them before the courts and after judgment is rendered must take charge of the convicted person and enforce the judgment of the court. In other words, the court is powerless to act except upon cases affirmatively brought before it by the executive department, and the court is powerless to enforce its judgments except by the power lent it by the executive department.

The court is like a man without either hand. It can not stretch out its right hand to grasp offenders and bring them into court, and it can not stretch out its left hand and punish offenders duly convicted. The court is personified by the brain and the heart of the person without either hand. It has the brain to perceive the facts and judgment to weigh the facts, and the conscience to do what truth demands and the lips to pronounce the decision of head and heart, and there the court stops. How tremendously important it is, therefore, that the court should never decide except upon full hearing into all the facts, and that its decisions should reflect a conscience free from passion and void of selfish interest.

THE ONLY ORIGINAL FEATURE.

There is not a single original idea in the Federal Constitution so far as government in general is concerned, though there is an original application of a well-established governmental principle as applied to Federal Government. This original feature is the fact that under Federal Government, in contrast with that existing under the former Articles of Confederation and in contrast with all other federated governments, it was to have the power of directly taxing the citizens of the whole country for the support of the Federal Government, and the laws of this Federal Government were to be directly and immediately obligatory upon the citizens of all the States within the confederation. Consequently we have the original and novel situation of two entirely separate and distinct governments operating at the same time upon the same people and within the same territory. It is not to be wondered at that there should have developed misunderstandings and conflicts between these two separate and distinct governments, and therefore the student of history and of government is not surprised that these controversies resulted in the War of Cessation, commonly called the Civil War, but more properly and appropriately designated as the War between the States.

LET CONGRESS STOP PASSING UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAWS.

Mr. Speaker, the matter of the power of the courts to declare an act of the legislative department, having received Executive approval, to be void because of unconstitutionality is receiving a great deal of consideration at this time. Without discussing the merits of that question one way or the other, I desire to present a consideration which should eliminate the question just mentioned to the realms of academic discussion. If the Members of Congress and the President would do their duty, then no Supreme Court would ever have a chance to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. It is the habit of "passing the buck" by Members of Congress that has brought about a situation that is giving concern to many people. Let me remind the Congress and the country that there is the same high obligation upon the Members of Congress to protect and defend the Constitution that there is upon the President and the members of the Supreme Court. As a matter of fact, the constitutional oath administered to the President requires him "to protect and defend the Constitution." The oath taken by every Member of Congress binds him "to protect and defend the Constitution," but when you come to the oath prescribed by law to be taken by every judge of the United States courts from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court down, you find that it binds the judge "to administer justice without respect to persons and to do equal right to the poor and the rich agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States." So there is the chief and primary obligation on the Members of both Houses of Congress to say whether the bill proposed to be enacted into law is constitutional. In fact, that ought to be the first question asked.

If that question is answered affirmatively, then the question of the wisdom and policy of the proposed legislation may be considered. It should make no difference with a Member as to his sympathy with the aim and object of the legislation. The question of constitutionality or unconstitutionality meets him at the very threshold if he is to remember his oath. I fear that too many are apt to say: "Oh, the constitutionality is a matter for the courts. We think the legislation will do good and it may never get into court, and if it does at least five of the members of the Supreme Court may be so much in sympathy with the object of the legislation that they will do as Congress is doing, to wit, sacrifice the Constitution for some economic or social or political purpose."

CONGRESS BEST JUDGE OF CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Speaker, the courts have a great deal to say about what was the intention and the purpose of the framers of the Constitution. I feel satisfied that the framers of the Constitution never intended that the Members of Congress would neglect their duty in passing conscientiously and deliberately upon the constitutionality of proposed legislation. The framers of the Constitution knew that future Members of the Congress could know as much about the purpose and intent and plan and scope of Federal Government and the Federal Constitution as any members of the Supreme Court. The framers of the Federal Constitution knew that it was not any cryptic, or mysterious, or unnatural instrument with some hidden and weird and puzzling meaning that could be ascertained only by being juggled over and "conjured" in a dark room. On the contrary, they knew that the words of the Constitution were a rather inadequate expression of its spirit and purpose. They knew that the principles of liberty, if they are to endure, must reside in the breasts and brain of the people rather than in musty and mysterious documents.

The framers of the Constitution knew that when all their language was taken together it would plainly reveal, especially when construed by the rule fixed in the tenth amendment, that it was to be and is a government of limited powers, and that unless a power were expressly conferred or fairly implied as necessary and proper for the execution of the express powers, then all such was denied to the Federal Government and must be exercised by the States and by the States alone. Surely they knew that all the Members of Congress for all future time would be able to understand the English language, and they had reason to assume that many Members of the future Congress would be trained lawyers, and therefore there was good reason for the framers of the Constitution to believe that all the Members of Congress in both Houses could and would understand the Constitution and would abide by it.

CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES CAN BE GENERALLY UNDERSTOOD.

Mr. Speaker, constitutions must be and are susceptible of being understood in their broad principles and outlines by all the people. Our universally accepted system of popular sovereignty declares that the Constitution is made by the people. If, therefore, the people made it, surely the people understand it. If the people understand it, then surely their more than 500 representatives freshly elected by the people can understand the Constitution better than nine judges who have not been elected by the people to their office, and some of whom have never been elected by the people to any office and whose lives have been given to the study of mere controversies between persons.

The only trouble is that these Members of Congress have gotten in the habit of failing to study the Constitution. They have overlooked their duty to study the Constitution. But if the Members of Congress would do their duty in this respect, and if the President, who should, above all persons, understand the Constitution, and who is sworn especially to protect and defend the Constitution, should do his duty and strike down by the veto every bill that he regards as unconstitutional—if Congress and the President would do these things, then the Supreme Court would have no fair nor reasonable opportunity to say that there is a real conflict in any case between the Constitution and the statute, and that as between these two in conflict the statute must yield and the Constitution must stand.

WHAT WE MEAN BY "AMERICANISM."

When we speak of "Americanism" and of the "American system," and when we urge loyalty to the "American Constitution," we must remember all that is implied within these terms. The great underlying and fundamental proposition implied by Americanism, after the preliminary conception of popular sovereignty, is our dual division of governmental powers between the States and the National Government. Some people seem disposed to feel that such a reminder is out of date and that talk about "State rights" is an anachronism, and seem to feel that to be loyal to this dual system of Government implies some sort of disloyalty to the National Government. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government and the Federal Constitution are as much dedicated and obligated to the preservation of the States in their full reserved powers as to the preservation of the Federal power in its fullest constitutional extent.

The 13 States existed before the Federal Government existed. Undoubtedly they created the Federal Government. It is true that 35 other States, nearly 75 per cent of all the States, have since been created by the authority and power and permission of the Federal Government. But be it said to the credit of the strength and vigor of American ideals that those in control of the Federal Government conferred upon these 35 States admitted into the Union after the original 13 had created this great Federal system the same full and complete enjoyment of local State sovereignty, under the Constitution, that the original 13 States had. This fact is a fine tribute to the firm conviction of those who later administered the Federal Government that the full integrity and vigor and independence in all internal matters of the States themselves are essential to the peace and progress and power of the American people.

"AN INDESTRUCTIBLE UNION OF INDESTRUCTIBLE STATES."

Mr. Speaker, so many are the advantages that we have derived from the division of governmental power between the States and the Nation that even if such a system had not been created by the States it would be wise and politic for us now to adopt that system. It seems that Providence has guided the American people ever since the discovery of this continent. The settlement of different parts of the country by different classes and groups and religious sects of the English people is now seen to have been a happy and fortunate disposition.

The mingling with these English elements of the Dutch of New York, the French of Louisiana, the Germans of Pennsylvania, the Spanish of Florida, and the patches of Scandinavians and Swiss and other nationalities here and there has brought about a tolerance, a breadth, a liberality, and a generosity distinctly and exclusively American. But there remained enough of provincialism and localism and selfishness of the people of the different colonies to compel them to be chary about surrendering all the powers of government to a single central agency. They had left the homes of their fathers in Europe to enjoy religious freedom and civil liberty amidst the hardships and dangers and loneliness of a new country. They divined what we now see, the dangers and tyrannies of a huge bureaucracy, consequently they grudgingly gave up to the Federal Government only those powers that bitter trials in war and grim necessity in peace had shown to be essential to the preservation of their dearly bought and much beloved liberties. The results have been marvelous. In the main the people have enjoyed the greatest possible freedom consistent with State and national obligations. Though the population has been multiplied by fifty and though the area has been multiplied by more than three and though the wants of civilization and the creations of modern science have multiplied a thousandfold the activities and interests of the people, the individual citizens in South Carolina and in Texas and in Wisconsin, with certain inevitable exceptions, enjoy the same personal liberty that the Pilgrim Fathers in Massachusetts did or that the cavaliers in Virginia did.

OUR DUAL SYSTEM INSURES SAFETY.

Mr. Speaker, the safety of American institutions rests with the States. Modern experience has shown that the greatest precaution for the safety of students in colleges and of patients in hospitals and of inmates in asylums is to have them scattered in a number of different buildings disconnected, so that fire originating in one place may be localized before widespread damage is done. It is like the device of the unsinkable ship that has a number of separate water-tight compartments. Though the ship be rammed by another ship or be torpedoed by a submarine, yet the entire ship is not sunk because the inrush of water is confined to the particular compartment broken in. So it is with the American "Ship of State." Each of these 48 States, in the language of Mr. Justice Holmes, is "an isolated chamber of experiment." Though excessive socialistic ideas take possession of one State, their dangers are perceived by others and the evil checked before widespread harm is done. Though the baleful and damning power of corporate wealth get possession of one State, yet the evils are confined to the single State affected and the example becomes a warning lesson to other States. If all the powers of government for the 110,000,000 of Americans scattered over this entire part of the continent were concentrated in the hands of one government at Washington, then the enemies of that government, by whatever name those enemies may be called, whatever may be their motives, could concentrate and multiply their assaults upon that single place and might overthrow the Government itself to the everlasting distress of the people and the destruction of national ideals and power and prosperity.

WHAT MEANS OUR MONROE DOCTRINE?

Mr. Speaker, in these times of turmoil, of agitation, and of world disorder, it seems that nearly every platform and pulpit sends forth a warning that for this reason or for that reason "civilization is trembling in the balance; that if something happens, or does not happen, the human race will reenter an epoch of stagnation and decline, like the 'dark ages'; and that out of this through the slow centuries the peoples must eventually grope to a new day." Personally I share no such gloomy apprehension. A little study of the history of former periods of agitation and of unrest will show that similar direful predictions were then made also. And yet a comprehensive view of history demonstrates that every revolution, made necessary by undesirable conditions, such as our forefathers endured for years before they threw off the claims of British authority, has in fact been one of the processes of evolution. For Americans who love to breathe the spirit of freedom, liberty, justice, and democracy these days are filled with high hopes. Americans have been the champions of human freedom since before the American Revolution. The principles of governmental independence, as announced in the Declaration of Independence, reacted upon the people of France, and in a few years, and after much blood and suffering, lasting through scores of years, that people have stepped out into the full light of liberty. But well do we remember the "jeremiads" of Edmund Burke, who poured forth his powerful and eloquent denunciations of the excesses prevailing in France, and from being the champion and defender of justice and liberty, as he had been during our controversy with England, he became the spokesman for reaction and for autocracy and despotism.

The Bourbons and their friends argued that if such a liberal as Edmund Burke was disgusted at the failure of democracy to function and the suicidal crimes of democracy, as evidenced by the "reign of terror" in Paris, then all others were justified in concluding that man could be safely and sanely governed only upon the principle of the "divine right of kings," and the divine right of the favorites of kings, and the divine ordination that all other men are proscribed to a life of servitude and servility. But Americans did not lose their faith in democracy. When Napoleon, that child of revolution, was finally caught and curbed, then the despots of Europe decided that it was time to restore the power of royal prerogatives among those South American peoples who had won their independence by the sword from their mother country at a time when she and her royalistic allies were kept busy trying to outflank "the Little Corporal." So Spain said that she would regain her lost provinces in South America. Then the American people rose to the last man and backed the sentiment of the Monroe doctrine to the effect that the North American Republic would consider the restoration of kingly power in South America as an unfriendly act. The Monroe doctrine means and can mean only this—that if Spain by the assistance of other hereditary rulers could overthrow democracy in South America, then England by the same token and by the same assistance could overthrow democracy in North America and reestablish her dominion in this land which had been "dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that to secure these things governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

When America was in the throes of a great Civil War for four years, undecided whether or not her Government or any government was dedicated to the principles of liberty, justice, and democracy, European autocracy stealthily conspired against the rights of free men and established a monarchy by the power of their military machines in our sister Republic of Mexico. When peace was reestablished amongst the States, and with peace returned power, then we notified France and the world that Maximilian must move from Mexico.

We were the friends of humanity in 1898 when the oppressed Cuban people were driven hither and thither like cattle by the bayonets of a Spanish bully. We have declared—and I believe we mean still to keep our pledge—that the people of the Philippine Islands shall in due season enjoy the inalienable right of any nation to decide upon the form of their own government, to determine its policies, and to control all their affairs, internal and external.

We have watched the overthrow of despotism in China, and we have rejoiced when that people seemed to be waking from their age-long sleep. We have seen an unspeakable and indescribable despotism in Russia that sent without cause or trial its victims by the thousands to freeze in Siberia broken by the power of a popular uprising; and though for a time at least the old hereditary czardom is replaced by a more numerous oligarchy, yet we have faith to believe that out of sovietism will ultimately grow representative democracy and that the patient, faithful, honorable Russian people will finally come into their own. If the French could survive a reign of terror and could upon the ruins of a commune rear the form of a stable and liberal Republic, then surely we should not lose hope in the possibility of Russia to do the same thing. People with liberal minds were happy when the German masses drove from their borders the imperial impersonation of hereditary military power. People who genuinely love freedom in America love to find other peoples coming into the possession of the same blessing. If every nation were as America is, truly representative of the will and interests of the masses, then international and world peace would prevail forever.

We have no selfish designs upon the lands, or the resources, or the labors of any people on the globe. We rejoice that fully three-fourths of all the people of the world have followed our example since 1776, and have set up for themselves governments that represent the feelings, and needs, and the desires of the great masses of the people who produce the wealth, who perform the labor, and who fight the battles for those nations.

WE NEED PATIENCE; DEMOCRACIES ARE SLOW.

So, Mr. Speaker, we should have faith in the permanence and the final universal triumph of the fundamental principles of Americanism. When we have faith then we will have patience. It is entirely obvious that there is too much impatience at this time. The extreme progressives chafe at the restraints and requirements of orderly and settled constitutional government. The reactionaries are impatient of every step and expression that promises a change toward liberalism. Some people wish legislation of a particular kind and hurry to procure it, irrespective of the means or agency employed. The result is that many rush to Congress with propaganda that counts into the thousands and weighs by the tons, when as a matter of fact they ought to be employing their propaganda on the State legislatures. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have known people to urge upon me that Congress should enact such and such legislation, and when I told them that Congress does not have the power to legislate upon the subject mentioned, and recommended that they approach their representative in the State legislature upon the subject, they would then say that they hardly considered it worth while to bother the State legislature. If an idea is good and worth while, then its champions should be patient enough to ascertain the proper constitutional method for enacting the idea into law. As a result of this impatience we find intolerance and mutual distrust.

The ultra progressive would wipe out the Constitution where it stands in his way. The ultra reactionary would fix the Constitution so it never could be changed. What we need above all is for our people to grasp the fundamental principles of "Americanism" which implies the divine right of a settled, well ascertained majority to govern under the Constitution and the right of the requisite constitutional majority to change the Constitution itself. But at the same time, we need to warn our people from the forum and by the press about the unspeakable dangers certain to follow in the wake of this widespread powerful tendency to concentrate power in the hands of Federal bureaucrats. I believe that the people are already realizing that the pendulum for the first half century after the Civil War had swung too far in the direction of federalization and centralization. I believe that the pendulum is now beginning to swing back, and that the people are realizing the wisdom of Thomas Jefferson's warning and are willing to follow his precepts when he taught us that just as much of the governmental power should be kept just as close to the people as possible. Jefferson shows us how the township should hug to its bosom township affairs, and the county be jealous of county rights, and the State should guard all of its powers and prerogatives, so that the Nation could not suck into a mighty maelstrom of red tape and bureaucracy the vast volume of business that comes home to the bosoms and breasts of men.

So, Mr. Speaker, I patiently march on the highway of progress. I have confidence that the future of America is safe and that the world itself will come through the throes of many sorrows and griefs to a yet fuller realization of human power and of human happiness than ever before. Since early manhood I have rejoiced to see the rising tide of democracy throughout the world. To my mind, as I have read history, it has confirmed my faith in America. It has been to me a triumph of American ideals. As I have viewed it, America became a world power when she planted her feet upon the bedrock of eternal truth proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence. I have followed through the pages of history the action and reaction of that truth from nation to nation and have felt a joyful thrill at witnessing the world bear testimony to the power of America. We are too apt to forget that the power of America does not consist merely in her resources; nor in her Army and Navy; nor yet in her man power by the millions; nor in her fields, forests, and mines; but the real power of America consists in the force of her ideals, in the truth of her principles, and in the confidence that all mankind has in her unselfish devotion to the principles of a righteous and just representative government. There may be eddies along the banks of the stream; there have been reigns of terror, and communes, and soviet savagery; but he must be blind who can not see that the great stream of human history bears upon its bosom the ever-accumulating volume of representative government and the indisputable evidence of the final and complete triumph of democracy. "The individual withers, but the races progress more and more." As the tide of democratic progress advances certain individuals and certain special class interests may suffer here and there, and the writhing victims may raise a cry of protest against the forces that crush them. But it has ever been thus.

It is the inexorable law of human progress. It is the will of God as revealed in His word. But just so sure as God is good and just and true, just so surely are all nations upon the face of the earth coming finally and gloriously into the complete possession of their own. Mankind has raised the question, voiced by the English masses seeking for more complete control of their own affairs, and asks with the British poet:

When wilt Thou save the people? O Lord of Mercy, when?
Not thrones and crowns, but nations;
Not kings and lords, but men.
Flowers of Thy heart are they;
Let them not pass like grass away;
Let them rule, who work and fight, and pay;
God save the people!

SCHOONER "MOUNT HOPE."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14249) for the relief of the owners of the American schooner Mount Hope.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the chairman of the committee is going to offer an amendment as to demurrage charges. I have no objection to the bill with that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows.

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the American schooner Mount Hope against the United States for damages and loss alleged to have been caused by the collision of said vessel with the United States steamship Navesink, off Pollocks Rip Lightship, on November 21, 1916, may be sued for by the said owners of the American schooner Mount Hope in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the American schooner Mount Hope or against said owners in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: Page 2, line 1, after the word "suit," insert "to the extent only of such damages suffered other than claims for demurrage to said vessel."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

MRS. R. S. ABERNETHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7267) granting permission to Mrs. R. S. Abernethy, of Lincolnton, N. C., to accept the decoration of the bust of Bolivar.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will not the gentleman reserve his objection for a minute?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. This bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has made a unanimous report after very mature consideration. The only purpose of the bill is to enable the sister of a sailor who rendered valuable service in connection with operations in South American waters to receive a mere decoration. It is not to receive a bust, but it is to receive a ribbon which is denominated in the bill as the decoration of the bust of Bolivar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we recognize that at this late day?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Why should we not?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not care at this late hour to go into the merits of this question, but I remember the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] made a very earnest fight against the policy of allowing the German Government—I think it was the German Government—to recognize some of our consular and diplomatic officers with gifts and the like. I do not know what became of that bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman would read the report which was very carefully prepared by my colleague on the committee [Mr. COLE of Iowa] I think it would go far toward removing his objections to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a very illuminating and a full historical report, as I can see by glancing at it, but I confess that I have not had the time to read it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think my friend often reaches conclusions without having had the time to read reports on bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I read the reports very carefully, and when I have not had the time to do so, I am always open to conviction. I keep an open mind. If I had read the report perhaps I would be more positive as to my position.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the distinguished gentleman will allow me, this is a very simple matter. The lady is anxious to receive this ribbon. I have no interest in the bill. The lady is not a resident of my State. It is my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] who introduced the bill. I trust the gentleman will find it in his heart to withdraw his objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Mrs. R. S. Abernethy, of Lincolnton, N. C., be authorized to accept the decoration of the bust of Bolivar tendered by the Government of Venezuela to her brother, Lieut. Commander Rufus Z. Johnston, United States Navy, and that the Department of State be permitted to deliver the decoration to Mrs. R. S. Abernethy.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CERTAIN LANDS AT CAMP JACKSON, S. C.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4404) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to trustees to be named by the Chamber of Commerce of Columbia, S. C., certain lands at Camp Jackson, S. C.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object. This bill authorizes the transfer of 1,192 acres of land in the military reservation at Camp Jackson. Why should we transfer 1,192 acres of land to some trustees and let them sell it or dispose of it for charitable or educational purposes? Why can not the United States Government perform its own charity work?

Mr. FULMER. If my friend from Texas will allow me, I will be glad to tell him the reason why.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I would like to have—an explanation.

Mr. FULMER. I will be glad to explain it to the gentleman. In 1917 various public-spirited citizens in South Carolina by public subscription bought and paid for 1,192 acres of land and presented it as a gift to the Government without any cost whatsoever.

Mr. BLANTON. Why?

Mr. FULMER. For camp purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here was a committee of public-spirited citizens who donated certain land for the purpose of having a United States camp located at Camp Jackson.

Mr. BLANTON. For commercial benefit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Having donated it, they now want the Government to return it gratis.

Mr. FULMER. If the gentleman will allow me to explain, I do not think he will have any objection. If you will read the report of the Subcommittee on Military Affairs under date of January 5, 1922, you will find that they recommended that this land be given back to the donors free of any expense. This land was given to the Government by a corporation. This corporation is not asking that the land be given back to them, but the welfare board, in connection with the chamber of commerce, ask that they may have this land given back to them, to be placed in the hands of trustees, for educational purposes, agriculture, and so forth. If you will read the letter of the Secretary of War, you will see that he recommends this.

Mr. STAFFORD. But after receiving property from private individuals for certain purposes, why should the Government give it back for nothing?

Mr. FULMER. I should like to read the letter of the Secretary of War.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the letter as set forth in the report.

Mr. MILLER. The Government had had the use of it.

Mr. FULMER. Yes; and it is nothing now but an expense to the Government. They got the use of it.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. It was the opinion of the committee that where patriotic citizens subscribed for a tract of land and it was the disposition of the Government to return it, it having served all the purposes the Government had for it or ever will have, that the property given in this patriotic way should be returned to those citizens.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that going to be the policy where a private association has donated land to the Government which the Government has improved by expending large sums of money for highways——

Mr. MILLER. There is nothing of the kind on this land.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are highways on the land.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; for Government use.

Mr. FULMER. There are no improvements on it and the part of the original tract they retain. They are giving back on the outside 1,192 acres that are not nearly so valuable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are they giving land in exchange for this?

Mr. FULMER. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the gentleman that the pople made this donation for the benefit that this military camp would bring to their community. It brought a great horde of soldiers there. Merchants were able to sell large supplies and they reaped a great benefit, like every other community in the United States that had a military camp. The Government spent lots of money there that they never will get back. It would sell the buildings for about 5 per cent of what they cost—that is what they usually get on them—it will not get one cent back for roads, they will not get one cent for sidewalks, for the light system, the water system.

Mr. FIELDS. There is nothing of that kind on this land.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is not, it is the first military camp that I have heard of that did not have them.

Mr. McSWAIN. This bill does not include the whole camp.

Mr. BLANTON. It includes 1,192 acres, which is almost two sections of land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. FIELDS. I want to state——

Mr. MONDELL. If there is to be objection, Mr. Speaker, I think that we should pass on to the next bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wisconsin will object if I do not. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

CAPT. NORMAN RANDOLPH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14317) granting permission to Capt. Norman Randolph, United States Army, to accept the decoration of the Spanish Order of Military Merit of Alfonzo XIII.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, we have just passed a bill reported by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], granting the bust of Bolivar as a decoration. This is for the decoration of an Army officer by the King of Spain?

Mr. FISH. The Spanish ambassador.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many requests are there pending of that kind?

Mr. FISH. Only two altogether. This was reported out from the Committe on Foreign Affairs, and it is similar to the one that just went through. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Capt. Norman Randolph, United States Army, be authorized to accept the decoration of the Spanish Order of Military Merit of Alfonso XIII, tendered by his excellency the Count of Vinaza, the ambassador of Spain at the Peruvian Centennial, and that the Department of State be permitted to deliver the decoration to Capt. Norman Randolph, United States Army.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. STANTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2934) to provide for the issuance to John W. Stanton by the Secretary of the Interior of patent to certain land upon payment therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to issue patent to John W. Stanton, of Great Falls, Mont., for the west half of the southwest quarter of section 2, the north half of the northwest quarter of section 11, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 3, all in township 23 north of range 4 east, principal meridian of Montana, upon payment by said John W. Stanton therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL BUILDING SITE, DUQUOIN, ILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14183) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell a portion of the Federal building site in the city of Duquoin, Ill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to sell to the Christian Church of Duquoin, Ill., that portion of the Federal building site in said city, fronting 30 feet on the eastern boundary of said site extending eastwardly of that width, 100 feet, along the entire northern boundary of said church property; at such time and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States; to convey the land to said Christian Church by the usual quitclaim deed; and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt derived from the sale of public property.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "terms," insert "but at not less than the appraised value, to be determined by him."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not offer that amendment.

Mr. DENISON. I have offered it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. BLANTON. We let these bills pass upon the report and the bill. I understand they are going to get a great deal more than the land has ever been appraised for. That is the reason I let the bill go by. The land cost $3,000 when it was originally purchased by the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell these lands.

Mr. BLANTON. I would rather leave it to him to fix the terms.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what we are doing—at not less than the appraised value, to be determined by him.

Mr. BLANTON. But if you insert that language it is going to authorize him to take it at the appraised value which may have been made 20 years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think this is safeguarding the interests of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. I would rather leave it as it is.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BIG ROCK STONE & CONSTRUCTION CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12751) to convey to the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co. a portion of the hospital reservation of United States Veterans' Hospital No. 78 (Fort Logan H. Roots) in the State of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on reading the bill I notice that its purpose is to give title to some of the property which is now under lease by this stone and construction company.

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The authorization for the lease was made within a year or two?

Mr. JACOWAY. As I recall, it was in 1912.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the land being used for now?

Mr. JACOWAY. The stone is being used for the construction of roads and for riprapping the Mississippi and for streets and other purposes, both public and private.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it a hard stone?

Mr. JACOWAY. It is a very hard stone, and is especially adapted to the construction of roads.

Mr. STAFFORD. How far is the quarry removed from the hospital?

Mr. JACOWAY. I would say from 3,000 to 4,000 feet farther from the hospital than are the operations at the present time. That is my recollection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any buildings between the hospital and where they are quarrying?

Mr. JACOWAY. No. This land that is sought by the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co. is a rocky piece of ground on the banks of the Arkansas River. It is of no value to the fort. The least price at which it can be purchased under this bill is $150 an acre. I can not state this with certainty, but I think the land originally cost the Government about $5 an acre. This is 20 acres of the portion of the land on which is located the hospital, and is adjacent to the 3,000 acres owned by the Government, deeded in fee by the city of Little Rock to the Federal Government when Camp Pike was located.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any other competitors for this land?

Mr. JACOWAY. Not that I know of.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is acquainted with the land?

Mr. JACOWAY. I am in a general way.

Mr. STAFFORD. My fear was that it might disturb the purpose of the hospital grounds.

Mr. JACOWAY. No. In answer to his question, will say a special agent was sent there by the Veterans' Bureau, and he and the officer in charge made a report upon it, which the gentleman will see in the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. The trouble about the report is that it is too short, and I have to get the information elsewhere.

Mr. JACOWAY. Both of these gentlemen say that it will not interfere with the running of the hospital and interpose no objection to the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co. purchasing this land set out by metes and bounds in my bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon the payment by the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Arkansas, of such sum as he may determine to be the reasonable value of the premises (but not less than $150 per acre), to convey to the said company the following-described portions of the hospital reservation of the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 78, North Little Rock, Ark. (Fort Logan H. Roots), near the city of Little Rock, State of Arkansas, to wit:

quired or which may be acquired by said company under authority of this act for roads, pipe lines, wires, and other purposes which may be deemed necessary for the use of the said hospital reservation by the United States Government.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be enforced from and after its passage and approval.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRANK J. SIMMONS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7810) for the relief of First Lieut. Frank J. Simmons, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

GEORGE EMERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 726) for the relief of George Emerson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to George Emerson, of Great Falls, Mont., late a second lieutenant in the Air Service, Division of Aeronautics, United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $235, to reimburse him for money withheld from salary due him, upon his discharge from the Army, on or about October 31, 1919, and still so withheld; and there is hereby appropriated for such purposes, out of any money in the United States Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $235.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ELI N. SONNENSTRAHL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1280) for the relief of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEWIS W. FLAUNLACHER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1516) for the relief of Lewis W. Flaunlacher.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I find that the Committee on War Claims has one standard as to the amount of damages that should be awarded to persons injured in accident, and the Committee on Claims another, the amount of the Committee on War Claims being about twice that from the Committee on Claims. My attention was not called to that until after we had gotten along with the calendar quite a way night before last. In this case, if the gentleman is willing to accept what the Senate considered was a reasonable amount and get this bill out of the way it is acceptable, but if he is going to increase the pay of a wealthy man because he is injured in an accident there will be an objection interposed.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to accept an amendment, but I would like to make this statement in justice to the committee. I want those who are present to understand the situation. Mr. Flaunlacher was a man of large earning capacity, a real estate man in New York. He was traveling out the road to Camp Upton, had tire trouble, and drew his car alongside the road with all the lights on. A colored sergeant, driving company troops to Camp Upton, came along, admittedly drunk, turned, and drove into Mr. Flaunlacher's car. He is now absolutely crippled for life as a result of this collision. The testimony of the doctors show that his limb is withered and he will always be lame. The amount that we allowed was $4,000, and the Senate allowed $2,000. The amount allowed by the Senate does not even equal his earning capacity during the time he was in the hospital.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course the earnings would run into the thousands for rich men, and this man has an earning capacity of $10,000 a year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not with the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lewis W. Flaunlacher, as reimbursement for expenses actually incurred by him as the direct result of personal injuries received by him on September 3, 1917, near Camp Upton, Long Island, when he was struck by an automobile operated by the United States Army, the sum of $719.53, and as full compensation for loss of earnings, pain, and suffering from said injury and resulting surgical operation, and permanent disability of the right leg resulting from said injury, the sum of $1,280.47; in all, $2,000.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "$1,280.47" and insert "$3,280.47" and strike out the figures "$2,000" and insert "$4,000."

The question was taken, and the amendments were rejected.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. HENRY N. FALLON, RETIRED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3553) for the relief of the family of Lieut. Henry N. Fallon, retired.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FOCHT. I will ask the gentleman if he will withhold his objection for a minute?

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen objected.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it if the gentleman from Wisconsin will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it.

Mr. FOCHT. As the report indicates, this soldier has been confined in St. Elizabeths and made his escape. He was really a ward of the Government at the time. His mother sent after him and paid all the expenses of bringing him back, paid money which otherwise would have had to have been paid by the Government. She and her daughter are in the city now in order to be near this boy, and living in a small room. This bill was reported by the chairman of the War Claims Committee [Mr. SNELL]. I have just had word that Senator PEPPER, who is interested in this, and who has absolute confidence——

Mr. BLANTON. Having had word from Senator PEPPER, the gentleman rises to try to get this bill through?

Mr. FOCHT. I think it would be ample, but we have the report of Mr. SNELL——

Mr. BLANTON. What does the gentleman personally know about the bill? I personally investigated it and I know my colleague from Wisconsin has.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. SNELL makes a report which is here which says that we ought to pay this woman this money. I have been on the committee with Mr. SNELL for many years, and I know——

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me say that this lieutenant was confined in St. Elizabeths Hospital. The superintendent was considering the granting of a parole and had decided to grant it. Just the night before the parole was to go into effect he took French leave and now we are called upon to reimburse the family for trying to locate him and bring him back.

Mr. FOCHT. Would not the Government have been obligated to find him?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. As the superintendent of the hospital says, if we would attempt this policy it would cost the Government thousands and thousands of dollars. I object.

Mr. FOCHT. I know where they have done it repeatedly.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES INCIDENT TO THE OPERATION OF THE ARMY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4313) for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. This is an omnibus claims bill. It includes claims that have been passed to-night. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

THOMAS J. ROSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1859) for the relief of Thomas J. Rose.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, is there anyone here to give some information about this case? If not, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

VALLEY TRANSFER RAILWAY CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14082) to authorize the Valley Transfer Railway Co., a corporation, to construct and operate a line of railway in and upon the Fort Snelling Military Reservation in the State of Minnesota.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is a companion bill to the authorization that was passed on Monday, authorizing them to build bridges across the Mississippi River. Now it is proposed to grant them a right of way on the lowland approximate to the Mississippi River adjoining to and on the property of the Fort Snelling Military Reservation. As I understand the report, there is a railroad right of way there.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; that of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much valuable space is there on the low ground along the Mississippi?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I should say from 150 to 175 yards in width down to possibly 75 yards in width at the narrowest point.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not this a very valuable way of getting access to these places?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is about the only way in which Pike Island can be approached from the city of Minneapolis; so that, it being the only way that it can be approached, it is valuable to that extent. Now, just how valuable this island is going to be when it is developed after buildings are put upon it, I am unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been some years since I have visited Fort Snelling. It was merely a visit. I can not carry the details in my mind. If it is a right of way that would be valuable to other railroads entering the city by way of Pike Island, I do not think it should be granted to one company, because these rights of way become more valuable as the years go on.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I would say to the gentleman that the only use to which this could be put, speaking from my knowledge of the ground, would be for the purpose of a belt line running on the island.

The location is not adapted to running any extended series of tracks there. The Milwaukee road only runs the Iowa Short Line through there because it is not adapted to that purpose. It would not be adapted to anything except a mere line of railroad to get on to this island to connect with that bridge. As the Secretary of War says, it is only about 100 yards in width.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the idea of developing the island?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. For manufacturing purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It could not be used as a means of ingress and egress from the city?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No. My information is that what I have stated is the sole purpose of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. This would not impair the value of Fort Snelling?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; and you will notice it is a revocable permit, and it is under conditions that the Secretary of War shall prescribe.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. The reservation is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to give to the Valley Transfer Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, a permit to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a line of railway, with single or double tracks, across the Fort Snelling Military Reservation in the State of Minnesota, upon such location and under such regulations and conditions as shall be approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Line 6, before the word "permit," insert the word "revocable."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PACIFIC COMMISSARY CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 84) for the relief of the Pacific Commissary Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of some gentleman making this report as to the reason why we should reimburse this commissary company for a business loss in connection with the feeding of officers at this post—Camp Lewis, I believe—during the war?

Mr. McSWAIN. This claim I would describe as an equitable claim. When the first training camp was instituted at the Presidio, Fort Smith, 17 miles from Tacoma, then recently constructed, the Government ordered 1,500 commissioned Army officers to report there. When the commandant of the camp learned that they were on their way, he realized that there was no way in camp to feed these men. There were no troops there at the time, and the buildings that constitute the cantonment were under construction. If they had been required to go back 17 miles each night they would have lost an enormous amount of time.

Mr. STAFFORD. They went ahead and fed these 1,500 officers and fixed the price that the officers should pay?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the Army the officers get a certain allowance for rations. They received that money from the officers. After the war was over they found that they had made their rates to the officers too low, and now they are seeking to come to the Government to recover on account of an erroneous estimate that they made in charging the officers for meals.

Mr. McSWAIN. Let me explain the case to the gentleman. This private concern—a little $2,000 corporation—was under no obligation to take care of these officers. When the war burst most civilians, including myself, assumed that the commandant of a big camp spoke for the Government. This man Sullivan, representing the Pacific Commissary Co., was approached by the commanding officer of the camp and asked if he would help him take care of these men and feed them, saying that they had to eat.

Mr. McARTHUR. He was very urgently solicited to do it, was he not?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But, nevertheless, he did it under a business arrangement. The price was fixed, and he made a wrong estimate as to price.

Mr. McARTHUR. The price was not fixed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The price was fixed for the officers' meals.

Mr. McSWAIN. Fixed at a dollar a day, with the understanding that the Pacific Commissary Co. would not net any profit but that the Government would bear any loss, with the understanding that this commanding officer would authorize an increase in the price in the future if it was found that it was too low a price.

Mr. McARTHUR. The Pacific Commissary Co. did not seek at any time to make any profit out of this.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is what I say. They were not to make any profit out of it, and were to be indemnified against loss. Therefore they would not have sustained any loss but for the fact that the quartermaster at the camp kept on for five or six months before he rendered an account. In the meantime the price of rations was going up, and when he rendered his account it was found that they had lost on the feeding of the officers and certain other losses about $30,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very frank with the gentleman, I do not like this bill at all. I think this company took a business chance and lost. The gentleman says it is a case of equity. If we allow this bill at the amount recommended by the committee, what assurance have we that it will not be increased in conference? Will the gentleman fight to the end to keep down the amount?

Mr. McSWAIN. I have no authority to speak for anyone. My friend, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR], is personally acquainted with the claimants.

Mr. McARTHUR. I think I can reasonably assure the gentleman that the Senate will accept the House amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the assurance that this bill will not be increased in conference, and that it will not come back with an increased amount, I will withdraw the objection. They can not make out any claim for $31,000. These are the closing days of the session. With that understanding I will not object, and will allow the amendment to be adopted.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object. I want to ask a question. Here is the way I understand this matter: These officers got this commissary company to furnish them just a little bit better meals than the Government was paying for. They put in a claim at first for $31,000, and the committee in passing on that matter found that that claim was unjust and reduced the amount by $22,916.26. To that extent, at least, the committee held that the company was trying to gouge the Government. I am sure the gentleman from South Carolina would not approve of anything like that, because I know him too well.

Mr. McSWAIN. I acted for the committee. I literally went through hundreds of pages of testimony and five or six account books in order to try to find out what was the truth of the situation. The claimants very earnestly insisted that they were equitably entitled to the whole amount, and, as a matter of fact, they did lose on the whole transaction at Camp Lewis about $31,000; but I, looking at it from the civilian point of view and the point of view of the taxpayers, concluded that in equity they ought to receive a refund of about $9,000. The effect of that would be that while they fed these officers and incurred a loss of $30,000, only 6 days of that will fall upon the Government and 15 days will fall upon the Pacific Commissary Co.

Mr. BLANTON. But this extended over four long months in 1917. Now I want to submit this proposition to my colleague. In war time there are petty officers all over the United States who are in control of such situations. The Congress fixes a certain price at which meals can be purchased.

Mr. McARTHUR. But there was no price fixed.

Mr. BLANTON. The law fixes the price. We fix the rations for the Army and Navy. We do that in peace time as well as in war time.

Mr. McARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. McARTHUR. The Pacific Commissary Co. did this as a mere matter of accommodation. They did not stand to make anything.

Mr. BLANTON. These officers were not satisfied with the kind of rations that their own Government fixed for them. They wanted something a little better. It cost a little more money. After the whole proposition was over, after peace came, they wanted to gouge the Government for this amount.

Mr. McARTHUR. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. McSWAIN. I think the gentleman is looking at it from the wrong point of view. I was very much opposed to the claim until I studied it over a period of several months.

Mr. BLANTON. I commend the gentleman for cutting down the claim $22,000.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman's proposition is based on the assumption that the Government rations officers. It does not do so. The Government was under no legal obligation to feed these men.

Mr. McARTHUR. It was an emergency.

Mr. McSWAIN. The Pacific Commissary Co. for years has been feeding railroad laborers and construction forces generally. It was feeding the construction force that was building the camp. When these 1,500 officers came there the camp commander rushed up to these men and said: "Here, you have got to help me feed these men."

Mr. BLANTON. They knew that the Government allowed officers a certain amount in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to demand the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a perfectly just claim as reduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker; but on the statement of my colleague [Mr. BULWINKLE], who has made an investigation, I would like to withdraw the objection to the Fallon case, calendar No. 468.

Mr. McARTHUR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection to this bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the Fallon case.

Mr. BOX. I object.

THURSTON W. TRUE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2984) for the relief of Thurston W. True.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I can not see where this man is entitled to more than $794.

Mr. FULMER. I will accept that amount.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Thurston W. True, of Columbia, S. C., the sum of $1,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full satisfaction of all claims for damages against the United States arising out of the vacating by such Thurston W. True of his premises for several months during the war against Germany, in compliance with an order issued under authority of the War Department that such premises were to be used by the United States Government for a military camp.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the amount of "$1,000" and insert "$794."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN R. KISSINGER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14358) for the relief of John R. Kissinger.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been partially corrected in the War Department appropriation bill, and I object.

COLORED UNION BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13617) to dissolve the Colored Union Benevolent Association, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I see the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia here at this late hour, always attending to the duties of his committee. I would like to know what is the purpose of this bill that seeks to vest authority in three trustees with the right to disinter the remains in a colored cemetery and have them transferred to some other tract of land, allow them to sell the property and receive 5 per cent as the commission for services?

Mr. FOCHT. This is an old colored association which has a cemetery for the burial of colored persons out beyond Rock Creek Park. They want to make improvements and they want to get rid of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have known of persons objecting to living beside colored people, but I did not know that they objected to the colored dead that had been buried.

Mr. FOCHT. They want to dissolve a corporation.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a serious matter to disinter the remains of any person.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind telling us whether this involves the cemetery or any of the graves that were concerned or figured in the campaign in the gentleman's district during the last year?

Mr. FOCHT. I am not going to make a retort to that, but after the bill is passed I may reply. We have had numerous instances where cemetery associations have been dissolved in the city, where they wanted to make improvements.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many are buried in this cemetery?

Mr. FOCHT. Perhaps 30 or 40.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who are these trustees?

Mr. FOCHT. They are to be named by the commissioners, and they will be under rules and regulations.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; they are designated by the bill.

Mr. FOCHT. They are the ones that have had the control of the association. They will be under the direction of the commissioners.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13617) to dissolve the Colored Union Benevolent Association, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the charter of the Colored Union Benevolent Association of the District of Columbia shall cease and determine except as to the following-named trustees, namely, George E. Emmons, Harry A. Clarke, and Whitefield McKinlay, all of whom are citizens of the United States and residents of the District of Columbia, and their successors, are hereby continued as such corporation for the purposes hereinafter stated, with full power to fill any and all vacancies of said trustees which may occur by death or resignation until the sale, distribution, and winding up of the affairs of the said corporation as hereinafter directed shall have been effected.

SEC. 2. That the said trustees be, and they are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed, under such regulations as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may prescribe, to transfer the bodies interred in said cemetery to some other public cemetery or cemeteries or place within the District of Columbia, to be reinterred at the expense of the Colored Union Benevolent Association. And the said trustees, after qualifying by giving such bond as may be required and approved by the probate court of the District of Columbia, be, and they are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to sell and convey in fee simple the land known as the cemetery of the Colored Union Benevolent Association and the buildings thereon, and any other tract or parcel of land purchased for cemetery purposes and the buildings thereon of the said association, and apply the proceeds of such sales, together with all other moneys and assets of the said association, as hereinafter directed.

SEC. 3. That the said trustees be, and they are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to convey the said real estate by mortgage or deed of trust to secure a loan or loans, at such time and at such rate of interest as may be practicable, which money so raised shall be used by them for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, for which they shall be accountable as for other moneys coming into their hands as trustees under this act.

SEC. 4. That after paying all obligations and liabilities of the said association, including a compensation to the said trustees of 5 per cent of the gross amount of sales aforesaid, together with reasonable attorney's fees and other necessary expenses in the discharge of the duties imposed upon them by this act, the said trustees shall distribute the remainder of such amount, per stirpes, to the heirs at law or next of kin of the owners of the said real estate and the personal property of the said association, as such ownership may be evidenced by the records of said association. Before making any distribution, however, the said trustees shall first receive the approval of the probate court of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HOWARD MAY AND OTHERS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 214, S. 2746, an act for the relief of William Howard May, ex-marshal of the Canal Zone; William K. Jackson, ex-district attorney of the Canal Zone; and John H. McLean, ex-paymaster of the Panama Canal, now deceased.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to William Howard May the sum of $280.32, being the amount collected from the said William Howard May for rent of quarters while holding the office of marshal of the district of the Canal Zone.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to William K. Jackson the sum of $77.13, being the amount collected from the said William K.
